Under St. 1889, p. 72, § 9, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1034, § 1, which authorized the commissioners to assess benefits for public improvements against public lands the exclusion by the city council from an improvement district for the opening of streets of all public lands within the exterior boundaries of the district was a mere exercise of their power to determine the extent of the district and the liability of public property to assessment, and did not invalidate the assessment.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸434(2)—Decision of council as to extent of assessment district conclusive except on appeal.

The decision of the city council, determining the extent of the district benefited by an improvement, is conclusive except on appeal to that body; the commission having no power to assess benefits on public lands excluded by the council from the district.

5. Eminent domain ⟸169—General exception of public ways from land to be taken does not invalidate description in resolution and notice.

The resolution and notice for a public work sufficiently described the property to be taken where, after describing in detail the strip of land which was to constitute the street, it excepted therefrom all lands held by the city or the people as open ways.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Emilie G. Cohen and others against the City of Alameda and another, to enjoin the sale of real property for assessments for street work. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wm. J. Locke, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought to enjoin the sale of the plaintiffs' respective pieces of property for the nonpayment of assessments for the widening and extension of Encinal avenue in Alameda. The application for an injunction pendente lite having been denied, the plaintiffs paid the assessments under protest, and thereupon filed a supplemental complaint for the recovery of the amounts paid. Judgment was rendered for the defendants on demurrer, and plaintiffs appeal. The assessments were made by authority of the street opening act of March 6, 1889, as amended in 1909 and 1913. St. 1889, p. 70; St. 1909, p. 1034; St. 1913, p. 376.

[1] Appellants claim that the proceedings are void for the reason that three city officers appointed by the city council as commissioners for the assessment of the damages and benefits, to wit, the city clerk, the city auditor, and the city attorney, were disqualified because they were to be paid, as provided by the statute (St. 1889, pp. 71, 72, §§ 6, 8), from the assessments levied by them. There is no merit in this contention. If appellants' position is sound it would invalidate every assessment for the purpose of state and county taxes, and render impossible the performance of such services except by volunteer officers. It is contended that this disqualification also results from the vesting in these commissioners of an uncontrolled discretion, if the law be so construed, to exclude or include public property in the assessment of benefits. But there was no public land within the assessment district, as will be shown in the discussion of the next point.

[2, 3] Appellants claim that the assessment is void for the reason that 14 pieces of property, belonging to the city of Alameda, within the exterior boundaries of the assessment district, were not assessed for benefits. There are two answers to this proposition: First. In a district assessment the mere failure to assess a lot of land within the assessment district does not make the assessment void. The remedy for such an erroneous assessment is by objection to the city council. St. 1889, p. 73, § 14; Larsen v. City and County of San Francisco, 186 Pac. 757. Second. The city council expressly excluded such lands from the district to be assessed by the following proviso in said description:

"Saving, excepting and excluding from said district all public streets, avenues, roads, places and parks, and any and all public property within the exterior boundaries of said district of lands hereinbefore specified and described."

Previous to the enactment of section 9 of the statute, which authorized the commissioners to assess benefits against public lands, the liability of such lands for assessments for benefits accruing thereto by reason of local improvements depended upon the nature and character of the public ownership and the use to which it was applied. Witter v. Mission School District, 121 Cal. 350, 53 Pac. 905, 66 Am. St. Rep. 33; City Street Imp. Co. v. Regents of the University of Cal., 153 Cal. 776, 96 Pac. 801, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 451; Tulare Irrigation Dist. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 440, 443, 97 Pac. 1124; 28 Cyc. 1117, 1118. The effect of the statute was to authorize the local authorities to assess public property where, in their judgment, such property would be benefited by the improvement. If, however, in the judgment of the city authorities such property was not benefited, they might so determine and thus exclude such property from assessment. This, is, in effect, what was done by the city council.

The statute provides that before ordering the opening or extension of any street the city council shall pass a resolution of intention to do so describing the opening or extension to be made and the land to be taken, "and specifying the exterior boundaries of the district of lands to be affected or benefited by said work or improvement, and to be assessed to pay the damages, cost, and expenses thereof." Stats. 1889, p. 70, § 2. It also provides for notice and a hearing at which any person interested may object to the extent of "the district of lands to be affected or benefited." Sections 3, 4, and 5. If the objections are sustained, the proceeding terminates. If they are overruled, it goes forward. While the statute requires only the "exterior boundaries" of the district to be specified, it is reasonable to hold that if the council finds that any convenient delimitation of such boundaries would include parcels of land that in its opinion would not be benefited or affected by the proposed opening or extension, it could properly qualify the description by excepting such parcels, so that they would not form a part of the district. The council is empowered to determine the extent of the district benefited. It should be permitted to describe it accurately by making a proper exception of the land that may be within the fixed outer boundaries, but which are not benefited, in order that the resolution may not be inaccurate or misleading. Such a description would not make the proceeding void. The exception herein shown is obviously nothing more than a part of the description of the district, and if the council was of the opinion above referred to, the exception was necessary to make the description accurate. It must be presumed that it so decided and framed the description accordingly.

[4] The decision of the city council, determining the extent of the district benefited by the improvement, is conclusive except on appeal to that body. United Real Estate & Trust Co. v. Barnes, 159 Cal. 242, 113 Pac. 167. The commission had no power to assess any portion of the benefits upon the public lands thus included within the assessment district.

[5] It is contended that the city council never acquired jurisdiction because of the insufficient description in the resolution and notice of public work of the land to be taken. This contention is based upon the fact that after describing in great detail a strip of land 80 feet wide which was to constitute the street as widened and opened, the following exception is stated in the resolution and notice:

"Excepting therefrom all lands now held by said city or the people of said state as open ways."

Proceedings instituted under the same statute here involved were under consideration in Cohen v. City of Alameda, 124 Cal. 504, 57 Pac. 377. The description of the land taken in that case was modified by the following words:

"Excepting therefrom all land now held by said city or the people of said state as open ways."

It was held that the sufficiency of the description was not impaired by the exception. It was there said:

"If, as a matter of fact, a portion of the land within these boundaries has already been appropriated to public use, or is held by the city or state 'as open ways,' the land deemed necessary to be taken is sufficiently described by designating in the resolution the outer lines of the proposed improvement, without any mention of such open ways, or by excepting the same, without describing the exceptions. In either case the parties to be affected by the proposed improvement are fully notified of every fact necessary for the protection of their interests."

Although the language of the exception here involved is somewhat different, the principle is the same, and upon the authority of Cohen v. City of Alameda, supra, it must be held that the description of the land to be taken, contained in the resolution and notice, is sufficient. The same reasoning would apply with equal force to the sufficiency of the description of the district to be assessed, with its exceptions. These exceptions are equally definite.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.

OLNEY, J. (concurring). I concur in the decision and in opinion of Justice WILBUR, except as to the conclusion that the public lands within the exterior limits of the assessment district were not a part of the district. The assessment district was described by its exterior boundaries followed by an exception reading, "excluding * * * any and all public property within the exterior boundaries of the district." It is plain that the fact that lands are public lands, a park for example, does not affect the matter of their being benefited by the contemplated improvement. The improvement may well benefit the land, although it is public. The statute requires that all lands which will be benefited shall be included within the district, and it necessarily follows, in my judgment, that the city council cannot exclude from the assessment district all lands of a certain character such as lands owned by the public, when such lands are within the exterior limits of the district benefited, and the character or attribute because of which they are attempted to be excluded is one which does not affect the matter of their being benefited or not.

It does not follow, however, that the attempt to exclude such lands from the assessment district invalidates the assessment. The plaintiff was in no wise prejudiced thereby. Under section 9 of the act, it was discretionary with the city council to assess, or not to assess, public lands within the district. The attempt of the city council to exclude the lands from the district is but an attempt to exercise this discretion at the wrong point in the proceedings. The result, however, is the same as if it had been exercised when it should have been, at the time of making the assessment.

PEOPLE v. MALONE. (Cr. 529.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 1, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1144(13)—In absence of evidence, appellate court must assume it supported verdict.

Where the appellate court is not furnished with a copy of the testimony on appeal from a conviction of robbery, it must assume that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict.

2. Criminal law ⟸916, 1144(18)—New trial not granted because substituted attorney not prepared, where no continuance asked; it being presumed defendant's rights were protected.

It was not error to deny a motion for a new trial, after conviction for robbery, on the ground that defendant's attorney was substituted for another, who was taken ill on the day of the trial, and was unprepared to conduct the defense, where no application was made for a continuance of the trial, and the record does not contain the proceedings, as it must be presumed defendant's rights were protected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Sam Malone was convicted of robbery, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and order denying motion for new trial. Affirmed.

T. M. Anaya, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted of robbery in the superior court of the county of Stanislaus in having taken by means of force and violence from the person of one L. R. Williams certain personal property. The appeal is from the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The appeal has apparently been abandoned, as no appearance has been made for appellant in this court.

[1] We have not been furnished with a copy of the testimony in the case, and we must therefore assume that the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the verdict. The clerk's transcript, which we have examined, discloses no error. The information is sufficient, the instructions were fair and fully covered the law of the case, and there is apparently no error in the ruling of the court in denying the motion for a new trial.

[2] That motion was based upon the fact that the attorney who was employed by the defendant was taken suddenly ill, and another attorney was substituted by the court on the day of the trial. The latter filed an affidavit on the motion for a new trial, in which he stated that he was unfamiliar with the facts in the case at the time he was appointed by the court, and was utterly unprepared to make a proper defense. It is sufficient to say, however, that no application was made for a continuance of the trial, and, in the absence of the record, we must assume that all of the rights of the defendant were safeguarded; that he was efficiently represented; that he had a fair and impartial trial; and that the verdict is just and legal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BRIDGFORD v. McADOO, Director General of Railroads. (Civ. 3281.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 24, 1920.)

1. Trusts ⟸104—Facts held to show an involuntary trustee.

One who had a contract with the United States assigned to plaintiff all checks that might be issued under the contract. Thereafter the Director General of Railroads, with notice of the assignment, issued a check to the contractor, and then received it back from him for application on some other claim. Held that, under Civ. Code, § 2223, the Director General was an involuntary trustee for plaintiff, irrespective of proof of the contractor's unwillingness to repay plaintiff the advances to secure which the assignment was made.

2. Assignments ⟸101—Director General of Railroads cannot satisfy prior claim for freight from proceeds of subsequent shipment assigned for advances.

One who had a contract with the United States assigned to plaintiff all checks that might be issued under the contract. Thereafter the Director General of Railroads, with notice of the assignment, issued a check to the contractor, and then received it back from him to satisfy a claim against the contractor for freight charges in connection with other matters. Held that the Director General could not so withhold the amount due from the assignee.

3. Costs ⟸260(6½)—Penalty for frivolous appeal not imposed against Director General of Railroads, who was not responsible therefor.

Though an appeal from a judgment against the Director General was palpably frivolous, a penalty will not be imposed against him, where it was apparent he was not responsible for the delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by E. A. Bridgford against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Moore, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. A. Bridgford and Herrington & Clausen, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendant, as Director General of Railroads, appeals from a judgment rendered against him and in favor of plaintiff for $1,078.32, the proceeds of a check belonging to plaintiff and issued by the paymaster of the Quartermaster's Department of the War Department. The facts of the case found to be true by the trial court are: On September 18, 1917, one Lawrence entered into a contract with the United States, acting through its War Department, for the delivery of 2,500 cords of wood to the department at Camp Fremont, in San Mateo county. On January 16, 1918, Lawrence entered into a contract with respondent whereby respondent agreed to advance money to Lawrence from time to time to assist him in the performance of his contract with the government, and Lawrence assigned to respondent all moneys, vouchers, and checks issued under said contract, and authorized respondent to collect and receive the same. Subsequent to said assignment Lawrence delivered at Camp Fremont wood of the agreed price of more than $2,200, and fully prepaid all freight thereon with moneys advanced to him by respondent for that purpose, and there is still due and owing to respondent from Lawrence on account of said advances a sum in excess of $2,200. On the 2d day of August, 1918, an officer of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company (then operating under the appellant as Director General of Railroads), with full knowledge of respondent's right and claim to the money due under said contract, accompanied Lawrence to the office of the paymaster of the War Department, and, over the protests of respondent, aided Lawrence in procuring from the paymaster a check for $1,078.32, a portion of the amount due under said contract, and at the same time received the check from Lawrence, which was then delivered to appellant, who ever since has retained the check or its proceeds in his said capacity as Director General of Railroads.

[1] The only point raised by appellant is that it does not appear but that Lawrence was at all times willing to repay respondent all the money advanced to him, and that it does not appear that respondent ever made demand therefor upon Lawrence. Neither fact is essential to recovery in this action. The check and its proceeds were the property of respondent by reason of the assignment. The appellant and his agents, with full knowledge of the title and claim of respondent, having wrongfully secured the check, wrongfully detained possession thereof. The appellant thereby became an involuntary trustee under section 2223, Civil Code, which provides:

"One who wrongfully detains a thing is an involuntary trustee thereof, for the benefit of the owner."

Respondent was entitled to recover his own property from the trustee who thus wrongfully held it for his benefit, irrespective of the willingness of Lawrence to recompense him for the loss, and without demand upon Lawrence for that purpose.

[2] It cannot be ascertained from the record what, if any, claim appellant had against Lawrence. None is set up in the pleadings, the answer consisting entirely of denials of the allegations of the complaint. From the briefs it would appear that the claim is for freight charges of some nature. But as the trial court found that all freight on wood delivered by Lawrence to Camp Fremont pursuant to the contract and subsequent to the assignment was fully paid by moneys advanced for that purpose by respondent, and that the same had not been repaid to respondent, it is apparent that if appellant had any claim against Lawrence for freight charges it must have accrued prior to the assignment. Such being the case, Lawrence could not satisfy this indebtedness out of moneys which he had previously assigned to respondent.

[3] Furthermore, the answer filed by defendant consists solely of denials of the allegations of the complaint, including a denial of the delivery of the check to appellant as above outlined, and a denial that the check or its proceeds were ever received by appellant or his officers or agents or retained by them. The evidence offered at the trial, including the admissions of an agent of appellant who was a witness in his behalf, amply supports the conclusion of the trial court that these allegations of the answer were not true. From the record it is apparent that the check and its proceeds are the property of respondent, and that appellant is wrongfully withholding the same without any claim or title.

The appeal from the judgment is frivolous, and was palpably taken either to delay or harass the respondent, but no penalty is imposed, because it is apparent that the appellant is not the party responsible for the delay.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRINCE. (Cr. 514.)

Criminal law ⊜1130(4)—Conviction affirmed, in absence of brief, no error appearing on face of record.

On appeal from conviction of receiving stolen goods and denial of new trial, defendant filing no brief and not being represented by counsel, record examined for error, none found, and consequent affirmance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Cuban Prince was convicted of receiving stolen goods, denied a new trial, and appeals. Affirmed.

Richard P. Talbot, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted by a jury in the superior court of the county of Sacramento under an information charging him with the crime of buying and receiving for his own gain certain stolen property, knowing the same to have been stolen. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The appeal was placed on the calendar of the late (June, 1920) term of this court, and the attorney appearing of record for the defendant regularly and duly notified of the day on which the cause would be called for hearing and argument. No brief was filed in support of the appeal on behalf of the defendant within the time required by the rules of this court, or at all, and none has, since the cause was called for hearing, been filed herein. Nor was the defendant represented by counsel before this court when the case was called, and consequently no oral argument was presented in support of the appeal. There was therefore left to the Attorney General no other alternative but to submit the case upon the record, which, on the motion of that officer, was ordered done.

We have, nevertheless, examined the evidence and the rulings of the court upon objections made to certain questions put to certain witnesses, and, without entering into a detailed or even general statement of the facts, which, under the circumstances, is not required, or referring specifically to the exceptions to the rulings referred to, we state our conclusion to be that the verdict rests upon evidence sufficiently substantial to sustain it, and that none of the rulings upon the evidence to which objections were interposed by the accused is justly subject to the criticism implied from the said objections. We have also carefully examined the court's charge to the jury, and so have been fully convinced that thus the court correctly enlightened the jury upon the principles and rules of law pertinent to the charge and the facts as developed by the evidence.

The judgment and the order are accordingly affirmed.

PACIFIC FINANCE & INVESTMENT CO. v. PIERCE et al. (Civ. 3429.)

1. Sales ⊜477(6)—Acceptance of past-due installments not waiver of time as essence.

Where an agent of an automobile company sells under an installment contract a car owned by him to a purchaser, who in fact has purchased for another, whom he is merely financing, and the contract makes time of the essence, and expressly provides that acceptance by the owner of any payment after the same is due shall not constitute a waiver of such provision, the automobile company, which has taken over the contract from its agent by assignment, does not by accepting past-due installments, waive its right to retake the car upon further default.

2. Sales ⊜481—Failure to find as to rights of third person held immaterial.

Where purchaser of automobile in fact purchased for a third person, whom he was merely financing, and default was made in the payment of installments, in claim and delivery by the purchaser against the former owner of the automobile, who had retaken it, it was not necessary to find the amount owing to the purchaser by the third person.

3. Sales ⊜481—Failure to find as to rights under assignment held immaterial in claim and delivery.

Where an owner of an automobile sold it under an installment contract, and thereafter assigned the contract to a company, which after retaking the car on default of payments sold it to another, in an action of claim and delivery by the first purchaser against the assignee, it was not necessary to find as to the rights existing between such assignee and its later vendee.

4. Sales ⊜481 — Evidence held to sustain finding that purchaser made agreement with third person without consent of seller's assignee.

A finding in such action that the ostensible purchaser and such third party entered into an agreement for the protection of the former, without the knowledge or consent of the seller's assignee, held supported by evidence.

5. Sales ⊜481 — Award of interest during wrongful detention held erroneous.

In claim and delivery by purchaser for an automobile, it was error, in awarding the possession of the car to defendant, to allow a certain sum as interest on the money invested in the automobile during the time plaintiff was wrongfully in possession thereof, where such award was not supported by allegations, finding, or conclusion of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Claim and delivery by the Pacific Finance & Investment Company, a corporation, against Harley Pierce and others. There was a judgment for defendants, confirming the right of possession in defendant Greer-Robbins Company, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

J. De La Motte, of San Diego, for appellant.

R. Lee Bagby, of San Diego, for respondent.

Albert J. Lee, of San Diego, for defendants.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff, claiming the right to do so, under the provisions of a contract of purchase and sale, took possession of a certain automobile, and brought this action against the defendants, seeking to be subrogated to the right of the defendant Pierce to perform a contract, entered into between the Greer-Robbins Company and Pierce, to purchase the car. Judgment was for the defendants, and confirmed the right of possession of the automobile to the Greer-Robbins Company. Plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of financing contracts for automobiles and other commodities sold on the installment plan. The defendant Greer-Robbins Company, engaged in the business of selling automobiles, had sold the automobile in question to Frank H. Wells, one of its salesmen. Wells, as owner, then entered into a contract with the plaintiff, under the terms of which he sold the car to it upon the installment plan for the sum of $1,100. As a matter of fact, the real purchaser from Wells was the defendant Harley Pierce, the plaintiff merely financing the purchase for him. Wells then assigned the contract to the defendant Greer-Robbins Company. Defendant Pierce, in order to secure the plaintiff, entered into a side agreement with it, in which he agreed to buy the automobile from it, on installments, and specified terms. Payments, as per the Wells contract not being made, the Greer-Robbins Company took forcible possession of the car, and declared the contract cancelled. Plaintiff thereupon offered to pay the amount past due on the contract and the entire balance due on the car. The Greer-Robbins Company refused the offer, and sold the car to the defendant National Motors Company, under an installment contract for the amount due it as assignee of the Wells contract. The plaintiff took the possession of the car from the National Motors Company. That concern had in the meantime defaulted in its payments, and the Greer-Robbins Company had instituted an action to cancel all its rights under its contract.

The plaintiff in its amended complaint alleged the whole transaction to have been conceived and carried out for the purpose of cheating and defrauding it out of the money paid by it upon its contract with Wells, and other sums expended for the benefit of Pierce under its contract with him. It offered to pay into court the balance due the Greer-Robbins Company, and sought to be subrogated to the right of Pierce, and to be allowed to redeem and perform the contract for the purchase of the car. The trial court found there was no fraud in the premises. It confirmed in every particular the rights of the defendant Greer-Robbins Company in the transaction, and held that it was entitled to the possession of the automobile.

[1] Much of the appellant's argument upon this appeal is disposed of by the findings of the lower court. By its terms time is the essence of the Wells contract, and it is expressly covenanted that acceptance by the owner of any payment after the same is due shall not constitute a waiver of that provision. Pierce was in default, and plaintiff was in no better position than was Pierce when the Greer-Robbins Company took possession of the car and canceled the contract for its purchase. That company looked to plaintiff for the installments under the contract. The record indicates that it, in turn, relied upon Pierce, and he upon it. Plaintiff knew and warned Pierce of the danger he and it were in from "standing off" the payments, all, or the most of which, were made after they became due, and after notification and demand by the Greer-Robbins Company. By accepting the installments when they were past due that company did not, as contended for by the appellant, waive its right to retake the automobile upon further default. Benedict v. Greer-Robbins Co., 26 Cal. App. 468, 470, 147 Pac. 486. The condition of the contract was the payment of the purchase price in installments at given times. The failure to make them entitled the vendor by the express terms of the agreement, at its option, without previous demand or notice, to retake possession of the car. Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 597, 598. The appellant and Pierce were one in the transaction, and the Greer-Robbins Company was not estopped to assert the contract against the claim and offer of appellant, no fraud or oppression being proved or found. Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 481, 56 Pac. 339. The trial court correctly concluded and held that the acceptance of the payments after they became due did not constitute a waiver of the strict performance of the clause in the agreement making time of the essence of the contract and providing for retaking possession of the car on default in the payments. The cases relied upon by appellant to support its contention expressly lay down the rule that they are not applicable when, as here, time is expressly made the essence of the contract. Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 459, 462, 101 Pac. 299, citing Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 407, 89 Am. Dec. 124.

[2, 3] The appellant contends that the court omitted to find on material issues. The side agreement entered into by the appellant and Pierce, for the purpose of protecting appellant in its advances for Pierce's benefit, was collateral to the transaction involved here, and immaterial to the real issues of the case. It was unnecessary for the lower court to find the amount, if any, owed to appellant by Pierce under its terms. It does appear from the findings, however, that but two payments were made by the appellant on the contract, and an additional amount of one hundred and sixty-three dollars for advances. Whatever may have been the amount due to Greer-Robbins Company from Pierce, or the National Motors Company, under the contract, was also immaterial. Appellant's contention that there is no finding upon the issue as to the forfeiture of its rights under the Wells contract is not supported by the record. The court expressly found that such a forfeiture was declared, and the finding is supported by the testimony and the written notice of cancellation, dated June 2, 1917. We are unable to see how the appellant is materially injured by the failure to expressly find that the contract between the Greer-Robbins Company and the National Motors Company was canceled or forfeited. The evidence is to the effect that the payments were not made under its provisions. No rights of the appellant rest upon the existence or nonexistence of that contract. It was in default under its own contract before that transaction arose. For the same reason it matters little to appellant who comprised the copartnership National Motors Company, although the finding that Fairbairn and Davis were the partners appears sufficiently supported by the evidence.

[4] The lower court found that after the contract between Wells and plaintiff was made, the plaintiff, without the consent, knowledge, or acquiescence of Greer-Robbins Company, entered into the side agreement with Pierce. While there is evidence tending to show that this finding does not entirely accord with the facts, it finds support in the testimony of the secretary of the Greer-Robbins Company to the effect that, while it was well understood that the plaintiff was financing Pierce in the deal, the company had no knowledge of their real relations, or that there was any contract or agreement between them. Finding 6, relative to the transaction between the Greer-Robbins Company and the National Motors Company, and the interest of Pierce in that concern, after the rights of plaintiff in the Wells contract had been forfeited, finds ample support in all its essential details in testimony, the truth or falsity of which, and the weight to be given it, were matters for the determination of the trial court.

[5] When the appellant commenced this action it had the automobile in its possession. The respondent Greer-Robbins Company, by way of a cross-complaint, on the facts already stated, sought its return and at some stage of the proceedings got possession, which it had at the time of the trial. The finding of the court was that none of the other parties had any interest in the automobile, and that the Greer-Robbins Company was the rightful owner. In addition to awarding the possession of the car, the court included in the judgment "the sum of $17.50 as interest upon the money invested in said automobile during the time plaintiff was wrongfully in possession thereof." Respondent did not suggest, or pray for, damages of that character. We are at a loss to appreciate upon what theory the item was included in the judgment. There is neither allegation, finding nor conclusion of law, to which it responds. We have been unable to bring the amount into agreement with any of the figures of the various contracts, or unpaid balances, entering into the transaction. The findings are not models of legal sufficiency, but on the whole record fairly support a proper judgment, except as just noted. The judgment should be affirmed, except as to the item of interest included therein.

The cause is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to modify the judgment by striking out therefrom "the sum of $17.50 as interest upon the money invested in said automobile during the time plaintiff was wrongfully in possession thereof." When so modified, the judgment shall stand affirmed, the respondent to recover the costs of appeal.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; WELCH, Judge pro tem.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

48 Cal. App. 399

PEOPLE v. MOSLEY. (Cr. 505.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 1, 1920.) Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge. Frank Mosley was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed. Wm. P. Toscano, of San Francisco, and Frank E. Murphy, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin of the crime of grand larceny in having stolen two head of cattle, the property of one Chris Wencelburger. No appearance has been made for appellant in this court, and our attention has not been called to any reason why the judgment should be reversed. We have, however, examined the record, and find abundant evidence of the guilt of defendant, and are satisfied that no prejudicial error was committed, and that defendant had a fair and impartial trial. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

1. Wills ⊂=132—Olograph will must be "entirely written."

A will in which words constituting a part of the instrument are inserted with a rubber stamp is not "entirely written" by the hand of the testator, within the mandatory requirements of Civ. Code, § 1277, defining an olographic will.

2. Wills ⊂=132—Document having words inserted by stamp held not an "olograph will."

A document wholly in testator's handwriting, except the name of a park inserted with a rubber stamp as a part of the description of the land devised, held not valid as an "olograph will," defined by Civ. Code, § 1277, as one "entirely written," dated, and signed by testator himself, though the land could be identified without the stamped words and though the insertions were made subsequent to signing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Holographic Will.]

3. Wills ⊂=107—Insertion of words with rubber stamp not "interlineation," "alteration," or "addition."

The insertion of words of description with rubber stamp in spaces left by testator in writing a document intended as an olographic will, defined by Civ. Code, § 1277, held not an interlineation, alteration, or addition, within the meaning that all interlineations, alterations, or additions on the face of the will are presumed to have been made after its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of S. F. Thorn, deceased. From an order admitting to probate a certain document as the olographic will of deceased, and denying the application of the Mercantile Trust Company, the nominee of Emma S. Thorn, widow of deceased, for letters of administration, the Mercantile Trust Company and Emma S. Thorn appeal. Orders reversed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. We have here appeals from orders admitting to probate a certain document as the olographic will of deceased and denying the application of the Mercantile Trust Company, the nominee of the surviving wife, for letters of administration. The claim of appellants is that the document is not a valid olographic will, for the reason that it is not "entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself," as required by section 1277, Civil Code. It was so dated and signed, and was otherwise in the handwriting of the deceased, with the exception of certain words in the following paragraph of the document:

"To this society [California Academy of Sci- Cragthorn Park ences] I leave my country place Cragthorn consisting of 241 64/100 acres located about 1¼ mile below Glenwood and about 9¼ miles from the City of Santa Cruz in Santa Cruz County, State of California in Sec. 6 Town. 10 S. Range 1 West. I paid $3300.00/100 for it in 1883, title U. S. Patent Recorded and I attach a memo. herewith advising the Academy as to what they may do with it. * * * Balance of my estate and personal property I leave to Academy of Science toward a fund to improve or care for Cragthorn Park."

In this portion of the document the word "Cragthorn" was in two places inserted with a rubber stamp, instead of being written by the deceased, being the places where we have italicized the word, and the word "Park" immediately following one of these words was in the handwriting of the decedent. A memorandum attached to the document, admitted to probate as a part thereof read:

"To the Academy; Gentlemen: Don't sell Cragthorn Park at a cheap price as it is susceptible of several propositions and values. * * * Cragthorn has water higher up for the Res or Club House."

Evidence adduced on the hearing showed that decedent owned property in Santa Cruz county known as Cragthorn Park. The trial court admitted the document to probate as the last will of decedent, with the exception of the stamped words "Cragthorn," and the written word "Park" following one of the stamped words "Cragthorn."

[1] Of course, the intent of the deceased is obvious. He was endeavoring to make a valid olographic will, and the manner in which he desired his property to go is clearly specified. Nor can there be a suspicion as to the genuineness of the document. But all this is beside the question. We are confronted here with the question whether in this document there has been that substantial compliance with the mandatory requirements of our statutes relative to the execution of wills that is absolutely essential to the existence of a valid will. See Estate of Carpenter, 172 Cal. 268, 269, 156 Pac. 464, L. R. A. 1916E, 498. There being no witnesses to the execution of the document here involved it can be sustained only on the theory that it is an olographic will. By section 1277, Civil Code, an olographic will is defined as follows:

"An olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject to no other form, and may be made in or out of this state, and need not be witnessed."

This court has uniformly held that compliance with the requirements of this section is essential to the validity of a document as an olographic will, viz. that it be entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. In holding that a date was essential the court said in Estate of Martin, 58 Cal. 530, 533:

"We are not at liberty to hold that the Legislature intended any one of these requirements to be of greater or less importance than the others. If we may omit one, why not either of the others?"

In Estate of Billings, 64 Cal. 427, 1 Pac. 701, where the date was only partially in the handwriting of the deceased, who had used a letter head with the year designated in printing, the court said:

"It must be entirely written, it must be entirely dated, and it must be entirely signed by him. If it be partly written by him, and partly written by another, or printed; if it be partly dated or signed by him, and partly by another—it is not a compliance with the statute."

In Estate of Rand, 61 Cal. 468, 44 Am. Rep. 555, the deceased had used a stationer's blank, with the result that the paper was partly printed and partly in the handwriting of the deceased. The court said:

"The paper before us was not entirely written by the hand of the deceased. Portions of it were printed. The Legislature has seen fit to prescribe forms requisite to an olographic will, and these forms are made necessary to be observed. It was strenuously urged before us that the portions of the paper which were written by the deceased should be admitted to probate, omitting the printed portions. We are not at liberty to so hold. We should, thereby, in effect, change the statute, and make it read that such portions of an instrument as are in the handwriting of the deceased constitute an olographic will. The instrument, in its entirety, is before us. It was not entirely written by the hand of the deceased."

The views expressed in the decisions cited have never been departed from. See Estate of Plumal, 151 Cal. 77, 90 Pac. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Vance, 174 Cal. 122, 162 Pac. 103, L. R. A. 1917C, 479. Estate of Soher, 78 Cal. 477, 21 Pac. 8, is not at all opposed to these views. There an attestation clause in another's handwriting was properly held not to be a part of the will.

In view of the decision in Estate of Dreyfus, 175 Cal. 417, 165 Pac. 941, L. R. A. 1917F, 391, where it was held that a will made wholly by the deceased by means of a typewriter was not a valid olographic will it is clear that words stamped with a rubber stamp cannot be held to be "written * * * by the hand of the testator himself." If the words "Cragthorn," stamped with a rubber stamp upon this document, or either of them, constitute a part of the attempted will it seems obvious that the will is not "entirely written by the hand of the testator himself," and therefore does not measure up to a mandatory requirement of the statute.

[2] Two contentions are made by learned counsel for respondent in reply to appellant's position in this behalf. One of these claims is that, assuming these words to constitute a part of the will, they are wholly surplusage, the property referred to thereby being sufficiently identified without them, with the result that they do not in any way add to, alter, contradict, or cloud the meaning or the intent of the deceased, and were not necessary to complete the document as an olographic will. It may be conceded that the property is sufficiently identified without the inclusion of these stamped words and that the meaning of the attempted will is the same without them as with them. But, in view of the question before us, this consideration appears to be altogether immaterial. We are called upon to decide simply whether the purported olographic will has been executed in accord with the mandatory requirements of the law, and if not so executed we must hold it invalid. One of those requirements is that it must have been "entirely written" by the hand of the testator, which necessarily means that every word must be so written, for unless every word is so written the will is not "entirely" written by the hand of the testator.

We know of no rational theory upon which it can be held that words deemed by the testator himself essential to a description of the property devised, and inserted by him or under his direction as a part of such description in the dispositive clause of the will devising the property, do not constitute part and parcel of the will itself, notwithstanding that evidence might show the property to be sufficiently identified without the presence of such words. We have been referred to but one decision which is contrary to the view we have expressed, viz. the case of McMichael's Heirs v. Bankston, 24 La. Ann. 451, where the will was entirely written, dated and signed by the testator with the exception of the word "to" and the word "acres" in the dispositive part of the will, and it was held that the validity of the will was not impaired by the fact that these words were in another's handwriting, inasmuch as the meaning of the will was the same without them as with them. The Louisiana case was approvingly cited in Baker v. Brown, 83 Miss. 793, 36 South. 539, 1 Ann. Cas. 371, where the words "my will" at the top of the writing, the only words not in the handwriting of the deceased were very properly held to constitute a mere caption, and not to constitute any part of the will proper; the will following below these words and being in all respects in accord with the requirements of the law. The learned court, however, also based its decision on McMichael's Heirs v. Bankston, expressly approving the doctrine thereof.

We are satisfied that these decisions cannot be followed here, in view of the mandatory requirements of our statute and the decisions relative thereto, to which we have already referred. The statements in 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 552 and Page on Wills, § 230, relied on by respondent, are based solely on the decision in McMichael's Heirs v. Bankston, supra, to which they refer. Where the matter not in the handwriting of the deceased may fairly be concluded not to constitute part of the date or the will itself, undoubtedly it may be held not to invalidate the will; but it cannot fairly be said, however liberal the construction in which we indulge, that a portion of a dispositive clause of the will may be disregarded upon the plea that it is not a part of the will.

The remaining claim of respondent is based upon the contention that the impressions with the rubber stamp were made subsequent to the execution of the will, and for that reason constitute no part thereof, and may be disregarded. The trial court substantially found, it is said, that the document, without these stamped words and the written word "Park" following one of them constitutes the will of deceased, and it is urged that in certain alleged presumptions and inferences from the document itself is to be found sufficient support for this finding, which, it is contended, includes the conclusion that the rubber stamp impressions were made after the execution of the will and were consequently not a part thereof. The only direct evidence touching on this matter was that furnished by the document itself, and stipulations of the parties that the document was found in the safe deposit box of the deceased in the safe deposit vaults of the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco, and that if a certain witness was called he would testify that this box was opened in his presence shortly after the death of deceased and this document found therein, and that the manager of the vaults, if called, would testify that—

"As appears from his records, no one other than S. F. Thorn ever had the right of access to said box, and so far as he knows from his records no one other than S. F. Thorn ever visited said box or removed any contents therefrom during the lifetime of S. F. Thorn."

It is established by this evidence that the document was produced from the custody of the deceased in the condition in which it was filed for probate. That the insertion of the word "Cragthorn" by a rubber stamp in the two places was made by the deceased is made clear by the fact that the word "Park," following the "Cragthorn" placed above the line, is in his handwriting, which also indicates that the impressions were made after the writing of the word "consisting." The space left between the word "place" and the word "consisting," in which the word "Cragthorn" was stamped, was obviously designedly left by the testator for the insertion of a word or words which he deemed essential to his will, and intended to insert as a part of the will. The second impression above, followed by the written word "Park," was probably made, as is suggested by respondent because it was discovered that the space was insufficient in length for the two words, "Cragthorn Park." Whether the stamping was actually done before the writing was completed and the signature appended it is impossible to know; but it is plain, from the leaving of the space and the subsequent insertion of the stamped words, that the deceased at all times intended the stamped words to be a part of his will, and regarded the will as incomplete until such words were inserted and that such insertion was made by him as a part of the making of the will. If this was the situation, and we think no other inference may reasonably be drawn from the showing made by the document itself, it would be immaterial just when in the course of the making of the will the deceased filled in the space left to be filled by a designation of the name of the country place devised to respondent. Whenever filled in, whether before or after signature, the act was a part of the actual making of the will as designed by the deceased, and not an alteration in or attempted addition to a completed will already executed. In this view of the case, the statement near the close of the document, "This is my handwriting (an olographic will)," relied on by respondent as justifying an inference that the stamped words were not inserted prior to signature, is of no importance; but in no event do we think they would warrant any inference as to whether the stamped words were inserted prior to the signature.

[3] An exhaustive argument is made by learned counsel for respondent in support of the proposition that there is a presumption of law that all interlineations, alterations, or additions appearing on the face of a will were made after execution. This proposition is earnestly combated by counsel for appellants, and the authorities appear to be in conflict on the proposition. We deem it unnecessary to decide this question here, for the reason that the insertion of the stamped words and the written word "Park" was not an interlineation, alteration, or addition within the meaning of the rule as declared by the authorities relied on by respondent. It was simply the filling in of a space apparently left to be filled as a part of the original making of the will. This was certainly true of the word "Cragthorn," stamped on the line in the space. We cannot see that any of the authorities cited sustains the claim of respondent that, in view of the showing made by this document, there is a presumption that the rubber stamp impressions were made subsequent to its execution as a completed will. For the reasons we have stated, we are forced to the conclusion that any finding of the trial court to the effect that the rubber stamp impressions were not a part of the will is without sufficient support in the evidence.

In view of what we have said, we are satisfied that it must be held that the alleged will was not executed in accord with the mandatory requirements of our statute, and is for that reason invalid.

The orders appealed from are reversed.

SECURITY COMMERCIAL & SAVINGS BANK OF EL CENTRO et al. v. IMPERIAL WATER CO. NO. 1 et al. (L. A. 5665.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⊂⊃149—Purchaser of stock at execution has right superior to transfer not shown on books.

A purchaser at execution sale of corporate stock standing on the books in the name of the judgment debtor without notice that the outstanding certificate had been assigned or pledged to another is entitled to the stock as against the assignee or transferee, and can have a new certificate issued to him.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂⊃234—Recording deeds to land and appurtenant water right not notice of transfer of corporate stock.

Where there was no proof that the water company whose stock was purchased at execution sale was organized to supply water, within Civ. Code, § 324, or that its shares represent water rights appurtenant to lands, the record of a deed conveying the lands and the capital stock appurtenant thereto is not constructive notice of transfer of the stock.

3. Waters and water courses ⊂⊃253—Purchaser of stock of water company without land acquires no title.

Where a corporation is organized to supply water to the lands of its stockholders described in the stock certificate, and a certified copy of its by-laws has been recorded, as required by Civ. Code, § 324, as amended by St. 1895, p. 118, a purchaser of the stock without the land obtains no title to the stock, and no right to receive the water which it represents.

4. Corporations ⊂⊃149—Transfer of corporate stock subject to attachment sale before transfer entered on books.

Though the transferee of corporate stock, who fails to obtain an entry of his transfer on the books of the corporation, holds title paramount to an attachment lien, a bona fide purchaser at the attachment or execution sale prior to the transfer on the books of the corporation acquires title good against the transferee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Security Commercial & Savings Bank of El Centro and others against the Imperial Water Company No. 1 and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellants.

Dan V. Noland, of Los Angeles, and Ross & Whitelaw, of El Centro, for respondents.

SHAW, J. A rehearing from the District Court of Appeal was ordered in this cause for the purpose of correcting the form of the judgment of reversal so as to eliminate the direction to enter judgment in favor of the defendants Harris and Ferris. With the exception of the judgment we adopt the opinion of the District Court of Appeal as the opinion of this court, with the additions hereinafter stated. That opinion is as follows:

"The appeal here is on the judgment roll alone. The facts were stipulated, and as so agreed to were by the court found to be true. So far as material here, the facts stipulated and found by the court to be true are as follows:

" 'It is stipulated that on the 24th day of September, 1912, and thereafter until a transfer, as shown by the admitted facts herein, Harry Vanden Heuvel was the owner of 67 shares of the capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1, the same being represented by certificate No. 5667, and that at the same time he was also the owner of tracts 123 and 126 in township 15 south, range 13 east S. B. M., and that the said certificate of stock had written thereon the statement that it was located upon the said tracts of land.

" 'That on the 24th day of September, 1912, the said Harry Vanden Heuvel made, executed, and delivered to S. E. Baker his note and mortgage, wherein and whereby he mortgaged to the said S. E. Baker the said tracts of land, and both of them, and that his said mortgage further described, as a part of the property attempted to be mortgaged thereby, certain shares of stock, the same being described in said mortgage as, "together with 62 shares of the capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1, located upon and appurtenant to said tracts."

" 'That thereafter, to wit, on the 30th day of November, 1912, and until the assignment of his rights to the substituted plaintiff herein [Baker], has held the said stock certificate No. 5667 in his possession as collateral security, and in connection with the said mortgage, and that the substituted plaintiff now holds the certificate of stock in his possession.

" 'That on the 29th day of June, 1914, said Harry Vanden Heuvel, for a valuable consideration, sold and conveyed all of his right, title, and interest in and to said tract 123 to E. M. Vanden Heuvel, and that his deed of conveyance also described as property conveyed thereunder certain property described as "together with all improvements and water stock appurtenant to and now located thereon."

" 'That on the 29th day of June, 1914, the said Harry Vanden Heuvel, for a valuable consideration, sold and conveyed to June Vanden Heuvel all his right, title and interest in and to tract 126 in said township, and that the deed of conveyance described as being conveyed therewith the capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1 appurtenant thereto and located thereon.

" 'That the said deeds were duly recorded on the 29th day of June, 1914.

" 'That the said E. M. Vanden Heuvel and June Vanden Heuvel and the substituted plaintiff are still the owners of the legal title to said tracts 123 and 126, and they are also the owners of said certificate of stock, unless the ownership of said stock has passed to the defendants by virtue of the facts herein admitted and proven.

" 'That prior to the 30th day of April, 1915, one F. B. Ferris commenced an action against the said Harry Vanden Heuvel in the justice court of El Centro township, for the recovery of $105 and costs of suit; that summons was duly issued, and thereafter such proceedings were had that a writ of attachment was regularly issued out of said justice's court, directed to the sheriff, or any constable of said county, requiring him to attach sufficient property of the said Harry Vanden Heuvel to secure the claim of F. B. Ferris; that under and by virtue of said writ of attachment, C. C. Toney, constable of said township, served the said writ upon Imperial Water Company No. 1 by delivering to the said Imperial Water Company No. 1 a copy of the said writ, together with the notice that the aforesaid stock and all stock standing on the books of said company in the name of Harry Vanden Heuvel was attached by virtue of the said writ of attachment.

" 'That thereafter such proceedings were had in such cause in the said justice court, and prior to the 20th day of May, 1915, judgment was duly entered in said justice court in said cause in favor of F. B. Ferris and against Harry Vanden Heuvel for the sum of $113.

" 'That thereafter writ of execution against the property of said Harry Vanden Heuvel was placed in the hands of J. J. Robertson, constable of said Imperial Township, for service.

" 'That thereafter the said constable levied upon the said 60 shares of stock in Imperial Water Company No. 1 under said writ.

" 'That at the time of the levy of the said writ as aforesaid, and at the time of the sale thereunder, as hereinbefore set out, the said certificate No. 5667 stood of record on the books of said corporation, Imperial Water Company No. 1, in the name of said Harry Vanden Heuvel.

" 'That it appeared from the books of the said company that the said Harry Vanden Heuvel was the owner of 60 shares of the stock represented by the said certificate, 7 shares out of said certificate having been theretofore sold by the said company for nonpayment of assessments.

" 'That thereafter, on the 27th day of May, 1916, after the notice required by law, the said constable, acting under the purported authority of the said writ, made the purported sale of the said 60 shares of the capital stock of the said Imperial Water Company No. 1 so represented by the said certificate No. 5667, and so appearing to be owned by the said Harry Vanden Heuvel on the books of said company; it being admitted that the said sale was regular only to the extent that the facts herein admitted or proven, show otherwise.

" 'That neither of the plaintiffs in this action, nor the substituted plaintiff, nor the said Harry Vanden Heuvel, ever knew until long after the said sale that any such sale had been made, or that any attachment had been levied upon the said stock.

" 'That at the said sale F. T. Harris became the purchaser of the 60 shares of stock aforesaid, and at said sale he was the highest and best bidder for said stock, and said constable sold the said stock to the said Harris for the sum of $113, and thereupon issued and delivered to said Harris his constable's certificate of sale, setting out the sale of the shares of stock to said defendant Harris, as aforesaid.

" 'That thereupon the said defendant Harris presented the said constable's certificate of sale to Imperial Water Company No. 1, and demanded the transfer of the said 60 shares of stock to the said defendant, and that certificates therefor be issued to the said defendant Harris; thereupon, said Imperial Water Company No. 1 accepted the said constable's certificate of sale as evidence of the transfer of said shares of stock theretofore represented by stock certificate No. 5667, and canceled the said certificate of stock No. 5667 upon their books, so far as was in their legal power to do so, and issued in lieu thereof to the said defendant F. T. Harris certificates for 60 shares of the capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1, to wit, one certificate No. 7950 for 32 shares, and one certificate No. 7951 for 28 shares, and the said two certificates under the seal of said corporation were delivered to said F. T. Harris, on the notation made upon the books of said corporation by its secretary to the effect that the certificate No. 5667 had been canceled by the reissue of the said certificates No. 7950 and No. 7951.

" 'It is stipulated that M. W. Conkling, acted for F. T. Harris in purchasing said stock, and paid the cash to the constable at said sale for F. T. Harris, and that he did not know, nor did he or they, or either of them, make any inquiry to ascertain at the time, or at any time, before the actual delivery of the certificates of stock to Harris, that either the substituted plaintiff, or any of the plaintiffs, had already claimed any interest in the stock, or had any pledge thereof, and that he had no knowledge concerning the ownership of said stock except what appeared upon the books of the said corporation.

" 'That said M. W. Conkling was also acting as attorney for the plaintiff, F. B. Ferris, in the action in the justice's court, out of which the execution was issued, under which the attempted sale was made.

" 'And thereupon evidence was introduced as to the other issues not covered by the said stipulation, and from such evidence the court finds: That at the said constable's sale mentioned in the said stipulation the said F. T. Harris purchased the said stock in good faith and without any notice or knowledge of the rights or claims of the plaintiffs, or any of them, and without any notice or knowledge of the fact that the said certificate of stock had been transferred, or any thereof, had been transferred to June Vanden Heuvel or E. M. Vanden Heuvel, other than such notice as was imparted by the recording of the deeds to June Vanden Heuvel and E. M. Vanden Heuvel as mentioned in said stipulation, and without any notice or knowledge that the said stock, or any thereof, had been pledged to the plaintiff S. E. Baker, and that he paid the said constable therefor the sum of $113; and that the reasonable market value of the stock at the time was $600. That after the issue of said Imperial Water Company No. 1 of this certificate No. 7950 and certificate No. 7951, as stipulated herein, the said F. T. Harris, for a valuable consideration, indorsed, transferred and sold the said certificate No. 7951 for 28 shares to F. B. Ferris. That at the time the said F. B. Ferris purchased the said certificate from the said F. T. Harris he, the said F. B. Ferris, had notice and knowledge of the fact that prior to the said constable's sale and prior to the levy upon the said stock as stated in the said stipulation the said Harry Vanden Heuvel had sold and transferred his original certificate of stock No. 5667, mentioned in the foregoing stipulation, and that he was not at that time the owner thereof.'

"On these findings the court entered judgment as follows: 'It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that said plaintiffs E. M. Vanden Heuvel and June Vanden Heuvel have and recover judgment against said defendant as follows: (1) That certificates Nos. 7950 and 7951, issued by Imperial Water Company No. 1, be delivered to said company for cancellation, and that said company be, and they are hereby, required to cancel said certificates and reissue to said plaintiffs E. M. Vanden Heuvel and June Vanden Heuvel a new certificate for 60 shares of the capital stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1 in the name of the Security Commercial & Savings Bank as pledgee for the said E. M. Vanden Heuvel and June Vanden Heuvel.'

[1] "Appellants contend that upon the facts found the judgment should have been for the defendants Harris and Ferris; and with this contention, we think, the authorities are in full accord. One who purchases at execution sale shares of stock of a corporation, standing on the books of the corporation in the name of the judgment debtor, is entitled to have the certificate of such shares reissued to him as such purchaser, if at the time of the purchase he acts in good faith and without notice that the outstanding certificate has been assigned or pledged to some person other than the judgment debtor. In order that an assignee or pledgee of a certificate may protect his rights, as against a purchaser at execution sale, he must cause a reissue to him of a certificate, or he must serve notice on the corporation that he holds the certificate as such assignee or pledgee. It having been stipulated, and the court having found as a fact that 'F. T. Harris purchased the said stock in good faith and without any notice or knowledge of the rights or claims of the plaintiffs, or any of them, and without any knowledge of the fact that the said certificate of stock had been transferred,' etc., there can be no escape, we think, under our law and the authorities in this state, from the conclusion we have reached.

[2] "Neither the findings nor the stipulation upon which the findings are based contain any direct statement that the shares represent any water right or rights appurtenant to the tracts 123 and 126. Nor do the findings show that Imperial Water Company No. 1 is a corporation organized for and engaged in the business of selling, distributing, supplying, or delivering water for irrigation purposes or for domestic use, within the meaning of section 324 of the Civil Code. For these reasons it cannot successfully be claimed that the deeds from Harry Vanden Heuvel to E. M. Vanden Heuvel and June Vanden Heuvel transferred water rights that are simply evidenced by the stock certificates. For the same reason it cannot be claimed that the recordation of the deeds gave notice to subsequent purchasers of the stock that all the rights and interests represented by the stock had been transferred to the grantees named in the deeds. In short, for the reasons stated, the stock cannot be treated otherwise than as stock issued by any ordinary commercial corporation.

"For the foregoing reasons we think it was error, prejudicial to the rights of appellants, to enter the judgment appealed from, as it is clear from the record here that, as a matter of law, these appellants were entitled to have judgment entered in their favor."

[3] For the information of the lower court and the parties on questions that may arise upon a new trial, we think it necessary to add some further observations. The findings of the court, including the stipulation between the parties as to the facts, indicate the probability that Imperial Water Company No. 1 had provided in its by-laws that the water it was distributing should only be "sold, distributed, supplied, or delivered to owners of its capital stock, and that such stock shall be appurtenant to" the lands described in the certificate issued therefor, and that a certified copy of such by-laws had been recorded in the office of the county recorder in the county where the lands are now, or were then, situated, as provided in section 324 of the Civil Code as amended in 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 118). If these be the facts, then under that section, the shares of stock can be transferred only with the lands, and can pass as an appurtenance thereto, and not otherwise. The result would be that a purchaser of the stock, without the land, would obtain by such purchase no title to the stock and no right to receive the water which the stock represents. Possibly the same results would follow from the by-laws and certificates, even if the copy of by-laws was not recorded. Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 328, 163 Pac. 54; Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 243, 81 Pac. 539; Thayer v. California D. Co., 164 Cal. 136, 128 Pac. 21. But as to this we express no opinion. Under these circumstances, we think the proper course to pursue is to reverse the judgment without directions to enter judgment for defendants so that the complaint may be amended, if necessary, to show the true character of said stock and the existing facts regarding the by-laws of the corporation as above indicated.

[4] It may be further noted that counsel for the plaintiffs appear to have misunderstood the opinion of this court in National Bank of the Pacific v. Western Pacific, etc., Co., 157 Cal. 573, 108 Pac. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 1391. Briefs recently filed in this court indicate that other attorneys also misunderstood it. That case was dealing only with the lien of an attachment levied upon the stock, and with the rights of the parties in the stock prior to any sale thereof under the attachment. It holds that the assignee of corporate stock who fails to obtain a transfer of his assignment on the books of the corporation holds title paramount to the lien of an attachment subsequently levied thereon in an action against his assignor. But it does not hold, and it is not the law, that such assignee holds title paramount to one who, in good faith, without notice, purchases the stock on an attachment or execution sale, prior to the transfer of the assignment on the books of the company. Such purchaser, if he buys without notice of an unregistered transfer to another, takes title superior to that of such transferee, provided he pays value for the stock.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

CITY OF PASADENA v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA.

1. Electricity ⟸11—City operating electric light plant is not a "private corporation," subject to railroad commission.

Under Const. art. 12, § 23, defining public utilities which are subject to regulation by the Railroad Commission as private corporations engaged in certain enterprises, including electric light plants, the term "private corporation" does not include municipal corporations, so that a city engaged in operating an electric light plant to supply its inhabitants is not subject to regulation by commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Private Corporation.]

2. Municipal corporations ⟸1—Engaging in business does not affect character of corporation.

Though a city, while engaged in the business of furnishing electric power and light to its inhabitants, is liable for acts of its agents for which it is not liable while performing purely governmental functions, it does not, while engaging in such business, lose its character as a municipal, instead of a private, corporation.

3. Electricity ⟸11—Construction of Constitution, as excluding municipal corporations from regulation, confirmed by other provisions.

The construction of Const. art. 12, § 23, as not subjecting municipal corporations to regulation by the Railroad Commission, is confirmed by other provisions of the same section, protecting control of municipalities over utilities, and by the address to the voters, summarizing the purpose of the section and also by subsequent amendments, taking from municipalities the regulation of utilities, and authorizing cities to furnish electric light and power outside their boundaries.

4. Constitutional law ⟸14—Words in Constitution should be given common, not technical, meaning.

The words of a Constitution, which owes its authority to ratification by the people, should be given their general meaning, unless it appears that they were used in a legal or technical sense.

5. Public service commissions ⟸6—Constitution does not authorize Legislature to confer on Railroad Commission powers not germane to purpose.

Const. art. 12, § 22, authorizing the Legislature to confer additional powers of the same kind or different from those conferred on the Railroad Commission, does not authorize the Legislature to confer upon the commission powers not germane to the purpose for which it was created.

6. Electricity ⟸11—Statute authorizing control of electric companies does not authorize control of city light plant.

Public Utilities Act, § 2, subd. (r), conferring on the Railroad Commission power to regulate every electric corporation, does not empower the commission to regulate a city in the operation of an electric light plant for its inhabitants and those of the surrounding territory.

In Bank.

Application for certiorari by the City of Pasadena against the Railroad Commission of the State of California to review an order requiring petitioner, a municipal corporation, to file schedule of rates for electric service. Order annulled.

James H. Howard, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for applicant.

Hugh Gordon, of Los Angeles (Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for Railroad Commission.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent and Pacific Light & Power Co.

SHAW, J. The charter of the city of Pasadena, adopted in 1901, gives it power to construct and operate electric works and supply electricity to its inhabitants for light and heat. The city constructed electric works, and prior to 1909 began to supply its inhabitants with electricity. In 1909 it extended its wires into the adjoining city of South Pasadena, and ever since that time it has been supplying electricity to the inhabitants of the latter city for similar purposes. On August 30, 1919, on the complaint of the Pacific Light & Power Company, which was also engaged in supplying electricity to the inhabitants of South Pasadena, the Railroad Commission, in pursuance of section 14 and other provisions of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, p. 122), made an order requiring the city of Pasadena "to file with the railroad commission a complete schedule of all its rates, charges, rules and regulations for the service of electric energy to consumers within the limits of South Pasadena." The object of the present proceeding in this court is to review and annul said order on the ground that it is in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission.

[1] The theory of the plaintiff is that the Public Utilities Act, under which the Railroad Commission made the order, has no application to any public service carried on by a municipal corporation under the authority of the Constitution and laws of the state. We are of the opinion that this proposition must be sustained. The authority of the Legislature to make laws conferring powers upon the Railroad Commission is derived from sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the Constitution. The defendant relies mainly on the two opening sentences of section 23, which are as follows:

"Every private corporation, and every individual or association of individuals, owning, operating, managing, or controlling any commercial railroad, interurban railroad, street railroad, canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, or any part of such railroad, canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, within this state, for the transportation or conveyance of passengers, or express matter, or freight of any kind, including crude oil, or for the transmission of telephone or telegraph messages, or for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power or for the furnishing of * * * wharfage facilities, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier, is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the Legislature, and every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the Legislature to be public utilities shall likewise be subject to such control and regulation. The Railroad Commission shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities, in the state of California, and to fix the rates to be charged for commodities furnished, or services rendered by public utilities as shall be conferred upon it by the Legislature, and the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

It will be observed that the first sentence of this clause declares that every "private corporation" which owns and operates a plant "for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power," is a public utility. The subsequent sentence declaring the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission to be plenary is limited to the conferring of powers "respecting public utilities." This, of course, means public utilities as defined in the first sentence. That sentence, by its terms, applies exclusively to private corporations and natural persons or associations of persons. It does not include a municipal corporation in the definition.

[2] The argument on behalf of the defendant is that a municipal corporation, when carrying on a public service, such as furnishing water, light, heat, or power to its inhabitants is not acting in its governmental capacity as sovereign, but is acting in a proprietary capacity, and that for some purposes with respect to such action it is subject to the same rules as private persons. For example, it is liable in damages for injuries caused by negligence of its servants in the operation of such public service, whereas it is not so liable for negligence of its servants, such as policemen, who are carrying out its governmental powers. This proposition is well established. Davoust v. Alameda, 149 Cal. 70, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847; South Pasadena v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 152 Cal. 595, 93 Pac. 490; Chafor v. Long Beach, 174 Cal. 487, 163 Pac. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106. Upon these premises it is said that a city acts in a dual capacity—that it is a public corporation with respect to its strictly governmental powers, and a private corporation with respect to its public service functions; that for this reason the phrase "private corporation" in section 23 must be held to include municipalities whenever the so-called proprietary powers of the municipality are concerned; and that therefore the Legislature may confer powers upon the Railroad Commission to regulate the rates of municipalities for carrying on such public service.

It is not true that a city is a private corporation when carrying on a municipally owned public utility. No decision so holds. All the decisions on the subject recognize the fact that a city does not change its character by engaging in such enterprises. The entire course of reasoning in the opinions is founded on the postulate that such city retains its character as a municipal corporation, and the burden of the arguments consists of efforts to find reasons for holding it liable to the same extent as a private corporation engaged in the same service, notwithstanding the fact that the city carries on the business as a municipal corporation. They all assume that such city is as much a municipal corporation with respect to such business functions as it is with regard to the exercise of its purely governmental powers. The distinction does not go to its character as a corporation, but to its liabilities in exercising one class of its powers, as compared to its liabilities in the exercise of its functions as a local governmental agency.

[3] The phrase "private corporation" in section 23 should therefore be given its natural and ordinary meaning, and consequently this section does not include municipal corporations among the public utilities it deals with. That this must have been the intent of the framers of the section, and of the voters who adopted it, is shown by other provisions of the section and by the address in its favor sent to each voter with the sample ballot and copy of the proposed amendment just prior to the election. The section carefully provides that, nowithstanding the powers thereby given to the Railroad Commission "respecting public utilities," the powers of control over "any public utility" that were vested in any municipal corporation should not be affected by the section, unless the voters of such municipality, at an election held for that purpose, should decide to relinquish such powers. This, of course, refers to "public utilities" as defined in the opening clause of the section. The proviso would not engender the suspicion that the municipal corporation itself was included in the "public utilities" to which it refers, nor lead any one to suppose that the voters were to be invited to surrender to the Commission the control and management of any municipally owned water systems, lighting plants or street car lines. It does strongly imply that it refers solely to the powers of such cities to regulate the operations of privately owned systems of that kind. The address to the voters, after stating that the term "public utilities" was so defined by the section as to embrace every conceivable kind of public service, summarized its effect on that subject as follows:

"Briefly, the amendment proposes to extend the jurisdiction of the railroad commission to every kind of public service excepting that furnished by municipally owned plants"

—and pointed out that the provision reserving to cities the powers over public utilities theretofore vested in them was inserted in the section because of the feeling that the voters of such cities might feel reluctant to submit to the revocation of such powers and the transfer thereof to the Railroad Commission without their consent. By this address the voters were clearly informed that municipal corporations were not included in the definition of public utilities in the opening clause of the section. To hold that under all these circumstances the voters nevertheless were aware of the refined distinction between the governmental powers and proprietary powers of cities and towns and understood that municipal corporations, so far as they exercise proprietary functions, were to be included in the definition of public utilities and in the term "private corporations," seems to be the height of absurdity.

While many lawyers may understand the distinction, it is certainly true that the ordinary citizen has no conception thereof.

It is true that section 23 was amended in 1914, so as to provide that the rate regulating power of municipal corporations over "public utilities" should no longer be retained by them. But the definition of the term "public utilities" remained unchanged, and the amendment made rather emphasizes the proposition that municipal corporations performing such public service were not supposed to be embraced in the definition.

Furthermore, at the election of 1911 the people also adopted an amended section 19 of article 11, which provides that "any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat," and the like, and might also furnish such service to inhabitants outside its boundaries. They were empowered to do these things as municipal corporations, not as private corporations, thus showing that they were not, while so doing, to be classed as private corporations.

[4] The conclusion we have reached is in accordance with the well-established rules for the construction of the language of a Constitution. The Constitution, "unlike the acts of our Legislature, owes its whole force and authority to its ratification by the people; and they judged of it by the meaning apparent on its face according to the general use of the words employed where they do not appear to have been used in a legal or technical sense." Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 465, 14 Pac. 27, 28, 1 Am. St. Rep. 67. Where word has a popular and also a technical meaning, "the courts will accord to it its popular meaning, unless the very nature of the subject indicates or the context suggests that it is employed in its technical sense." Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 113.

[5] The defendant also claims that the right of the Legislature to confer such powers upon the Railroad Commission is given by a passage in the amended section 22 of article 12, an amendment also adopted in 1911. This section creates the Railroad Commission, and contains provisions for the appointment of its members and for its organization, and confers upon it certain powers with regard to common carriers of freight and passengers, and thereupon it provides that—

"No provision of this Constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon the authority of the Legislature to confer upon the Railroad Commission additional powers of the same kind or different from those conferred herein which are not inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the Railroad Commission in this Constitution, and the authority of the Legislature to confer such additional powers is expressly declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

If the provision of section 22 that "the authority of the Legislature to confer upon the Railroad Commission additional powers of the same kind or different from those conferred herein which are not inconsistent with the powers conferred" upon the commission by the Constitution, should be thenceforth "plenary and unlimited by any provision of this Constitution," is to be taken literally, its possible results would be so startling that it cannot be conceived that any citizen could ever be induced knowingly to vote for such a measure. If so construed, the Legislature would thereby be empowered to confer upon the Railroad Commission all the powers of government, executive, judicial, and even the legislative power itself. Of course, no such effect can be allowed to this broad declaration. It must be construed in connection with the general subject of the section, with the other sections which precede it relating to the same general subject, and with the place in which it occurs in the Constitution. It is a part of article 12, the whole of which is devoted to the subject of private corporations, as distinguished from public corporations; the latter being the particular subject of article 11. The powers referred to are therefore to be understood to mean powers relating to private corporations, except where the words indicate a different intent. Section 22 was in article 12 as originally adopted. It was the concluding section of a series beginning with section 17, all of which related to common carriers and the public control and regulation thereof. While amendments of sections 20 and 21 were also adopted in 1911, they were not changed, so as to relate to any other subject. Section 22, before the amendment of 1911, also created a Railroad Commission, and granted to it certain powers over common carriers in language in many respects similar to the amendment.

Considering all these circumstances, the only reasonable conclusion is that the authority intended to be given to the Legislature by this section to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission must be limited to the subject of powers over common carriers and transportation and the control and regulation thereof by the commission, and such other things as may be necessary or convenient for the proper and effectual exercise of such powers of regulation and control. The subject of similar powers over all other classes of public utilities carried on by private corporations or persons is covered by the provisions of section 23, as we have seen. The provisions of section 22 should not be extended beyond the matters included in the context and the subject-matter of the article in which it occurs, and hence it cannot be construed to give the Legislature authority to confer upon the commission power to regulate the rates of service charged by municipal corporations operating municipally owned public utilities.

This is in harmony with the interpretation heretofore given to this provision of the section. In Pacific, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. at page 691, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822, the court speaking through Justice Sloss, said concerning these clauses of sections 22 and 23:

"To the extent, then, that the Legislature has acted in conferring powers (germane to the subject of the regulation and control of public utilities) upon the Railroad Commission, it necessarily follows that the validity of such grant of powers is not to be questioned by reason of any other provision of the state Constitution." (Italics ours.)

And again on page 702 of 166 Cal. on page 1143 of 137 Pac. (50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822), on the same subject, the learned justice, by way of conclusion, said:

"This statement is, however, to be taken subject to the qualification that the powers conferred by the Legislature on the Railroad Commission must be such as are cognate and germane to the purposes for which the Railroad Commission was created; i. e., the regulation and control of public utilities."

And in the same case Justice Henshaw said in summing up:

"The legality of such powers as the Legislature has or may thus confer upon the commission, if cognate and germane to the subject of public utilities, may not be questioned under the state Constitution" 166 Cal. at page 689, 137 Pac. at page 1138 (50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822).

The court here, as the context of the opinions plainly shows, uses the phrase "public utilities" with the meaning given to it by the definition thereof in section 23, and as referring solely to public service carried on by private corporations or natural persons.

The defendant contends that the decision in South Pasadena v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 Pac. 490, is contrary to these conclusions. In that case the defendant, a private corporation, owned a water system supplying water to a defined territory, situated partly in Pasadena and partly in South Pasadena; they being adjoining cities. Pasadena was about to acquire the system from the company as a part of its municipal water system. The suit was brought to enjoin the company from making the transfer. In the course of the opinion it is declared that, after Pasadena acquired the water system, it would be obliged to continue the public service in South Pasadena, as before, and that South Pasadena, under section 19, article 11, and section 1, article 14, of the Constitution, as it then stood, would thereafter, as before, have the right to fix the rates to be charged for the water served within that city. The main reason given was that, since the Constitution then gave to each city power to fix rates for water supplied within its limits for public use, the power of South Pasadena was paramount with respect to the rates for water supplied therein. The case was decided in 1908, prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendments we are now considering. Section 19, article 11, then gave powers to cities to regulate the rates for public service of water or light within its limits by "any individual or any company duly incorporated for that purpose." Section 1, article 14, provided that rates for the use of water supplied in any city by "any person, company, or corporation * * * in this state" should be fixed annually by such city. The word "private" was not appended as a limitation of the meaning of the words "company" and "corporation," in these sections, as it is now in section 23 of article 12; and as there was no other body then authorized to fix such rates, the words "company" and "corporation" were obviously as applicable to rates for water supplied by a municipal corporation to the inhabitants of an adjoining city as to rates for water so supplied by any other corporation, and this the court there assumed without stating it. The decision can have no bearing upon the meaning of the words "private corporation" in the part of section 23 of article 12 defining "public utility," adopted in 1911.

In may be that, by reason of the recent amendment of section 19, article 11, in the few cases where one city operates a municipal plant for a public service which extends into another city, there may be some doubt which one of the two cities shall have the right to fix the rates for such outside service. The terms of the amendment are not clear on the question. With that subject we are not here concerned. It is clear, as we have shown, that the city furnishing the outside public service is not a "public utility" within the meaning of that term, as defined in section 23, article 12, and hence that the Railroad Commission has no power to fix its rates for such service.

[6] It is also suggested that the Public Utilities Act confers upon the commission power to regulate the rates of every "electrical corporation," a term which it defines as including "every corporation or person * * * owning, controlling, operating or managing any electric plant for compensation within the state" (Stats. 1915, p. 115, § 2, subd. [r]), and that this definition is broad enough to include municipal corporations. The language of the subdivision and also that of the other subdivisions of the section indicate that the legislative purpose extended to the regulation of commercial corporations only, and that municipal corporations were not within its purview. If municipal corporations are to be included, the result would be that the Railroad Commission would have power to regulate and control the rates and the service of every water plant, gas plant, electrical plant, and street car system owned or operated by any municipality in the state. We cannot believe that the very general language used should be so broadly interpreted, in the absence of any specific mention of municipal corporations, even if it were conceded that the Legislature under the general grant of legislative power (article 4, § 1) might transfer such powers from the municipalities to the commission.

We find no tenable ground upon which to base the conclusion that the rates charged by a municipality for its service in carrying on any public utility, either within its own limits or in outside territory, are under the control of the Railroad Commission.

The order is annulled.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Petition by John T. Merritt for letters of guardianship of the person of Helen Anthony Hawkins, a minor, opposed by George W. Hawkins. From an order appointing petitioner guardian and from a decree that letters of guardianship be issued to him, contestant appeals. Decree and order affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and C. C. Sullivan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Samuel Rosenheim, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Petition by John T. Merritt for letters of guardianship of the person of Helen Anthony Hawkins, a minor. The petition was granted. George W. Hawkins, the father of the minor, contested the petition, and has taken two appeals—one from the order appointing petitioner guardian, and the other from the decree that letters of guardianship issue to him. The record of the appeals is presented under the alternative method.

Helen Anthony Hawkins is the only child of appellant and Ethel A. Hawkins, the deceased daughter of respondent. The minor was born in 1913. Her father and mother were married in 1905, and for at least one year prior to March 22, 1917, were living in Arizona. On the last-mentioned date Mrs. Hawkins obtained a final decree of divorce from appellant, the validity of which is not questioned. By this decree the custody of the little girl was awarded to the mother, with whom the child lived until October 14, 1918, when the former died. Within a few days thereafter petitioner caused the minor to be brought to his home in Petaluma, Sonoma county, and on October 24 he filed this petition in the superior court for that county, setting forth that the minor was a resident therein. On October 22 appellant sued out a writ of habeas corpus, seeking the custody of the child. Both proceedings were heard together, and the writ was discharged. In the matter of the guardianship the court found inter alia that appellant had "knowingly and willfully abandoned" the minor, that appellant was "not a fit or proper or competent person" to have her care or custody, and that respondent was fit and competent to be appointed guardian. Accordingly, the court ordered on December 31 that respondent be appointed guardian, and on January 13, 1919, that letters of guardianship issue.

[1] 1. We shall first consider appellant's claim that "the pleadings are insufficient to raise the issue of abandonment or incompetency." In making this contention appellant has apparently ignored the allegations of his answer that he "is the father of the above-named minor * * * and is in all respects capable, ready, and willing * * * and under the laws of the state of California entitled to obtain the care, custody, and control of said minor, and that he is capable, ready, able, and willing to properly provide and care for said minor." These allegations were deemed denied, and it thus became an issue whether appellant was "capable, ready, able, and willing" to assume the duties of guardianship. The pleadings were therefore sufficient to raise the issues of appellant's abandonment and incompetency.

[2] 2. Appellant's second contention is that there was "no showing that the father was unfit or incompetent to discharge the duties of guardianship." We think the evidence was amply sufficient. Mrs. Theodore Kohn testified that she had been acquainted with appellant and his deceased wife; that on one occasion the witness and her husband had visited the wife at her home in Arizona prior to the divorce; that on this occasion, in appellant's absence, the wife had told the witness that appellant neglected the child; that the witness had seen appellant kick and otherwise abuse his wife; and that the witness saw a letter written by appellant to the mother, in which he made no mention of the child.

The evidence was uncontroverted that, prior to the divorce, appellant mistreated his wife, and habitually neglected the child, and that for a considerable time he occupied questionable relations with an unmarried woman whom he has since married, and who is his present wife, residing with him in the state of New York.

Regarding appellant's life in Arizona, J. H. Knost testified that, according to his knowledge, appellant occasionally associated with lewd and depraved women at Globe, Ariz.; that he indulged in the excessive use of intoxicating liquors; that subsequent to the beginning of his relationship with his present wife he would leave home, giving no information as to his whereabouts, and failing to communicate with the mother or child; that he gave the latter practically no attention, except in the way of sending her money in accordance with the decree of divorce; and that after the divorce, he never visited or wrote to the child; that the divorce was granted because of the illicit relations between appellant and his present wife; that the reputation of the latter was such that the witness did not consider her capable of properly raising or instructing the child; that her reputation was that of an immoral woman; that he had seen telegrams signed by her and addressed to appellant, denoting improper relations between them before the divorce; that appellant had told him of visits he had made to her prior to the divorce; and that it was commonly understood among his associates that she was a woman of questionable character.

John M. Wyatt stated in his deposition that he had known appellant since 1904; that for the past few years appellant had been drinking to excess; that he was decidedly unkind to the mother of the child; that on or about October 10, 1916, the witness had seen him kick her out of bed, and at other times slap her face and kick her; that appellant paid "very little attention" to the minor; that "at times in the house he didn't care to have her around him at all"; that appellant had paid no attention to the child since the divorce; and that his present wife "had the reputation of leading a very fast life in many different ways, as to drinking and being intimate with men."

James E. Nelson, who was assistant city attorney of Phœnix, Ariz., during 1916, testified that prior to the divorce the present Mrs. Hawkins and another woman were arrested by the police on a charge of conducting a disorderly house, and that the former was a disturbing element in Phœnix, "causing the police a great deal of trouble by reason of numerous drunken parties which she and her friend attended."

L. T. Sutherland, captain of police at Phœnix, testified that she had registered at the Ford Hotel in Phœnix in a room adjoining that of appellant before the divorce, and that her reputation with the police department of Phœnix was that of an ordinary prostitute.

George Brisbois, chief of police of Phœnix; Miss Harriet J. Oliver, chief clerk in the office of the secretary of state of Arizona; Alpheus Harding, a business man of Tucson, Ariz.; Kirke T. Moore, county attorney of Pima county, Ariz.; and Alice W. Birdsall, an attorney of Phœnix—testified that appellant had frequently associated with his present wife before his divorce; that her reputation was that of a common prostitute, and that he neglected the mother and child.

The appellant produced a score of depositions. Some of his witnesses testified to the good reputation of his present wife and himself in New York, and that she was fond of children; but none of them had been acquainted either with her or appellant in Arizona. William Mueller testified that her reputation at her home in Hillside, Ariz., was good, but admitted that he could not testify as to her reputation for chastity, virtue, and morality in Phœnix, where she resided during the years 1916 and 1917. Mrs. F. E. Marum, assistant postmaster at Hillside, testified that appellant and his present wife had stopped at the hotel at which the witness lived, but her mother stated that she did not know that her daughter had gone to the hotel. Her father was asked where his daughter lived in Phœnix, and he answered, "I could not say." Appellant testified in his own behalf, but only as to his willingness to take care of the child, and the present Mrs. Hawkins did not testify at all.

Section 246 of the Civil Code provides:

"In awarding the custody of a minor, or in appointing a general guardian, the court or officer is to be guided by the following considerations: 1. By what appears to be for the best interests of the child in respect to its temporal and its mental and moral welfare; * * * 3. Of two persons equally entitled to the custody in other respects, preference is to be given as follows: (1) To a parent; (2) to one who was indicated by the wishes of a deceased parent; * * * 4. Any parent who knowingly and willfully abandons * * * his minor child under the age of fourteen years, forfeits the guardianship of such child. * * *"

See, also, Guardianship of Danneker, 67 Cal. 643, 8 Pac. 514; Guardianship of Vance, 92 Cal. 195, 198, 28 Pac. 229; Guardianship of Imperatrice, 188 Pac. 48.

[3] And the rule is well settled that "the primary consideration for the guidance of the court is 'the best interest of the child with respect to its temporal and its mental and moral welfare,' * * * and the conclusion reached [by the court] will not be set aside on appeal unless it was reached as the result of an abuse of discretion." Matter of Allen, 162 Cal. 625, 124 Pac. 237. See, also, Guardianship of Vance, supra; Guardianship of Danneker, supra; Guardianship of Lewis, 137 Cal. 682, 70 Pac. 926; Lawrence v. Thomas, 84 Iowa, 362, 51 N. W. 11.

In the instant case the evidence bearing upon appellant's fitness and competency to perform the duties of guardianship was involved throughout in conflict. Appellant's witnesses, while testifying to the good reputation he and his present wife enjoyed in New York, and which, according to their testimony, she had enjoyed in Arizona, did not state what his reputation was in the latter state. Respondent's witnesses testified, as we have seen that the reputation of both her and appellant in Arizona was unsavory, and that he had neglected and abandoned his former wife and child. Appellant claims "that the trial court totally disregarded the fact that the testimony * * * in no way, directly or indirectly, questioned the present reputation or character of George W. Hawkins or Mrs. Hawkins, his present wife." The trial court, however, was entitled to consider all the evidence in determining whether appellant was fit and competent to be appointed guardian. The testimony of his witnesses at most merely raised a conflict in the evidence on this question. It was said in Guardianship of Imperatrice, supra:

"When resolving the question of the guardianship of children, the court is controlled by what appears to be for their best interest. * * * This rule requires no citation of authority."

Assuming for the purposes of this discussion that a father's right to the custody of his child revives upon the death of the mother, who had been awarded the custody under a decree of divorce, yet it must be shown that the minor's interest will be conserved by recognizing the father's right. Estate of White, 1 Coffey's Probate Decisions Ann. 128. In our opinion the evidence is amply sufficient to support the finding that appellant is "not a fit or competent person to have the custody of the child."

3. We shall now consider appellant's claim "that there was no evidence that the minor was deserted or abandoned by its father." Estate of White, supra, lays down the rule that—

"Where a husband deserts his wife, who is left to care and provide for their infant child, this will be considered as an abandonment of the child, upon the father's application for guardianship after the mother's death."

[4] It appears that prior to his divorce appellant frequently left his wife and child for extended periods, without indicating where he could be found; that he habitually neglected and ignored the child; and that since the divorce he has done nothing for the child, except to make the payments for its support in accordance with the decree of divorce. We think this evidence was clearly sufficient to sustain the finding of abandonment. The fact that he complied with the decree is not sufficient to overcome the finding that he abandoned the child.

On the point of abandonment appellant cites Guardianship of Snowball, 156 Cal. 240, 104 Pac. 444. In that case, however, it appears that the mother, seeking the guardianship as against the children's aunt, had not been divorced from their deceased father. The court said:

"At most there was only an offer to prove temporary absences, accompanied by statements which do not in any way evidence an intent to surrender parental rights."

The case is plainly distinguishable from the one at bar on the facts.

[5] 4. We now turn to a discussion of appellant's contention that—

"In the absence of evidence showing that the minor was a resident or inhabitant of the county of Sonoma, * * * the court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the petition."

Section 1747 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which this proceeding was instituted, provides:

"The superior court of each county * * * may appoint guardians for the persons * * * of minors * * * who are inhabitants or residents of the county."

Guardianship of Vance, supra, is authority for the general rule that—

" 'The residence of the father during his life * * * is the residence of the unmarried minor child.' Pol. Code, sec. 52, subd. 4. But this rule does not apply when the child is under the age of 14 years and has been abandoned by the father. In such case he forfeits the guardianship of the child, and can no longer claim its custody."

And in 19 Corpus Juris, at page 412:

"Abandonment by the father prevents the domicile of the child from following that of the father."

See, also, People v. Dewey, 23 Misc. Rep. 267, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1013. We quote from Cannon's Estate, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 312:

"Residence is a matter of intention, and a minor * * * cannot form such intention for himself." His residence, "if the parents be dead," is where he "is removed by those who intend to give" him "a permanent home elsewhere."

Although in the instant case only one of the parents is dead, yet, since the surviving parent has, by abandonment, forfeited his right to the care and custody of the child, the rule last quoted will apply. It appears that respondent and his wife have brought the minor into their home in Sonoma county with the intention of educating and caring for her as their own child. It is clear that the residence of the minor was in Sonoma county within the meaning of the jurisdictional requirement of section 246 of the Civil Code and section 1747 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. Habeas corpus ⟸27—Will not lie after conviction except for want of jurisdiction.

Habeas corpus does not lie after judgment of conviction of a crime for any cause except want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered the judgment.

2. Infants ⟸16—Special findings not necessary in juvenile court proceedings.

Special findings in proceedings before the juvenile court are not necessary.

3. Habeas corpus ⟸3—After conviction irregularities and jurisdiction cannot be raised where not objected to below.

Where one charged with murder was taken before the superior court sitting as a juvenile court, which declined jurisdiction, whereupon he was convicted in the superior court, objections to irregularities or to the jurisdiction of the superior court after filing of information could only be raised by presenting them to the superior court, and they cannot be raised by proceeding in habeas corpus after conviction.

In Bank.

Application by Roy Wolff for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to James A. Johnstone, Warden of San Quentin Penitentiary. Writ denied.

Jackson Mahon and W. W. Laidley, of Bakersfield, C. F. Tramutolo, of San Francisco, and Iverson L. Harris, of San Diego, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] Habeas corpus does not lie after judgment of conviction of a crime for any cause except want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered the judgment.

The claim of petitioner is that there was a want of jurisdiction in the superior court of Kern county to render the judgment of conviction, because, after the justice of the peace had found the defendant to be under 18 years of age and had certified the case to the superior court for proceedings in its capacity as juvenile court, and in pursuance of said court's directions a complaint had been filed by the probation officer against the defendant, the said superior court, in its capacity as juvenile court, proceeded to determine that the defendant was "not a fit subject for further consideration under the terms of the juvenile court law," without making any findings of fact on that subject, or taking any evidence on the hearing tending to show said fact so determined, and without making any order setting the case down for a hearing for that purpose.

[2] The record shows that the proceedings in the juvenile court were in all respects regular, and that evidence was taken showing the defendant's character and the nature of his crime; that this was done in his presence; and that he was represented by able counsel. There is no ground for the claim that the proceedings were irregular or that there was anything unfair therein to the defendant. A very brief statement of the facts would suffice to show that it was not a fit case for the juvenile court. Special findings in such a proceeding were not necessary, nor was the court required to set some other day for the hearing.

It should be added that the objections above mentioned can have no possible bearing on the merits of the charge of murder of which the defendant was found guilty. It was not the purpose of the juvenile court law to lay the foundation for additional technical objections to be resorted to after conviction in an effort to free the defendant by means of a writ of habeas corpus.

[3] We add further that, even if there were irregularities or defects in the proceedings under the juvenile court law, the defendant, if he wished to take advantage thereof, or to object to the jurisdiction of the superior court after the information against him is filed, could do so only by presenting his objections in the superior court, and he cannot raise the objections by a proceeding in habeas corpus after conviction.

The application for the writ is denied.

WALLING v. WILLIAMS. (L. A. 6078.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1920.)

1. Venue ⊂⊃66—Affidavit of merits on motion for change of venue held insufficient to show that advice was that of attorney.

An affidavit of merits on a motion for change of venue, stating that affiant had submitted the facts to her attorney, and that "after such statement of facts she was advised that she had a good and substantial and meritorious defense to said action on its merits, and so verily believes," held insufficient, as failing to specifically aver that the advice she received was from her attorney.

2. Evidence ⊂⊃43(1)—Judicial notice not taken that damages claimed are excessive, etc.

On motion for change of venue, judicial notice will not be taken of the fact that the amount of damages claimed is greater than is likely to be allowed by a jury, or that defendant will put in issue the amount of the damages claimed, so as to justify an affidavit of merits.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Elisa S. Walling against Mary L. Williams. From an order denying a motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Hughes, of Los Angeles, and Wm. Evans, of San Francisco (Ernest Pagnuelo, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

H. A. Massey, of Los Angeles (Albert H. Elliott, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's application for a change of venue to the county of her residence, in a suit to recover $20,000 damages for the abduction of plaintiff's former husband from her. The motion was denied because of the insufficiency of the defendant's affidavit of merits for the reason that it failed to show the defendant was advised by her attorney that she had a good defense.

[1] After stating that she submitted the facts of the case to her attorney, it is averred by the affiant that—

"After such statement of facts she was advised that she had a good and substantial and meritorious defense to said action upon its merits, and so verily believes."

The affidavit failed to specifically aver that the advice she received was from her attorney. It may have been given by some one else. Hence the affidavit failed in an essential particular as an affidavit of merits. Jensen v. Dorr, 9 Cal. App. 19, 98 Pac. 45. However, in view of the nature of this case, and the fact that the amount of damages claimed is plaintiff's arbitrary estimate thereof, and that a defendant, even though guilty of the wrong complained of, never fails to put in issue the amount of damages, and usually succeeds upon the trial in very substantially reducing the amount claimed, we very reluctantly reach the conclusion that the affidavit was insufficient. If the defendant intended to put in issue the amount of damages, she was justified in making an affidavit of merits.

"An affidavit for such purpose is sufficient. if it states he has a good defense to the action on the merits as he is advised by his counsel, without specifying the nature or extent of the defense. A defendant may safely swear when sued for one hundred dollars, he being indebted only $50, or any sum less than the amount claimed, that he has a good defense to such an action on the merits." Hurd v. Burr et al., 22 Ill. 29.

[2] We cannot take judicial notice of the fact that the amount of damages claimed is greater than is likely to be allowed by a jury, or that the defendant will put in issue the amount of damages claimed. In view of the extremely technical character of the objection to the affidavit, we have no doubt that the trial court, if application had been made therefor, would have permitted an amendment of the affidavit, as it was authorized to do. Palmer & Rey Co. v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199, 28 Pac. 226. But the defendant chose to stand on the affidavit presented, and in the absence of any application to the trial court for leave to amend, that court was not called upon to exercise its discretion in favor of the defendant.

Order affirmed.

In re HESS' ESTATE.

HESS v. YOUNG.

1. Trial ⟸194(5)—Trial judge cannot charge jury as to value of expert testimony.

An instruction on testamentary capacity that expert testimony was unsatisfactory and unreliable, with reasons therefor, and that experts' opinions were often opposed to each other, was improper, being in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting judges charging juries as to matters of fact.

2. Trial ⟸296(8)—Instruction on weight of expert testimony not cured by instructions to weigh it.

An instruction in a will contest that the expert testimony on testamentary capacity was unsatisfactory, entitled to less weight than facts, and calculated to impress the jury that the court regarded it as of little weight, was not cured by instructions making it clear that the jury was to weigh such testimony.

3. Wills ⟸55(1)—Evidence held not to show testamentary incapacity.

Evidence as to decedent's lifelong dislike of her sister, the contestant, and of decedent's nervous trouble after an attack of la grippe, and of hallucinations, seeing black objects, and consulting fortune tellers for real or fancied ailments, being subject to insomnia, taking sleeping powders, etc., held not to show want of testamentary capacity.

4. Evidence ⟸317(3) — Physician's opinion held incompetent as hearsay.

Witness' testimony as to the opinion of a physician concerning the effect of a lump at the base of testatrix's brain was hearsay and incompetent.

5. Wills ⟸384—Instructions on expert testimony held harmless.

On the contest of a will for want of testamentary capacity, where the evidence is such that a verdict for the contestant appealing from the probate would not have been supported, no prejudice resulted from proponent's erroneous instruction as to expert testimony.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1058(2)—Rejection of evidence subsequently admitted not prejudicial.

Appellant was not prejudiced by the sustaining of an objection to a question which was subsequently answered by the witness and such answer not stricken.

7. Appeal and error ⟸237(2)—Appellant cannot complain of testimony, where no motion to strike was made.

Where a witness was asked for an opinion and answered, and opposing counsel objected, and the court said, "Yes, that is for the jury to determine," appellant cannot complain of such ruling, where no motion was made to strike the answer.

8. Wills ⟸384—Exclusion of testimony as to testamentary capacity held not prejudicial.

In a will contest for want of testamentary capacity, the exclusion of a physician's statements as to whether there were any grounds for testatrix's fear of contestant was not prejudicial, where the witness had already testified that he told testatrix there were no grounds for her fears.

9. Wills ⟸53(1)—Evidence of source of property disposed of inadmissible on issue of testamentary capacity.

In a contest of a will for want of testamentary capacity, it was not error to exclude the will of the father of contestant, the half-sister of testatrix, to show the source of testatrix's property, as establishing equities between the sisters.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

George C. Young produced the will of Sophie Hess, also known as Sophie Wright, for probate, and Gertrude Hess Voyer contested the will, and from an order admitting it to probate and appointing the proponent as executor, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Doyle, of Petaluma, and R. L. Thompson, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma, and T. J. Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the contestant, Gertrude Hess Voyer, from an order admitting to probate the will of Sophie Hess, otherwise known as Sophie Wright, deceased, and appointing as executor the proponent of the will, George C. Young.

Appellant is the half-sister of the decedent, being the issue of the mother's second marriage. The decedent was a spinster, 52 years of age at the time of her death on May 25, 1918. She left surviving her no issue, parents, brothers, or sisters, other than appellant. Appellant contests the will on two grounds: (1) That the decedent "was not of sound mind and memory, and, by reason of protracted sickness and imbecility of mind and want of understanding, was mentally incapacited from making a will"; and (2) that the will was not properly executed. The case was tried by a jury, and the verdict was that the decedent was of sound mind on June 19, 1917, the date of the execution of the will. By stipulation at the trial, "the issues as to the execution of the will" were withdrawn from the jury and submitted to the court for determination.

It appears that decedent and appellant grew up together in the same household with their mother and the father of appellant. The latter testified that from their early infancy decedent manifested an intense dislike toward her; that when the decedent was about 25 or 26 years old she had an attack of la grippe, and from that time until her death from cancer became increasingly "nervous and peculiar"; that toward the end of her life decedent was addicted to the use of sleeping powders and became very superstitious; and that her dislike for appellant was without any foundation whatever. The witness admitted, however, that she had been jealous because of the mother's love for the decedent. She further testified that the mother was capable of managing the household until 1905, when she suffered a stroke of paralysis; that the family consisted of herself, decedent, their mother and the father of appellant, "After his death it consisted of my mother, my sister, and myself"; that a Dr. Serene, who attended the decedent in infancy, had expressed the opinion that she had an "enlargement" at the base of her brain, and that unless it was removed it would cause decedent "to lose her mind and die"; that after the mother's stroke of paralysis in 1905 decedent took care of her, and would not allow appellant any opportunity to speak with the mother; that decedent had struck the witness on many occasions; that decedent and the mother had frequently complained to her "that the people I kept company with were not good enough for me"; that decedent had told her "she hated me so much she could hardly look at me"; that she (the witness) and decedent had differed as to the settlement of her mother's estate and the disposition of her property; and that after decedent moved to San Francisco in 1917 the witness made an attempt to become reconciled with her.

Appellant called a number of witnesses in support of the contest. Dr. Kurt Urban testified that he had attended appellant in childhood; that appellant was then "rather nervous, depressed mentally, and subject to insomnia"; that he had expressed the opinion to decedent that appellant should be operated upon; that decedent replied that, "on account of Gertrude's peculiar mental condition, she was in fear of Gertrude's doing some bodily harm to her or their mother"; and that he had told decedent her fears were groundless. Mrs. Emma Harris McMullin testified that on one occasion, when she visited decedent in San Francisco, "her eyes had a vacant stare, and I was a little afraid of her." Mrs. Ivy Osborne testified that she had been employed as a night nurse for the mother in 1905; that decedent was "of a nervous temperament; in some ways she was peculiar"; but that she had not noticed any "vacant stare."

Mrs. Ella Mego testified that "Sophie and her mother agreed that they would cut Gertrude off with a dollar if she dared to have any company with any young man." Mrs. Ella Cameron declared that she had first known the decedent in 1893; that "there was quite a lump at the base of her brain"; and that Dr. Serene had said if this lump were not removed she would "lose her mind and die." Mrs. Louise Huegle testified that she thought decedent had taken sleeping powders, and Mrs. Lena Kalish stated that decedent had told her she could not sleep without taking them. Miss Sarah Frances Cassiday testified that as a young girl the decedent "was rather peculiar, both in dress and manner."

Mrs. Catherine Jane Emerson stated that after decedent's attack of la grippe she "became more nervous, * * * was rather irritable, and complained she could not sleep. * * * I don't think she ever quit taking sleeping powders. * * * Sophie saw black objects and heard rappings about the house. She had signs for everything. * * * She believed in fortune telling, and consulted them for her ailments. * * * A spider came down from the ceiling on his web and hung between us, and * * * Sophie said, 'I am so glad because that lady didn't take the house, for see the spider.' * * * I would say she was irrational because I don't see how anybody could dislike a sister as much as she disliked Gertrude." Mrs. Lodia M. Dole testified to decedent's nervousness and sleeplessness after her attack of la grippe and her antipathy toward appellant, and corroborated Mrs. Emerson's testimony. Carl Schuler declared that "the reputation about the neighborhood was that Sophie was very mean to Gertrude," and that on one occasion appellant had come to his house bearing evidences of a blow which she asserted had been struck by the decedent.

Each of these witnesses testified that decedent had always entertained a violent dislike for appellant. Miss Agnes Morrison, who was the nurse attending decedent during her last illness, testified that, while decedent had told her she and appellant were "not on friendly terms," the witness had never administered to her any sleeping powders, and that in her opinion decedent's mind was sound. Appellant's counsel put to Dr. Butler, medical superintendent of the California Home for Feeble-Minded Patients, who was not personally acquainted with the decedent, an elaborate hypothetical question, based upon the "peculiarities" which previous witnesses had testified the decedent manifested, and his answer was, "I should say she was irrational, * * * of unsound mind."

On the other hand, numerous witnesses for respondent, one of whom, Dr. David Domb, was the physician who attended decedent in her last illness, testified that, while decedent was of a nervous temperament and had stated on many occasions that she thought appellant was "after her money," appellant had cordially reciprocated any "attitude of dislike" which the decedent had maintained toward her; and that decedent had uniformly conducted her affairs with a high degree of business acumen. Dr. Domb testified that in his opinion decedent was of sound mind.

[1] Appellant assigns numerous errors in the giving of instructions as ground for reversal. The first of these assignments is that "instruction 23, requested by proponent, on the weight and value of expert evidence, was erroneous." That instruction reads:

"Medical witnesses have been examined in this contest, and, so far as their testimony is dependent upon hypothetical questions, the court instructs you that: The testimony of experts is frequently unsatisfactory and many times unreliable. It is unsatisfactory because it cannot convey to our minds the precise reasons why the conclusions are reached; and it is unreliable because it is frequently based upon speculations instead of facts. Experts in the exact sciences and in mechanics, who base their opinions upon the laws of nature of the exact sciences, and their own experience with those laws, have tangible facts before them; but where the opinions are based upon speculation, where the subject of the inquiry, namely, the operation and condition of the human mind, is beyond the possibility of human knowledge, we should receive those opinions as at least uncertain. So, when we see a person perform such and such an act, we can form an opinion whether the act is rational or irrational, whether it is consistent with the standard or average human intelligence and reasonableness, but when we advance to speculation upon what would or would not follow upon some supposed existence of mental conditions, we go beyond the scope of knowledge and tread upon the realms of imagination or conjecture. You are instructed, therefore, that, while we receive and you will take into consideration the opinions of experts, such opinions are not entitled to as much weight as facts, especially where there is a conflict between an opinion and a fact. When a fact is established, it is a fact and cannot be overcome, while an opinion is but an opinion, and it may be true and it may be untrue. Opinions of different experts are often diametrically opposed to each other, even when based upon the same supposed conditions."

This instruction is in the identical language of one held to be prejudicially erroneous in Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827 (89 Am. St. Rep. 135), and on account of which the judgment admitting the will to probate was reversed. The court said:

"The testimony of the experts was competent, and went to the very gist of the claim made by contestants. By the instruction the court so discredited it as to practically destroy it. The jury could not but see that the judge had a very poor opinion of testimony of this character. The jury were told that it was unsatisfactory, and the reason why it was so. They were further told that it was unreliable, and the reason why it was so. Not only this, but, to make assurance doubly sure, they were told that opinions of experts are not entitled to as much weight as facts, and that such opinions, based upon the same supposed conditions, are often diametrically opposed to each other. While the opinion of the judge may have reasons to support it, it was not proper for him to give his opinion to the jury. Neither was it proper for him to give the jury, in the instruction, an argument as to the reasons why such evidence in his opinion was unreliable and unsatisfactory. The judge may have been of the opinion that the common-law rule, by which the parties in interest were not competent witnesses, is the better rule. Suppose such to have been his opinion, and he had told the jury that the parties had testified, and then told them further that the testimony of parties is unreliable and unsatisfactory because experience has proven that in many cases parties will not tell the truth against their interests. Would any one doubt that such an instruction would be error? The judge, if allowed to express his opinion as to one class of evidence, would be allowed to do so as to others, and we would have some evidence discredited in every case, depending upon the particular views and prejudices of the judge presiding. * * * The judge, under our system, is not allowed to charge juries as to the facts, but may state the testimony and declare the law. There is no law which declares that the testimony of experts is unsatisfactory and unreliable."

See, also, Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 714, 82 Pac. 310; People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; People v. Hadley, 175 Cal. 119, 123, 165 Pac. 442. It is not to be questioned that such an instruction involves a violation of section 19, article 6, of the Constitution, that judges shall not charge juries as to matters of fact.

[2] Respondent's first contention is that—

"This instruction, taken apart and separate from the remainder, * * * might be subject to criticism, but, even if it was conceded that this instruction was not a perfect statement of the law, * * * yet it is submitted that, considering the failure of contestant to establish her case, error * * * would not, under the circumstances of this case, justify a reversal."

In this connection we shall first consider respondent's claim that, in the light of other instructions, there was no error. The other instructions referred to are numbers 29, 40, and 41, given at the request of appellant. It is claimed that "they gave the jury a fair statement of the law applicable to expert testimony." But they do not cover the point involved. No. 29 is to the effect that the opinions of experts, though proper to be considered "and entitled to have at your hands all the weight which reasonably and justly belongs to them, are nevertheless not binding on you against your judgment." No. 40, after dealing with the qualifications of experts, continues that in arriving at a conclusion the jurors "may take into consideration their testimony, and award to it such value as in your judgment it deserves." No. 41 correctly defines a hypothetical question, and charges that—

"The opinion of the witness must therefore be brought to the test of the facts in order that you may judge what weight the opinion is entitled to."

It is not contended that these instructions do not correctly state the law touching expert testimony as far as they assume to deal with it. But, while the instructions make it clear that the jury is to weigh such testimony, in no manner did they tend to cure the vice in the one complained of.

[3] We shall next consider respondent's contention that—

"The testimony on the part of contestant * * * did not show * * * mental incapacity on the part of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will. * * * For this reason if any error had been committed by the court in its instructions, * * * it would be harmless and unprejudicial error, on which a judgment cannot be reversed."

It was said in Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 419, 29 Pac. 1101, 1105:

"People may hate their relatives for bad reasons, and yet not be deprived of testamentary power."

And in Estate of Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 Pac. 453, the court declared:

"The likes and dislikes of human beings—their confidences and mistrusts—are often capricious and arbitrary; but they are not evidences of insanity because they cannot be logically defended to the satisfaction of those who think them wrong. * * * 'The right of a testator to dispose of his estate depends neither on the justice of his prejudices nor the soundness of his reasoning. He may do what he will with his own; and if there be no defect of testamentary capacity, and no undue influence or fraud, the law gives effect to his will, though its provisions are unreasonable and unjust.' Jackson v. Jackson, 39 N. Y. 157."

See, also, Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605; Estate of Riordan, 13 Cal. App. 313, 109 Pac. 629; Estate of Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 295, 49 Pac. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179. We quote from Estate of Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 652, 48 Pac. 794, 798:

"Before a will can be rejected on that account [that the testator was subject to insane delusions] it must appear that 'its dispository provisions were or might have been caused or affected by the delusion' (Amer., etc., Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 624); delusions which are not operative in the testamentary act * * * are not permitted to invalidate it."

And the court held in Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 168, 113 Pac. 130, 133, that insanity which will invalidate a will "must be an insanity of one of two forms, either insanity of such broad character as to establish mental incompetency generally, or some specific and narrower form of insanity, under which the testator is the victim of some hallucination or delusion. And, even in the latter class of cases, it would not be sufficient merely to establish that a testator was the victim of some hallucination or delusion to avoid the will. The evidence must go further, and establish that the will itself was the creature or product of such hallucination or delusion, or, in other words, that the hallucination or delusion bore directly upon and influenced the creation and terms of the testamentary instrument." See, also, Estate of Kendrick, supra; Estate of Guilbert, 188 Pac. 807; Maynard v. Tyler, 168 Mass. 107, 46 N. E. 413.

[4] Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to appellant, it appears that decedent entertained a lifelong dislike for her; that after decedent's attack of la grippe she grew more nervous and irritable; that she was subject to hallucinations, such as seeing "black objects," and consulted fortune tellers for her real or fancied ailments; and that she was subject to insomnia and took sleeping powders. In view of the foregoing authorities we cannot agree with appellant that the evidence shows a want of testamentary capacity on the part of decedent. Decedent's dislike for appellant would not constitute unsoundness of mind. It may have been caused by the jealousy which appellant admitted she harbored toward decedent because the mother, as she thought, favored her, or have had its origin in the belief that, as the mother complained, appellant's associates were unsuitable for her. It appears from Dr. Urban's testimony that, to some extent at least, decedent's fears of appellant were based upon the latter's depressed mental condition. And decedent's dislike for appellant may have been heightened by the difference between them over their mother's estate. Mrs. McMullin's testimony that she had noticed a "vacant stare" in decedent's eyes is not indicative of any delusion, or, if it is, that such delusion constituted unsoundness of mind which influenced the making of the will. This must also be said of the testimony of Mrs. Kalish and Mrs. Huegle. Mrs. Cameron's testimony as to Dr. Serene's opinion of the effect of the "lump" at the base of decedent's brain does not show a lack of testamentary capacity at the time of the making of the will, for it does not appear that decedent suffered from this trouble in her later years. Moreover, it was hearsay and incompetent.

Mrs. Mego's testimony only tends to confirm the existence of decedent's profound antipathy toward appellant. The peculiar notions of dress and the mannerisms referred to by Miss Cassiday at most amounted to idiosyncrasies which would not constitute delusions. The hallucinations and superstitions to which Mrs. Emerson and Mrs. Dole testified are not uncommonly entertained by people whose soundness of mind is not questioned, and certainly there was not a shred of evidence to show that any of these peculiarities, hallucinations, or beliefs affected the provisions of the will. Moreover it is not questioned that decedent conducted her affairs with intelligence and shrewdness. Indeed, no claim is made that there was not sufficient evidence before the jury to warrant the finding of testamentary capacity.

We quote from Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 Pac. 1110, as to the hypothetical testimony of Dr. Butler:

"At best, the testimony of expert witnesses to insanity, based on hypothetical questions skillfully framed to call for an answer favorable to the party in whose behalf it is asked, 'is evidence the weakest and most unsatisfactory.' Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 243."

See, also, Estate of Flint, 179 Cal. 552, 177 Pac. 451. Dr. Butler stated in support of his opinion:

"The facts * * * which I consider essential to justify my conclusions are those delusions. By delusions I mean the delusions there of this figure, for instance, of the other delusions, seeing spiders, also the idea of her sister going to kill herself and her mother. Persecutions. By delusions I mean something that is not natural; have an opinion about something that is not real; saying or thinking something that is not real."

But it was for the jury to decide whether it had been established by appellant's witnesses that decedent was subject to any delusions. Moreover, the hypothetical question put to Dr. Butler did not fix any particular time when it was claimed decedent had delusions.

[5] From this analysis of the evidence received it is plain that if a verdict had been rendered in favor of appellant it could not have been supported. If this be true, then no prejudice resulted from the giving of the erroneous instruction.

[6] But appellant contends that certain rulings on evidence "were of such a character as to seriously prejudice the presentation of contestant's case." Mrs. Lena Krone, who had known both decedent and appellant "as a little girl," was asked by counsel for appellant, "From your observation and knowledge of Sophie and Gertrude Hess, did you consider that Sophie's hatred of her sister was rational or irrational?" Counsel for respondent interposed the objection that the question was "immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent," and the objection was sustained. It appears, however, that the witness was later asked the same question, no objection was made, and the question was answered. This answer was not stricken out. It cannot be said that appellant was prejudiced by the ruling.

[7] Appellant also assigns error to the ruling which appears in the following excerpt from the testimony of Mrs. Dole:

"Q. Basing your judgment on what you have told us and all that you know in regard to Sophie, would you say that her mind, particularly with regard to her sister Gertrude, was rational or irrational? A. She was absolutely irrational.

"Mr. Geary (counsel for respondent): To that question we object as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. * * *

"The Court: Yes, that is for the jury to determine."

Appellant cannot complain of any error in this ruling, because the question was answered, and no motion was made to strike out the answer.

[8] It is further contended by appellant that the court erred in sustaining respondent's objection to a question which was put to Dr. Urban after he had testified that decedent expressed to him a fear that appellant would do her "some bodily harm":

"Now, was there any danger that Gertrude would do anything in the nature that Sophie feared? Did you see any ground for that fear?"

This witness had already testified that he told decedent there were no grounds for her fear. Assuming that the inquiry was proper, upon the entire record we do not perceive how the ruling could have been prejudicial.

[9] Appellant's next assignment of error is to the ruling of the court in excluding a copy of the will of appellant's father, Frederick Hess. Her contention is that this was admissible as tending to show "the source of the property" disposed of by the will herein, "as establishing the equities between the sisters." In other words, appellant's position is that, inasmuch as Frederick Hess was not the father of decedent, his will, by which it is claimed "he treated the two girls alike," gave appellant a claim "on her sister's bounty." With this we do not agree. Any possible effect of this evidence was so nebulous that it could have no bearing on the issues. Estate of Ruffino, 116 Cal. 304, 48 Pac. 127, cited by appellant on this point, was a case where it was held that, "upon the question of undue influence," evidence was admissible of the source from which the decedent acquired the property disposed of in the will. In this case the question is one of testamentary capacity.

Even if all the rejected evidence had been admitted, there would still be a failure by appellant to show that decedent was mentally unsound at the date of the execution of the will. In this view it will not be necessary to consider appellant's assignments of error in the giving of various other instructions or respondent's contention that Estate of Blake, having been decided prior to the adoption of section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, is not authority for the reversal of the judgment herein because of the giving of instruction 23.

The judgment is affirmed.

183 Cal. 434

MORDECAI et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF MADERA COUNTY et al.

1. Statutes ⟸73(2)—Irrigation Act invalid as violating provisions as to uniformity.

The Irrigation Act of 1919 which supplanted Act June 4, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1173), as amended by St. 1917, p. 1068, and like it provides that nothing in the act shall affect or apply to any irrigation district, etc., situated wholly or in part within any county which has adopted a charter pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, prior to June 4, 1915, is invalid, being in violation of article 1, § 11, declaring that all general laws shall have uniform operation, for the act is general, and the exception could apply to only two counties which had adopted a charter prior to the act of 1915, this being so in view of the fact that the constitutional provision must be construed with article 1, § 21, prohibiting the grant of special privileges.

2. Statutes ⟸71—Irrigation laws are subject to provision requiring uniformity.

Const. art. 11, § 13, declaring that the Legislature shall have power to provide for the supervision, regulation, and conduct in such manner as it may determine, of irrigation reclamation districts, does not authorize, the Legislature in enacting irrigation laws to violate article 1, § 11, requiring general laws to have a uniform operation, and so Irrigation Act of 1919, which violates that section, cannot, on that ground, be upheld.

3. Statutes ⟸64(1)—Where separable invalid portions will not defeat the whole act.

That an act does not operate uniformly in some respect does not necessarily render it entirely void, and if those provisions are reasonably separable from the balance of the act, and the purpose of the Legislature will be subserved even with them gone, the balance will stand.

4. Statutes ⟸64(2)—Exemption of Irrigation Act from counties which had adopted charter renders entire act invalid.

Irrigation Act of 1919, providing that it shall not apply to irrigation projects in counties which have adopted a charter pursuant to Const. art. 11, § 7½, etc., is invalid as a whole because the provision which destroyed uniformity of operation could not be separated from the remainder of the act.

Application by George W. Mordecai and others for a writ of review to annul the order of Board of Supervisors of the County of Madera and others, forming an irrigation district. Writ denied.

James H. Farraher, for certain protestants.

OLNEY, J. This is a petition for a writ of review annulling an order of the respondent board of supervisors of Madera county. The petitioners are owners of land in that county, and it seems that on October 31, 1919, they filed with the state irrigation board, the administrative board created by the so-called California Irrigation District Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 671), an application for the formation of an irrigation district under that act. Subsequent to the filing of this application, and while it was pending, the owners of other lands in Madera county presented to the board of supervisors of the county a petition for the formation of an irrigation district under the so-called Wright-Bridgeford Act (St. 1897, p. 254), an act which has been in force for years, and under which, and under the Wright Act (St. 1887, p. 29) which preceded it, most, if not all, of the irrigation districts of this state have heretofore been organized. The district whose formation was so sought included the lands of the petitioners here, and they appeared before the board of supervisors and represented that the state irrigation board had previously acquired jurisdiction of the matter of organizing a district, including their lands, and that the proceedings before that board were still pending, and requested that their lands be excluded from the district sought to be organized by the board of supervisors. The supervisors denied this request, and made an order approving the formation of a district, including the petitioners' lands. It is this order which it is sought to have annulled by the present proceeding.

The ground upon which its annulment is sought is that the state irrigation board, having acquired jurisdiction of the lands of the petitioners for the purpose of including them in an irrigation district, the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction of them for the purpose of including them in another district of the same character. The respondents contend by demurrer to the petition: First, that it is not true that the supervisors were without jurisdiction because of the previous application to the state irrigation board; and, second, that in any case the California Irrigation Act, under which the prior application was made, is unconstitutional and void. It is plain that if the second contention is correct there is no need for considering the first. Likewise, while it is contended that the act is unconstitutional in a number of different respects, if it is unconstitutional in one, and that of such character as to vitiate the provisions of the act applicable to the organization of irrigation districts, it is plain there is no need for considering any other respect in which the act may possibly be invalid. There is one respect of this character in which we believe the act is unconstitutional, and our discussion therefore will be limited to it.

The California Irrigation Act was originally passed on June 4, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1173; Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 1732i). It was much amplified by amendment in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1068), and in 1919 was repealed, and a new act, substantially the same as the amended act of 1917, adopted in its place (Stats. 1919, p. 671; Deering's Consol. Supp. for 1917–19, Act 1732m). The prime purpose of the act is apparently to provide adequate machinery for undertaking irrigation works of a magnitude too great to permit of their being undertaken by the ordinary irrigation district. The act of 1915 provided for the formation of so-called water districts, and for the transformation of existing irrigation districts into water districts. The function of the water districts were to be practically those of irrigation districts. The amended act of 1917 and the act of 1919 provide for the formation of irrigation districts as such, and the transformation of districts existing under other laws into districts existing under the act. It also provides for the formation of consolidated districts called conservation districts, made up of irrigation, reclamation, or drainage districts as units. Wide powers are conferred upon the irrigation board and upon the districts within their jurisdiction, looking to the conservation, storage, and drainage of water and to its beneficial use. The purpose and scope of the act, as the foregoing statement shows, are general. Its express terms are likewise general, with one exception. The last section of the act of 1915 (section 17) provided:

"Nothing in this act contained shall affect, or apply to, any irrigation, protection, flood control, conservation, or other improvement district wholly or in part within any county which has adopted a charter pursuant to section seven and one-half of article eleven of the Constitution of California, ratified and approved as provided therein, or within any city and county; and said board shall have no power of jurisdiction within any of said districts or within such counties or city and county."

Section 19 of the amended act of 1917 and of the new act of 1919 read:

"Nothing in this act contained shall affect, or apply to, any irrigation, protection, flood control, conservation, or other improvement district situated wholly or in part within any county which has adopted a charter pursuant to section seven and one-half of article eleven of the constitution of California, ratified and approved as provided therein, prior to June 4, 1915, or within any city and county; and said board shall have no power of jurisdiction within any of said districts or within such counties or city and county."

[1] The contention of the respondents is that the law is general in its nature, and that by reason of the exception so made in its operation it violates the mandatory provision of our state Constitution (section 11 of article 1) that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." It cannot be and is not questioned that the act is general in nature. The only question therefore is as to its uniformity of operation.

The meaning and effect of the provision of our Constitution requiring uniformity of operation on the part of general laws have been before our courts on numerous occasions, and the general rule applicable is too plain and too well established to require or to justify a discussion of the authorities. The many times reiterated statement of our decisions is that, while the requirement that a general law must have a uniform application does not mean that it must have a universal operation, and it is valid if it applies alike to all persons or objects within a class—or, what is the same thing, there is excepted from its operation a class—founded upon some "natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction," yet if the statute operates only upon a class, or there is excepted from its operation a class, not founded upon a "natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction," its operation is not uniform, and it is discriminatory legislation of the sort which the Constitution purposed to prohibit and is invalid. See Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 698, 124 Pac. 427, and cases there cited.

Now it is somewhat difficult to see how any such distinction in the applicability of an act of the scope and purpose of that under consideration could rationally be made, as the act of 1915 made, between lands, waters, and districts within counties not having a charter form of government and those within counties that do, or why, in reason, the state irrigation board should have jurisdiction to function in one class of counties and not in the other. While the Constitution itself provides that counties may adopt charters for their government, and a constitutional distinction is thus made between such counties and others, the distinction is one that apparently has no relation to or bearing upon the applicability of an act of the scope and purpose of the California Irrigation Act and furnishes no reason for making the act applicable in nonchartered counties, but not in chartered counties. Rauer v. Williams, 118 Cal. 401, 50 Pac. 691. It would seem as if it were no more the function of a chartered county than of an unchartered one to provide as a part of the system of county government for the irrigation of private lands within it.

But, however this may be, we think it plain that no valid reason whatever can be assigned for the distinction made by the acts of 1917 and 1919 between counties which had adopted a chartered form of government prior to June 4, 1915, and those which had not. The distinction so made is not merely between chartered and unchartered counties, but between those chartered prior to June 4, 1915, and those that have been chartered since or may be chartered hereafter. There is certainly no such constitutional distinction, and just as certainly there is no such natural or intrinsic distinction. The counties which had adopted charters prior to June 4, 1915, were those of Los Angeles and San Bernardino. The description in the statute of the counties to be excepted from its operation as those chartered prior to June 4, 1915, is in effect but a designation of those two counties, a designation which might just as well have been made by name. The statute then simply sets off these two counties as a special class within whose limits the act does not operate. There can be no natural and intrinsic distinction in such a classification, since very plainly, so far as the objects of this act are concerned, the furtherance of irrigation and the securing of water for that purpose, there is no difference between the two counties excepted and the counties adjoining them, or, for that matter, between the two counties excepted and a great majority at least of the counties of the state.

The matter may be put in another way. It has been frequently and truly said that the purpose of the constitutional mandate was to prevent special privileges or immunities being granted to a class. See Application of Miller, supra. In fact, the provision of the the Constitution for uniformity of operation is closely connected with its further provision (article 1, § 21) expressly prohibiting the granting of special privileges or immunities. Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366, 379. Now, if the California Irrigation Act be considered as a privilege, what reason is there why the inhabitants and property owners of Los Angeles and San Bernardino should not enjoy that privilege when those within other counties may do so? On the other hand, if the act be considered a burden, why should those within those two counties be immune from it when the rest of the state is subject to it?

We can see no sufficient answer to these questions or to the objection involved in them that the exception from the applicability of the act of counties chartered prior to June 4, 1915, destroys the uniform operation of the act. The first answer made by the petitioners is that the date on which the distinction turns, June 4, 1915, is the date of the passage of the original act, and that counties adopting charters subsequent to that date are in a different class from those which had then adopted charters, because their charters would be adopted with the act in view. There might perhaps be a distinction along this line—whether it would be a sufficient one is another question—if the counties adopting charters after the passage of the act could by their charters take themselves without the operation of the act. But they cannot. The act is applicable to them whether they wish it or no, whether their charters so provide or not. What difference it makes under these circumstances that a county adopts its charter after the passage of the act we do not see.

A second answer given by the petitioners is that the Legislature, in granting "immunity" from the act to counties which had adopted charters, did so in deference to the right of self-determination and local self-government. But if this be true, why are not counties chartered after the passage of the act given "immunity" from it as well as those chartered before? Certainly one class is as much entitled to the immunity as the other, and the principle of self-government is as important in the one case as in the other.

A third answer given by the petitioners is based upon the fact that when the act of 1919 repealed the previous act it provided (section 20) that all proceedings initiated under the previous act should not be affected by the repeal, but should proceed under the new act, and that any districts previously organized under the old act should continue under the new. It is argued from this that inextricable confusion would have been caused if the date of the passage of the original act had not been inserted. If any districts had been organized under the original act, its repeal in 1919 might well have caused confusion if provision were not made for their continuance under the new act, but how the date of the passage of the original act could affect the matter we do not see. It is true that districts might have been organized in counties which had subsequently adopted charters, but it was not necessary, in order to preserve such districts and avoid confusion, to except from the operation of the act counties chartered prior to the passage of the original act. The two things have no connection. The exception from the act of counties chartered prior to the passage of the original act, and the preservation in existence of districts organized in counties chartered subsequent to that time, are two distinct things, which have no relation to or bearing upon each other.

[2] A fourth answer by the petitioners is based upon the provisions of section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution "that the Legislature shall have the power to provide for the supervision, regulation, and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state." It is argued, in effect, that this provision empowers the Legislature to pass what laws it sees fit in regard to irrigation districts, untrammeled by the general requirement that laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation. We cannot agree with this. There is nothing to indicate that the power granted the Legislature by this provision was not to be exercised by it subject to the general requirements of the Constitution governing the manner in which the power of legislation when conferred or possessed shall be exercised. The Legislature has the power, as conferred by the provision of the Constitution just quoted, to legislate concerning the affairs of irrigation districts, but that power, like the power of the Legislature to legislate on other subjects, must be exercised in the manner in which the Constitution provides that the power of legislation when it exists must be exercised. Before any grant of power to legislate on a particular subject can be held to be free of a general requirement governing all legislation, the intent of the Constitution to that effect must be plain. No such intent appears in the present instance.

[3, 4] The final contention of the petitioners is that, even though the exception of counties which adopted charters prior to June 4, 1915, is invalid, it is separable from the balance of the act, and may be disregarded, and the act allowed to stand without the exception so made. An express exception, such as that under consideration, is always easily separable from the balance of the statute of which it is a part. It of necessity stands by itself as an exception. If the contention of the petitioners were sound in this case, it would also be sound in a considerable number of other cases similarly involving statutes of a general nature, but which make unauthorized exceptions to the uniformity of their operation. The instances of such statutes are by no means few. But we have been cited to no authority which when examined really supports the petitioners' contention.

If it were possible for the courts without usurping the function of the Legislature merely to hold the obnoxious exception invalid and permit the balance of the act to stand unaffected by it, it should, of course, be done, for the rule that the courts should not hold acts of the Legislature unconstitutional unless they are plainly so extends to their striking down only such portions of a statute as the constitutional mandates or limitations plainly require should be stricken down. But the difficulty in such a case as the present lies in the fact that, accurately speaking, the constitutional objection is not to the exception, in and of itself, which is made to the statute, but is to the general law with the exception in it. The objection is to the lack of uniformity of operation, to a law which, because of an exception which it itself contains, does not operate uniformly.

It is not a case of a defect affecting only a separable provision of the act, which may be stricken out without affecting the balance, but is the case of a defect which affects the whole act to the extent to which it destroys its uniformity of operation. In other words, the situation is simply that the Legislature has not passed a general law which will operate uniformly, as it was required by the Constitution to do. For the courts to eliminate the exception and thus make the statute operate uniformly would be to hold that the Legislature had passed a statute which it had not in fact passed, and would, in effect, be for the courts themselves to legislate. To put it concretely, for the courts to strike out from the California Irrigation Act the exception of the counties of Los Angeles and San Bernardino, for that is what the exception really is, would be for the courts themselves to extend the operation of the act to those counties, although the Legislature has expressly said that they shall not come within its operation.

Upon this point the present case comes directly within the authority of Spraigue v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, 6 Sup. Ct. 988, 30 L. Ed. 115. An action had there been brought to collect pilotage fees due under a section of the Georgia Code prescribing such fees except in certain specified instances within which the defendant did not come. The defendant contended that the section was invalid because discriminatory by reason of the exception. It plainly was discriminatory, but the Supreme Court of Georgia, while so holding, held that the exception might be disregarded, so that the act would stand as if the exception were not there, and gave judgment that the defendant was liable for the fees sought to be recovered. This was reversed on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, the court saying upon the point (118 U. S. 94, 6 Sup. Ct. 989, 30 L. Ed. 115):

"It was held, however, by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in the case now before us, that so much of the section as makes these illegal exceptions may be disregarded, so that the rest of the section as thus read may stand, upon the principle that a separable part of a statute, which is unconstitutional, may be rejected, and the remainder preserved and enforced. But the insuperable difficulty with the application of that principle of construction to the present instance is, that by rejecting the exceptions intended by the Legislature of Georgia the statute is made to enact what confessedly the Legislature never meant. It confers upon the statute a positive operation beyond the legislative intent, and beyond what any one can say it would have enacted in view of the illegality of the exceptions. We are therefore constrained to hold that the provisions of section 1512 of the Code of Georgia cannot be separated so as to reject the unconstitutional exceptions merely, and that the whole section must be treated as annulled and abrogated by section 4237 of the Revised Statutes."

See, also, Lassen County v. Cone, 72 Cal. 387, 14 Pac. 100; Ex parte Bohen, 115 Cal. 372, 47 Pac. 55, 36 L. R. A. 618; Estate of Mahoney, 133 Cal. 180, 65 Pac. 389, 85 Am. St. Rep. 155; Ex parte Sohncke, 148 Cal. 262, 82 Pac. 956, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, 113 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 475; State v. Robinson Co., 84 Wash. 246, 146 Pac. 628.

The language of Estate of Mahoney, just mentioned, is particularly pointed, and, while we are aware that the result reached in that case was overruled in Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532, 73 Pac. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 161, it was overruled upon the theory that the want of a legislative enactment covering the excepted class, a want usually inherent in a general law which contains an exception to its operation, did not exist in the particular case because the want was supplied by a superior legislative enactment, the Constitution of the United States, which operated to extend the state statute over the excepted class regardless of the contrary intent of the state Legislature. In other words, the conclusion reached in Estate of Mahoney was overruled in Estate of Johnson, not because of any question as to the correctness of the principle there laid down, but because it was believed that it was not applicable.

The only authorities which are cited by petitioners as laying down a different rule are Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049, and Application of Mascola, 25 Cal. App. 92, 142 Pac. 903. In the latter of these a statute as to the use of fishing nets applicable by its terms to the sixth game district and to a part of the fifth was attacked as invalid because not operating uniformly throughout the fifth by one who had violated its provisions in the sixth, where it did operate uniformly. The Legislature had the right to make a distinction by game districts, and the court held in effect that the want of uniformity as to the fifth district did not affect the validity of the statute as to the sixth, since as to the latter the defect did not exist, a ruling manifestly correct and not in conflict with the views we have here expressed.

In Hale v. McGettigan, the Legislature had passed a general statute for the organization and government of counties throughout the state. It contained a general section, making the term of office of county officers four years. Tucked away in a subsequent section fixing the compensation of officers of counties of the eighth class was a provision, pretty evidently inserted or left there by inadvertence, which the court construed as a special provision that the term of office of officers of that class of counties should be two years. The court held that this special provision was invalid, but that it did not affect the validity of the balance of the act. The ground on which the decision is placed is that the special provision was wholly analogous to the case of a separate act fixing the term of officers of counties of the eighth class at two years, that such an act would be invalid as special legislation in an instance where that character of legislation is prohibited by section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, a provision distinct from that concerning the uniformity of operation of general laws and by no means having the same effect, and, that, being invalid as special legislation, it would not affect the uniformity of operation of the general law which it purported to modify.

The rule on which the decision so proceeds, that a separate act, which purports to affect the uniformity of operation of a general law, but is invalid for some reason, such as being special legislation, does not affect the general law or its uniform operation, is not open to question. Whether that rule was properly applicable to the case then before the court where the provision as to a particular class of counties different from the provision as to counties in general was not made by a separate act, but as a part of the general law itself, we need not stop to inquire. The rule is plainly not applicable here. If, for example, the California Irrigation Act by its own terms applied to the whole state without exception, and then by a separate but invalid act certain counties were excepted from its operation, the Irrigation Act would still exist as a legislative enactment applicable by its terms exactly as passed by the Legislature to the excepted counties as well as to the balance of the state, and its uniformity of operation would not be affected. But where the Irrigation Act by its own terms omits, as it does, certain counties from its operation, without justification for the distinction so made, then there is no legislative enactment as to those counties, the Legislature has not spoken as to them except to say that the act shall not apply to them, the courts cannot speak for the Legislature and supply such an enactment, and the statute must fail because of a want of uniformity of operation necessarily inherent in it.

There remains to be said but one thing more. It does not necessarily follow that because an act does not operate uniformly in some respect the whole act is void. It is void primarily, so to speak, only in those provisions as to which a want of uniformity of operation exists, and if those provisions are reasonably separable from the balance of the act, and the purpose of the act and the intention of the Legislature will be subserved even with those provisions gone, the balance of the act will stand. In other words, so far as the effect upon the act as a whole is concerned of the invalidity of certain of its provisions which because of some exception to them do not operate uniformly, the principles applicable are those applicable to any case of a part of an act being found to be unconstitutional. But in the present case there can be no doubt as to the effect upon the proceedings initiated by the petitioners for the formation of an irrigation district under the Irrigation Act. One respect in which the act does not operate uniformly because of the exception contained in it is that of organizing irrigation districts. It follows that in this respect at least the act, being a general law, is invalid, with the result that the proceedings taken under it by the petitioners are void, and constitute no legal objection to the inclusion of their lands in a district organized under proceedings subsequently initiated before the board of supervisors. No ground, therefore, appears for annulling the order of the latter organizing such a district.

CABRERA v. THANNHAUSER & CO.

1. Banks and banking ⟸165 — Proceeds of drafts for collection are general not special deposit.

As a general rule, the proceeds of drafts sent to a correspondent for collection become general, not special, deposits, though the correspondent has knowledge of the purpose for which the proceeds were intended to be used.

2. Banks and banking ⟸154(8)—Evidence held not to show intention that proceeds of drafts should be special deposit.

Directions accompanying drafts sent for collection to credit to account as collected at stated intervals, with other evidence, held to show an intention that the proceeds of the drafts should be a general deposit notwithstanding statement they were to cover drafts drawn upon the correspondent payable before those sent for collection were due.

3. Appeal and error ⟸616(1)—Translation of letter subsequent to trial not considered in determining admissibility.

The translation of a letter made by the trial court after the trial which differed from the translation of the letter at the trial and which appeared in the transcript, but was not certified by the official reporter or the judge, cannot be considered on appeal, in the absence of a stipulation to that effect, in determining the admissibility of the letter.

4. Evidence ⟸215(3)—Letter by payee of drafts held not admissible as tending to show want of interest in drafts.

Where the drawee had refused acceptance of drafts because the drawer was responsible for another account which was overdrawn and asked the payee of the drafts to use his offices to secure payment of the overdrawn account, a letter by the payee that he could not intervene in that matter as it was foreign to him is not admissible against him in an action on the draft as an admission that he had no further interest in the drafts.

5. Evidence ⟸455—Course of business between drawer and drawee admissible to show meaning of terms used.

The course of business between the drawer and drawee of drafts in suit, including subsequent dealings as well as those prior to and contemporaneous with the draft transaction, is admissible against the payee of the drafts to show the meaning of the terms used in the correspondence regarding the drafts, especially where the letter accompanying the drafts requested that the drawer be protected as usual.

6. Banks and banking ⟸154(7)—Overdraft admissible to show drafts for collection were general deposit.

In an action by the payee against the drawee of foreign bills of exchange, evidence that, at the time the bills together with drafts on other parties sent for collection were transmitted to the drawee, the drawer's account was overdrawn, is admissible to show that the proceeds of the drafts sent for collection were to be credited generally to the drawer's account not a special deposit for the payment of the bills in suit.

7. Banks and banking ⟸154(7)—Subsequent direction to transfer accounts admissible to show intent that proceeds of drafts were general deposit.

In an action by the payee of drafts against the drawee where plaintiff claimed that the proceeds of other drafts sent by the drawer to the drawee for collection were a special deposit for payment of the drafts in suit, a letter by the drawer subsequent to the transaction, directing the account to which the proceeds of the drafts for collection had been credited to be credited to his general account, is admissible to show that such proceeds were intended to be a general, not a special, deposit.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Manuel Estrada Cabrera against Thannhauser & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Franscisco, for appellant.

Lent & Humphrey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Manuel Estrada Cabrera, and against the defendant, Thannhauser & Co., a corporation, in an action brought upon three foreign bills of exchange. The defendant appeals.

In the year 1906, and for some time prior thereto, appellant was conducting in San Francisco the business of a commission merchant, importer and exporter. During the same period, in the Republic of Guatemala, Triebel & Co. had been conducting a similar business. These two firms were correspondents; appellant purchased and sold merchandise and accepted and paid drafts for Triebel & Co. in San Francisco, and Triebel & Co. performed similar functions for appellant in Guatemala. On the 5th day of September, 1906, Triebel & Co. advised appellant that they had drawn six drafts on appellant in favor of the respondent, who was then president of the Republic of Guatemala, five drafts for $5,000 each, and ine for $3,587, a total of $28,587. By the same letter Triebel & Co. remitted to appellant thirteen drafts on two business concerns in Hamburg, Germany (these last-mentioned drafts are hereinafter referred to as the Hamburg drafts), aggregating $29,012.94. That letter was in the German language and was translated as follows:

"Following up our letter of to-day, we still inform you that we were obliged to pay the government's coffee on the 31st ultimo and consequently drew the following amounts upon you: [Listing the six drafts in favor of respondent] begging you to protect these drafts as usual upon presentation. For the reimbursement of above-mentioned amounts, please find inclosed the following remittances [listing the 13 Hamburg drafts] which please credit. As the President will probably retain the drafts for some time yet, we beg you, as we told you formerly already, to negotiate every week Mk. 10000 of above-mentioned drafts, in order that we can make some more profit on the interests."

In answer to the foregoing, appellant wrote to Triebel & Co. on September 28:

"We wrote you under date of the 21st instant and acknowledged receipt of your favor of the 5th of equal month, contents of which have been duly noted. We have charged to your Coffee Duty account: [Listing respondent's 6 drafts] and beg you to send us a signature of the Licentiate [Attorney] Manuel Estrada Cabrera, without which we cannot pay. * * * From the other Mk. 110,000 remitted to us, we shall, according to your desire, dispose of Mk. 10,000 every week."

On October 30 Triebel & Co. sent to appellant "an old document" bearing respondent's signature.

Commencing on September 22 appellant did dispose of about 10,000 marks per week of the Hamburg drafts. The proceeds thereof were deposited by appellant in its general account in a San Francisco bank, and Triebel & Co.'s Coffee Duty account was credited in the same amounts. Upon each of these occasions Triebel & Co. were notified of the credit to their account, and they replied, stating that appellant's Coffee Duty account had been correspondingly debited. On December 31 appellant sent to Triebel & Co. a statement of the Coffee Duty account for the six months just closing. This statement showed that the proceeds of the Hamburg drafts had been credited as already stated. It also showed numerous other drafts drawn in the regular course of business by Triebel & Co. against the same account, which had been debited therein. A small commission was also shown as having been charged to Triebel & Co. for services rendered by appellant in indorsing long term paper, and in allowing Triebel & Co. to use appellant's credit. This charge included the indorsement by appellant of the Hamburg drafts. No account was kept in the books of appellant in favor of respondent. The drafts drawn in favor of respondent were in the ordinary form. They were payable at three days' sight, and gave the direction—"and charge same to our account with advice." Three of the drafts were severally presented to appellant in 1906 and 1907 and were accepted and paid. The three remaining drafts, totalling $15,000, respondent indorsed "for collection" to G. Oetiker & Co., a firm in Guatemala. These drafts were not presented until on or about January 30, 1915. At that time Triebel & Co. had overdrawn their account with, and were indebted to, appellant. Appellant refused either to accept or to pay the drafts, they were duly protested for nonacceptance and nonpayment, and on November 17, 1916, respondent instituted this action to recover the total amount of the paper. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $15,000, with legal interest thereon from January 30, 1915. Judgment was accordingly entered for $18,374.56. The record of this appeal is presented in typewriting.

[1] 1. The principal question, as indicated by the pleadings, is whether the transaction by which appellant received the Hamburg drafts created, as to the proceeds of those drafts, the relationship of debted and creditor between appellant and Triebel & Co. or between appellant and the respondent. McBride v. American Lighting Co., 60 Tex. Civ. App. 226, 127 S. W. 229, was a case where certain funds had been deposited in Bank A. at Boston to be transmitted to Bank B. in Dallas, Tex., there to be placed to the credit of C. Bank B. knew that the funds were to be devoted to the payment of various claims for construction work which C. was having done. Plaintiff B. held C.'s check on Bank B., given to him in payment for construction work, but before he presented the check Bank B. suspended payment. D. asserted that "said fund was a specific fund for payment of construction claims." The court said:

"When money or its equivalent is deposited in a bank without any special agreement, the law implies that it is to be mingled with the other funds of the bank, the relation of debtor and creditor is created between the bank and the depositor, and the deposit is general. In such a transaction the bank becomes the owner of the fund. When, on the other hand, money or its equivalent is so deposited with an accompanying agreement that the identical thing deposited shall be returned, or that the same shall be paid out for a specific purpose, the relation thus created is not that of debtor and creditor. Such a transaction is a special deposit, and the bank is liable only as bailee. In such a case the fund is a trust fund, the bank acquires no title thereto, and is a mere trustee for the safe-keeping, return, or disbursement of the fund, according to the special contract by which the deposit is made. 1 Morse on Banks and Banking, §§ 183, 188; 5 Cyc. 513–515; Anderson v. Bank, 112 Cal. 598, 44 Pac. 1063, 32 L. R. A. 479, 53 Am. St. Rep. 228; Peak v. Ellicott, 30 Kan. 156, 1 Pac. 499, 46 Am. Rep. 90; Association v. Jacobs, 141 Ill. 261, 31 N. E. 414, 16 L. R. The rule as to the implication arising upon the creation of a deposit is thus expressed in Tiffany on Banks and Banking, at page 20:

"Where * * * money is deposited for the purpose of paying the indebtedness of a third person, if no contrary instructions are given, it is customary to mingle the money with the funds of the bank, and upon principle it seems that the bank is to be regarded as the debtor of the depositor. In this view neither the depositor nor the beneficiary under the agreement is entitled to any preference over other creditors if the bank fails to apply the funds according to the agreement."

App.) 82 South. 564; 1 Morse on Banks and Banking (5th Ed.) § 210; 7 C. J. 681, note 4.

In Schofield Manufacturing Co. v. Cochran, 119 Ga. 901, 47 S. E. 208, A. had pledged a quantity of yarn with B. as security for a loan. C., desiring to purchase the yarn, deposited the purchase price in the bank, of which the defendant later became the receiver, to the account of B., and the yarn was released. It was known to the officers of the bank that the sole purpose of the deposit was to obtain the release of the yarn, but no special instructions were given with regard to the funds deposited. It was held that the deposit was a general one, the court saying:

"The fact that the president of the bank knew that the payment * * * was * * * for the sole purpose of releasing the yarn * * * has no bearing upon the character of the deposit. *The reasons which influenced the plaintiff to make the deposit * * * were, in the absence of special instructions on the subject, of not the slightest concern to the bank, and could not * * * affect the nature of the transaction as a general deposit.*" (Italics ours.)

See, also, Dearborn v. Washington Savings Bank, 13 Wash. 345, 42 Pac. 1107; Myers v. Twelfth Ward Bank, 28 Misc. Rep. 188, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1065.

From the foregoing authorities these conclusions may be drawn: When, in the regular course of business, one person sends to another drafts or bills of exchange for collection or sale and does not specifically direct that the funds realized therefrom are to constitute a special deposit, they become a general deposit. Even if the reason for the remittance be known to the depositary to be the payment of an obligation owed by the depositor to a third person, nevertheless the depositor must, at the time of making the deposit, specify that the funds are to be kept apart from other moneys of the depositary and devoted only to the payment of the depositor's debt.

[2] So much for the implications which the law will draw in the absence of evidence of the express intention of the parties as to the creation of a general or special deposit. This brings us to consider the question whether, according to the evidence admitted in this case, the express intention of the parties was that the proceeds of the sale of the Hamburg drafts should constitute a general or a special deposit. Certain evidence offered by appellant as tending to show "that there was no * * * specific deposit intended to be created," but "that this was one item in a general run of accounts," was rejected, and these rulings we shall take up under another head. In Ætna National Bank v. Fourth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314, A. was the maker of a certain promissory note for $5,000 due April 4. April 2, A. sent to the defendant bank a check in its favor for $4,895, inclosed in a letter containing this request:

"Which the inclosed check please credit our account, and charge us our note of $5,000, due the 4th instant." (Italics ours.)

On April 3, A.'s note for $5,000 due April 2 was paid by the defendant and the amount thereof charged to A.'s account. Subsequently the plaintiff presented for payment the note described in the letter containing the check, but payment was refused. The plaintiff claimed the right to recover upon the theory that the proceeds of the check constituted a deposit for the specific purpose of paying the note due April 4. The court said, "The direction was to credit the account with this sum; and this direction was complied with, and the relation of debtor, and creditor, between the defendant, and the Florence Mills [A.] * * * was the result" (Italics ours), and held for the defendant. In Young v. Bundy (Tex. Civ. App.) 158 S. W. 566, the plaintiff deposited with some private bankers a deed to certain property owned by him, to be turned over to the vendee for said property upon receipt of $200, which he instructed the bank to place to his credit. The bank received the $200, placed it to his credit, and later paid it out upon a forged check. The bank claimed that the $200 constituted a special deposit, as to which they were responsible only to the extent of using reasonable care. The court held that no special deposit was established because the plaintiff's direction to place the money to his credit and the action of the bank in so doing brought into existence the relationship of debtor and creditor. We quote from the opinion:

"Appellee testified it was the agreement that, when the deed was delivered and the money paid for the lots, the bank should deposit the sum in the bank to his credit. The undisputed evidence is that, when the cashier's check was received, the bank placed the amount in the bank as a deposit to the credit of appellee, subject to check, in the usual and ordinary course of business." (Italics ours.)

In the case of In re Broad, Ex parte Neck, Court of Appeals, L. R. 13 Q. B. D. 740, A. was a banker in London and B. a merchant in Sweden. On July 13 B. remitted to A. a sight draft on C. for £450, inclosed in a letter containing the following instruction: "Inclosed I beg to remit £450 at sight on Westenholz Brothers, which please encash to my credit." A. replied: "We are in receipt of your favor of the 13th instant handing a cheque for £450, * * * which is noted to the credit of your account." The court said:

"It is suggested that there was a specific appropriation so far as regards this particular transaction, and reliance has been placed on the letter of the 13th of July. * * * But the terms of that letter seem to me to be entirely in accordance with the usual practice. No doubt the general ground or reason why the remittance was made was, that bills drawn by Thomsen [B] on Neck [A] were becoming due. * * * but an authority to 'encash' the remitted bill, and to carry the amount to Thomsen's credit, is contained in this very letter."

In the light of these authorities let us examine the letters that passed between the parties here: First, as to the letter of September 5. The phrase "for the reimbursement of above-mentioned amounts," in our opinion, meant that the proceeds of the sale of the Hamburg drafts were to "reimburse" appellant for any sums it might be called upon to pay out on Triebel & Co.'s account. There are numerous decisions to the effect that similar words do not mean that a remittance is to constitute a fund to be exclusively devoted to the payment of a particular obligation, but are employed merely to indicate to the drawee "his means of reimbursement." Corbett v. Clark, 45 Wis. 403, 30 Am. Rep. 763. See, also, Redman v. Adams, 51 Me. 429; First National Bank v. Lightner, 74 Kan. 736, 88 Pac. 59, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 231, 118 Am. St. Rep. 353, 11 Ann. Cas. 596; Macleed v. Snee, 93 Eng. Rep. 833. The most significant language, as showing the intention of Triebel & Co. in respect to the character of the deposit is, "please credit." It would seem clear that if a fund is to be "credited" the result must be the relation, not of trustee and beneficiary, but of debtor and creditor. As we have seen, such was the conclusion of the court in the Ætna National Bank Case, in Young v. Bundy, supra, and in Ex parte Broad, supra. The language of the letter was not, as respondent contends, to "credit to the specific purpose of paying the Cabrera drafts," but only to credit. It will be noted that Triebel & Co. also asked that the Cabrera drafts be protected "as usual upon presentation." Such a request was inconsistent with any intention that said drafts were to be payable out of a particular fund. Moreover, the sale of the Hamburg drafts was directed "in order that we can make some more profit on the interests." (Italics ours.) If it had been intended to establish a special deposit the payee of the Cabrera drafts, and not the depositor, would have been entitled to the interest which might accrue on the funds deposited.

No account was ever opened on appellant's books in the name of respondent, but, as the Hamburg drafts were disposed of, appellant notified Triebel & Co. of the fact that said drafts had been sold and Triebel & Co.'s Coffee Duty account credited with the respective amounts received. Triebel & Co. replied that appellant's Coffee Duty account with them had been debited in the same amounts. Had Triebel & Co. intended that the proceeds of the Hamburg drafts were to constitute a deposit for the specific purpose of meeting the drafts in favor of respondent, they would have adopted a different course than the entry of the proceeds in a form whereby appellant was designated as their debtor. Each of the drafts in favor of respondent was at three days' sight, and, according to the letter of September 5, had already been delivered to respondent, who was therefore at liberty to forward them at any time to appellant for acceptance and payment. It is true that Tribel & Co. advised appellant that the respondent "would probably retain the drafts for some time yet," but apparently this was merely a surmise and there is no evidence that there was any agreement that respondent would not present the drafts at once. Three days after acceptance the drafts would become due and payable. If the proceeds of the Hamburg drafts had been intended as a deposit for the specific purpose of meeting respondent's drafts, it would have been necessary, however, for him to have waited until said Hamburg drafts, payable at ninety days' sight, had been accepted and paid in Germany. If the respondent had presented his drafts before such acceptance and payment, appellant would have had no funds other than its general funds out of which to pay them. While appellant was authorized to sell the Hamburg drafts in order to meet respondent's bills as presented, nevertheless, in order to make such disposal, appellant was obliged to indorse them, thus incurring a liability which only terminated when they were paid in Hamburg. In other words, in order to be prepared to meet respondent's bills, payable at three days' sight, appellant had the alternative, to be prepared to make such payment out of its general funds (which would create the relationship of debtor and creditor between Triebel & Co. and appellant), or to sell the Hamburg drafts after indorsing them for payment (which fixed upon appellant a liability contingent upon the nonpayment of the drafts in Germany). Triebel & Co., in the letter of September 5, requested appellant "to protect these drafts as usual upon presentation." (Italics ours.) And the Cabrera drafts themselves, after ordering appellant to pay the respective amounts thereof, contained the direction: "Charge to our account." The above-quoted language shows that the Cabrera drafts were intended by Triebel & Co. to be paid three days after presentation in the regular course of business, and that the amounts paid were to be debited to Triebel & Co.'s account. Thus respondent's position involves the strange contention that the parties intended to create a fund to be exclusively devoted to the payment of the Cabrera drafts, which fund might not come into existence or at least would not be in a form available for the payment of those drafts until after they, in the usual course of business, had been accepted and paid.

The request for a specimen signature of the respondent did not tend to show that appellant had accepted the Hamburg drafts as a trust fund. Whether or not such drafts were to be devoted exclusively to the payment of respondent's bills, appellant was probably desirous of paying such bills to the proper party, and S. T. Leffmann, appellant's secretary, testified that it was the custom of appellant "always to have the signatures of persons whose drafts were drawn on the company." Respondent contends that—

> "The acts of appellant in charging the Coffee Duty account with the Cabrera bills and in rendering the special account of December 31 * * * are conclusive evidence that the agreement * * * was for a special deposit."

It appears, however, that the two sets of drafts were not entered against each other. They were listed in the same account, but that account contained many other items, none of which had any connection with this transaction. The Cabrera drafts were all debited on September 22, while the Hamburg drafts were credited as they were sold, over a period from September 22 to November 19. The account does not purport to show out of what funds payment of respondent's drafts was to be made. Regarding the meaning of the entry of the Cabrera drafts, Leffmann testified:

> "When we get advices of these drafts, it is our custom to charge them right away on the presumption that they would come in in two or three days, even before we got through with our work."

This testimony was not controverted. The entry of the Cabrera drafts meant, therefore, that appellant was, from the time of making the entry, prepared to pay the drafts when presented. They were debited on September 22. On that day, prior to said entry, the account showed a balance against Triebel & Co. of about $900. The only items credited to Triebel & Co. on September 22 were the proceeds of two of the Hamburg drafts, amounting to $3,482.80. As already noted, the total of the Cabrera bills was $28,587. Obviously, payment of respondent's drafts was not to be made from the proceeds of the Hamburg drafts, for when appellant, by its entry of the former, signified that it was prepared to accept and pay them, no such funds were shown by the account. It is plain that the intention of the parties was that respondent's drafts should be payable out of Triebel & Co.'s general account with appellant. In each of the cases cited by respondent in support of its contention that this was a deposit for a specific purpose the intention of the parties was assumed, and hence those authorities can have no application here. In our opinion it is clear from the evidence that the remittance of the Hamburg drafts did not constitute them a deposit to be devoted to the specific purpose of meeting respondent's drafts, and the jury, therefore, was not justified in finding for the plaintiff.

[3, 4] 2. Since the judgment must be reversed it will be proper to discuss other questions raised by appellant. The first of these is, "Whether the trial court erred in its rulings on evidence." Appellant first assigns error in the exclusion of a letter written by respondent to appellant under date of March 13, 1915. In this letter respondent, referring to an adjustment and settlement of the account of B. Millan & Co., regarding which appellant had asked respondent to "use his good offices," stated, "I cannot intervene in this matter as it seems entirely foreign to me." The court on its own motion, "subsequent to the trial," procured an independent translation of this letter from the original Spanish, reading, "That matter appears to me to be entirely foreign with my intervention in the matter of the protested drafts," which translation, although appearing in the bound volume of the transcript before us, is not certified by the official reporter or the judge. We find in the record no stipulation that this translation may, nevertheless, be considered on appeal. Indeed, at the time the first translation was offered in evidence, counsel for respondent stated that no point would be made that the translation presented had not been proved. In view of this state of the record, we are unable to consider the translation made after the trial. Appellant claims that the letter tended to show that respondent "had no longer any rights in the drafts," and, therefore "that prior to the time this action was commenced, respondent had ceased to be the owner and holder of the drafts in suit." The facts surrounding the sending of the letter are: As already shown, respondent had indorsed his drafts to G. Oetiker & Co. "for collection." Subsequently they were presented, but acceptance was refused, and appellant wrote to respondent under date of February 8, 1915, stating that the reason for nonacceptance was that Triebel & Co., the drawers, were responsible for the account of the Millan Company, which was overdrawn, and requesting respondent to "use his good offices" in adjusting and settling the last-mentioned account. We think the evidence was properly excluded. The language of the letter shows that respondent did not consider that the adjustment of the Millan account concerned him in any way, but that he regarded appellant as responsible to him independently of such account.

[5] Appellant also claims that "the court was in error in excluding evidence showing the course of dealings between appellant and Triebel & Co. at and prior to * * * the letter of September 5, 1906." The court, in sustaining respondent's objections to this class of evidence, ruled that—

> "This plaintiff is not concerned with the course of dealings between the defendant and Triebel & Co. with respect to other transactions not involved in this case. * * * To go into the general account and what their course of dealings was in other transactions and other matters is wholly immaterial in my opinion."

The rule involved is thus stated in 22 Corpus Juris, 1183:

> "Previous and contemporaneous transactions may properly be taken into consideration to ascertain the sense in which the parties to a writing used particular terms."

See, also, First National Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 262, 74 Pac. 856; Fee v. McPhee, 31 Cal. App. 295, 316, 160 Pac. 397; Peters Shoe Co. v. Murray, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 259, 71 S. W. 977.

In the letter of September 5 we find the terms "protect * * * as usual upon presentation," and "please credit." Plainly, if the Cabrera drafts were to be protected "as usual," this evidence was admissible to show that these terms did not mean that the drafts were to be paid from a special deposit, but out of appellant's general fund. Moreover, the understanding between Triebel & Co. and appellant is to be determined from a consideration of the entire course of dealings between them, of which the correspondence was only a part. It is also settled that proof of subsequent dealings, tending to show the meaning which the parties placed upon a writing or contract between them, is admissible. Mayberry v. Alhambra, etc., Co., 125 Cal. 444, 446, 54 Pac. 530, 58 Pac. 68; Keith v. Electrical, etc., Co., 136 Cal. 178, 68 Pac. 598; Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 15, 84 Pac. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275; Woodard v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 171 Cal. 513, 521, 153 Pac. 951.

[6] Appellant next assigns error in the exclusion of "evidence showing the state of Triebel & Co.'s credit with appellant at the time of the writing of the letter of September 5." Appellant asserts that, in another letter written on the same day by Triebel & Co. to appellant—September 5, 1906—Triebel & Co. admitted "the firm was in the debt of appellant to the extent of over $15,000," and therefore, it is claimed, the letter was admissible upon the theory that "a depositor [Triebel & Co.] at a bank, who is about to draw a check [respondent's drafts] in excess of his then existing account, will naturally deposit further funds [the Hamburg drafts]." We think this contention is correct. If the appellant could prove that at the time of the remittance of the Hamburg drafts Triebel & Co. were indebted to appellant, an inference might properly be drawn that the remittance was intended to replenish the general account.

[7] Appellant's fourth assignment of error

in the rulings upon evidence is the refusal to admit a letter dated September 18, 1909, in which Triebel & Co. requested appellant "to book the balance of the Coffee Duty account in the general account." It seems to us that this letter was admissible as tending to show that Triebel & Co. regarded the Coffee Duty account as a general account, and, therefore, as already shown, they acquiesced in appellant's action in crediting to this account the proceeds of the Hamburg drafts.

4. Appellant has assigned error to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions which it proposed, but in view of our statement of the law any error in this connection will be avoided on another trial.

Judgment reversed.

PETERSEN v. MORSE, Com'r Public Health and Safety, et al. (Civ. 3486.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 6, 1920. Rehearing Denied July 26, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1920.)

1. Mandamus ⊜5—Jurisdiction not ousted by commencement of a proceeding in a court of equal or inferior jurisdiction.

No respondent in a mandamus proceeding can oust the jurisdiction of the court in which it is pending by commencing another proceeding involving the same question in a court of equal or inferior jurisdiction, so where a policeman, removed by the commissioner of public health and safety, began proceedings in the appellate court for writ of mandate to compel reinstatement pursuant to the decision of the civil service board, the commissioner must present whatever defense he has in that action, and cannot, by commencing certiorari proceeding in the superior court to review the decision of the board, oust the appellate court of jurisdiction.

2. Mandamus ⊜77(1)—Title to office cannot be determined in mandamus.

The legal title to office cannot be tried by mandamus, but must be determined in an action of quo warranto.

3. Mandamus ⊜172—Commissioner of safety cannot refuse to reinstate policeman on ground that he was not an officer.

Where the commissioner of public health and safety of the city of Oakland removed a police officer, and the civil service board on appeal pursuant to the Oakland charter reinstated the officer, the commissioner cannot, in mandamus proceedings, justify his refusal to reinstate the officer on the ground that the officer by previously obtaining leave of absence was no longer member of the police force, for the title to an office cannot be tried in mandamus, and the order of removal was an admission of the officer's title.

4. Mandamus ⊜172—Commissioner of safety bound to reinstate police officer whose appeal was sustained by civil service board.

Where the order of the commissioner of public health and safety of the city of Oakland, removing a police officer, was reversed on appeal to the civil service board, the order of the board amounted to a judgment which the commissioner was bound to obey, and he cannot in mandamus proceedings excuse his refusal to obey on the theory that the officer was subject to removal on the other grounds, or had been removed by the city council, for that would be collateral attack on the judgment.

Nourse, J., dissenting.

Application by Walter J. Petersen for writ of mandate to be directed against F. F. Morse, as Commissioner of Public Health and Safety of the City of Oakland, and the City of Oakland, a municipality. Writ granted.

Burton J. Wyman, of Oakland, and Cedric W. Petersen, of Pleasanton, for petitioner.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., John Jewett Earle, Asst. City Atty., and Peter J. Crosby, all of Oakland, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. The proceeding is for mandate. The petitioner alleged that while exercising the functions of captain of inspectors of the bureau of criminal investigation of the police department of the city of Oakland, he was discharged by the written order of the respondent Morse on March 19, 1920. The address and signature being omitted, the order was as follows:

"You are hereby discharged and removed from the position of captain of inspectors of the Oakland Police Department of the City of Oakland, for misconduct, incompetency, failure to perform your duties and under and observe the rules and regulations of the police department and pertaining to your office. This order shall be effective forthwith."

By section 82 of the charter of the city of Oakland it is provided that—

"Any person suspended, fined or discharged * * * may within five days from the making of the order * * * discharging him * * * appeal therefrom to the civil service board, which shall fully hear and determine the matter. The accused shall be entitled to appear personally, and to have counsel and a public hearing. The finding and decision of the board shall be certified to the official from whose order the appeal is taken, and shall forthwith be enforced and followed by him."

Within the time limited the petitioner filed his appeal from the order of discharge, and, the appeal coming regularly on to be heard, a resolution on which the petitioner relies was adopted, reading as follows:

"Resolution No. 4693. The time having arrived for the hearing of the appeal of Walter

J. Petersen, appealing from the order of discharge made by Commissioner of Public Health and Safety F. F. Morse, discharging him from the position of captain of inspectors, police department, the board proceeded with the hearing.

"Attorneys H. L. Hagen and Earl Warren appeared on behalf of F. F. Morse, Commissioner of Public Health and Safety.

"Attorneys B. J. Wyman and C. W. Petersen appeared on behalf of Walter J. Petersen, the appellant.

"The following witnesses were sworn and testified on behalf of the commissioner of public health and safety: F. G. Thompson, W. F. Kyle, J. L. Lynch, V. J. Coley, Alexander Trotter, Jas. T. Drew, B. A. Wallman, and Chas. F. Nightingale.

"No witnesses were sworn and no testimony was offered on behalf of the appellant, and the case was submitted without argument.

"The board, after hearing all the evidence in the matter, finds: That, the evidence submitted on behalf of the commissioner of public health and safety does not substantiate the charges of misconduct, incompetency, or failure to perform the duties and observe the rules and regulations of the police department. Therefore be it resolved that the decision of this board is that the appeal of Walter J. Petersen, appealing from the order of discharge made by Commissioner of Public Health and Safety F. F. Morse, discharging him from the office of captain of inspectors, police department, on March 19, 1920, be and the same is hereby sustained, and that said appellant be forthwith restored to his civil service position of captain of inspectors in the Oakland Police Department, and be it further resolved that, the secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to certify to the commissioner of public health and safety the findings and decision of the board in this matter."

On April 7, 1920, the secretary of the civil service board addressed a communication to the respondent Morse, as commissioner of public health and safety, reading as follows:

"Please be advised that on April 6, 1920, the civil service board sustained the appeal of Walter J. Petersen, appealing from your order of discharge, discharging him from the position of captain of inspectors on March 19, 1920. The action of the board restores said Walter J. Petersen to his civil service position of captain of inspectors in the Oakland Police Department."

The same notice was addressed to J. F. Lynch, chief of police of Oakland, and copies of the resolution and notices were delivered to Morse and Lynch. On the same day the petitioner delivered to respondent Morse as commissioner a writing addressed to him and signed by the petitioner, reading as follows:

"Pursuant to an order dated April 7, 1920, made by the civil service board of this city, restoring me to the position of captain of inspectors in the Oakland Police Department, I respectfully report to you that I have this day reported for duty in compliance with said order."

Thereupon the petitioner reported to the chief of police for duty. Lynch informed the petitioner that the respondent refused to acknowledge or to be governed by the resolution or decision of the civil service board, that he had directed him as the chief of police to ignore the same, and to refuse to acknowledge the petitioner as captain of inspectors, which order of the commissioner was in writing, signed by him and addressed to the chief of police, dated April 7, 1920. It was as follows:

"Captain Walter J. Petersen came to this office this morning and requested me to reinstate him in his former position as captain of inspectors. I informed Captain Petersen that I was giving the matter careful consideration, and would take such action in the premises as I believed to be proper.

"This is to inform you that Captain Drew shall continue in the work as captain of inspectors until further orders from this office. Statements have been made also that Captain Petersen declared that he would take charge of his office without instructions. These orders to you are clear and explicit. As chief of police you will tolerate no interference whatsoever from Captain Petersen or any one else in the execution of orders regularly issued in your department.

"I may further say to you that I cannot return a discharged captain of inspectors to his former position after a dismissal based upon uncontradicted facts until a court decision requires me to take such action.

"Accordingly I have instructed the city attorney to prepare papers and present the entire matter to the superior court for the purpose of obtaining a court judgment in the matter."

Under the same date Lynch, as chief of police, delivered to the petitioner a writing addressed to the petitioner reading as follows:

"In view of the following received this day from Commissioner F. F. Morse, I respectfully request that you refrain from assuming charge in the police department as captain of inspectors: 'This is to inform you that Captain Drew shall continue in the work as captain of inspectors until further orders from this office. Statements have been made also that Captain Petersen declared that he would take charge of his office without instructions. These orders to you are clear and explicit. As chief of police you will tolerate no interference whatsoever from Captain Petersen or any one else in the execution of orders regularly issued in your department.' Therefore, kindly be governed accordingly."

[1] Upon the petition setting forth the foregoing facts this court issued its order, directing the respondents to show cause, if any existed, on May 10, 1920, why the peremptory writ of mandate should not issue to require obedience to the resolution of the civil service board in terms reinstating the petitioner to the office of captain of inspectors. After the issuance and service of the order of this court the respondent Morse commenced a proceeding in the superior court in Alameda county to review the action of the civil service board in making the order under consideration in this proceeding. In the answer of the respondents filed here the fact of the pendency of the certiorari proceeding in the superior court is relied upon to prevent this court from proceeding to the determination of the present mandamus proceeding. No respondent in a mandamus proceeding may be permitted to oust jurisdiction of the court in which that proceeding is pending by commencing another proceeding involving the same questions in a court of equal or inferior jurisdiction. The respondents, having been ordered to show cause to this court why the order of the civil service board should not be obeyed, had the right, and it was their duty, to present to this court any excuse they may have had for their disregard of the order of the civil service board.

[2, 3] In addition to their reliance upon the pendency of the certiorari proceedings, which cannot be considered as defensive matter, they also relied upon certain contentions based on provisions of the charter of the city of Oakland in regard to leaves of absence which may be granted to civil service employés of the municipality generally and to civil service members of the police department specifically, and alleged that the petitioner, long prior to his formal discharge as captain of inspectors on March 19, 1920, was granted leave of absence in order that he might become the chief of police of the city of Oakland, and that the leave of absence granted him was in violation of the terms of the charter; wherefore, it is argued that the civil service board, on the appeal from the discharge for specific reasons, none of which had anything to do with this contention, was without power to order the petitioner to be reinstated to the position he held at the time of the discharge. In the present proceeding this contention is without force. By the very terms of the discharge the petitioner was occupying the position of captain of inspectors at the time of the discharge. The propriety of that discharge for the reasons stated was the sole question presented under section 82 of the charter for the adjudication of the civil service board. Upon the case thus made the civil service board had the power to make its order requiring the reinstatement of the petitioner to the position from which he had been wrongfully discharged.

Out of an abundance of caution and because of the assertions made on behalf of the respondents that the evidence submitted by Morse on the appeal to the civil service board not only did not sustain its conclusions, but showed a complete lack of the exercise of the discretion vested in the commission by the charter, an order was made by this court under which the record of the evidence submitted to the board by the respondent Morse in support of his discharge was filed in this proceeding. It has been carefully examined, and the conclusions reached by the civil service board have the approval of this court. The evidence adduced was of such a flimsy character as to require no refutation. The civil service board upon the concrete case submitted to it could not properly have reached any determination than that the discharge of the petitioner for the reasons given by Morse was wholly unwarranted.

The respondents refused to obey the order made in the exercise of the power vested in the civil service board under section 82. They seek to justify their disobedience of the lawful order of the board by contending here that the petitioner was not holding the position from which he was wrongfully discharged. On this proceeding they cannot try title to the office of captain of inspectors based on facts which did not enter into consideration of the appeal from the order of discharge. It is a well-settled rule that title to office cannot be tried by mandamus. It may be used for the purpose of putting a claimant in a position to assert his right when without that he could not do so. People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 175, 58 Am. Dec. 398. The proper proceeding to try title to the office is by the legal action of quo warranto. "When the writ is invoked to enforce a specific duty, * * * aid will not be refused merely because occupancy or incumbency or title is incidentally involved. The court will act under such circumstances as does equity, and inquire into and determine rights so far as, but no further than, may be necessary to the granting of the relief sought. * * For it once being established that the respondent is a de facto officer, as the law, for grave reasons of public policy, holds valid the acts of such an officer, the question of legal title which alone is sought to be litigated, will be relegated to another forum." Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 481, 50 Pac. 646. The very wording of the discharge in this case constituted an admission of record that the petitioner was at least a de facto captain of inspectors, and for that reason the question of legal title, which alone is sought to be litigated by the special defense in this proceeding, must be relegated to another forum. The defense based on the claimed illegality of a prior leave of absence, therefore, ought not to be considered on this proceeding.

[4] The respondents further allege that while exercising the functions of chief of police, the petitioner was discharged from that office by an order of the city council. Neither the actions of the petitioner as chief of police, nor of the city council in relation thereto, have any bearing upon the present controversy, which involves only the question of whether or not the order of the civil service board directing the petitioner to be reinstated to the office of captain of inspectors, from which he was discharged, was such as a matter of law commanded obedience on the part of the respondents. If the petitioner had been discharged because of any action of his, or any action of the city council, or because he was illegally holding the office of captain of inspectors, and he had appealed to the civil service board, that tribunal in the first instance, under the charter, would have been compelled to examine into these matters. If such an appeal had been sustained and the respondents had refused to obey the order of the civil service board upon mandamus, those matters might have been presented as matters of defense, and upon a proper showing would have been considered, but it requires no citation of authority to demonstrate that if those questions alone had been considered by the civil service board on the appeal, the disobedient respondents would have been concluded by the judgment on the appeal, and could not in response to the petition for mandate have argued that the petitioner should have been discharged for the grounds upon which his discharge in this case was based. So in this case the court is concerned only with the respondents' admitted disobedience of the order of the civil service board, and will consider only the matters involved in the adjudication of the civil service board. The evidence introduced on behalf of the respondents on the appeal was insufficient to sustain the discharge. The order was a correct and valid exercise of the power vested in the civil service board to determine finally the particular matter before it. It was in effect a judgment, and nothing is better settled than that a judgment valid on its face is binding on the parties to it until set aside by a direct attack. Its validity cannot be questioned in another proceeding based upon it for matters not submitted to, nor adjudicated by, the tribunal which rendered the judgment. To permit such an attack to be made would be at variance with the whole law in regard to collateral attacks upon judgments. In determining the validity of that order, the court must confine itself to the matters before that tribunal and considered by it. Unless in such a proceeding as this this rule were adopted, the door would be open to interminable contentions in regard to matters which would frequently have more of the character of political than of legal controversies.

On the record here and the showing made on behalf of the respondents, it appears that under the charter on the certification of the findings of the civil service board on the appeal, the law enjoined the duty upon the respondent Morse as commissioner and upon the respondent municipality to restore the petitioner to his status as captain of inspectors at the time of the discharge. If for reasons other than those involved in the discharge and appeal he is illegally holding that office, his title to the office must be determined in some other proceeding.

Let the peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

I concur: LANGDON, P. J.

NOURSE, J. I dissent. Mandate will issue against a public officer "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office." Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. It is not the duty of a public officer to admit to a subordinate public office one who has no right to occupy such office. Under the terms of the Oakland charter the petitioner, by taking an indefinite leave of absence from his civil service position of captain of inspectors of the police dapartment and by accepting the incompatible position of chief of police, relinquished his civil service standing in the former position. The office of captain of inspectors is governed by the civil service provisions of the charter. It is filled by examination, certification, and promotion. The office of chief of police is noncivil service. That one person cannot occupy both offices goes without question. That petitioner could not occupy one and keep a string on the other is equally clear, because the charter specifically limits the period of leaves of absence from the civil service positions, and defines the purposes for which they may be granted. When petitioner accepted the position of chief of police the office of captain of inspectors became vacant, and should have been filled by the one whose civil service standing entitled him to the appointment. Such person, whoever he may be, still has the legal right to such office. It is alleged in the petition and not controverted, that another now occupies such office, and it is to be presumed that he is the one who is legally entitled to possession.

The situation is not changed by the action of the city officials in recognizing petitioner as captain of inspectors after he returned to that office. Estoppel does not run against the city in a case of this kind. That is to say, none of the city officials could defeat the plain provisions of the charter merely by failing to object to the unlawful occupancy of the office by petitioner or by recognizing him for a time as such.

Such being the case, the special defense interposed by respondents to the effect that petitioner was not entitled to be restored because he had voluntarily relinquished his civil service standing demands a denial of the writ prayed for.

The effect of the majority opinion is that when a petitioner seeks mandate against a public official, assigning certain reasons why he has been denied the right which he claims, such official may defend only upon such grounds as are laid out for him by the petitioner. With this rule I do not agree.

In this case no duty rests upon respondents to admit petitioner to the office of captain of inspectors unless he is entitled to occupy it. If his title is disputed, and that cannot be tried by mandamus, then he, too, should proceed by quo warranto, as the majority opinion holds must be done by one who questions that title. If the question of title is merely incidental to the relief sought, then it may be tried in this case. Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 203, 116 Pac. 732. Petitioner has put his title in issue. Respondents have controverted it. The facts are undisputed, and the law is not questioned.

The petition should be denied.

YOUNG et al. v. NEW PEDRARA ONYX CO. et al. (two cases). (Civ. 3011.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 28, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⇐114—Shares may be transferred without assignment or delivery of certificates.

A share of corporate stock, being an incorporeal right incapable of manual delivery, and the certificate being merely evidence of its existence, in absence of any controlling statutory inhibition, the shares, without assignment or delivery of certificate, may be assigned in any manner appropriate to transfer of incorporeal personal property, as by bill of sale, or any sufficient mode for passing title to a chose in action or intangible property.

2. Corporations ⇐114—Statute providing for transfer of stock by delivery of certificates does not prohibit other methods.

Civ. Code, § 324, relating to transfer of corporate stock by delivery of certificates, does not cover the whole subject and stock would be transferable without its provisions under section 1044, so that, where certificates have been issued, a transfer of title good as between the parties may be made in any manner appropriate to assignment of choses in action or intangible personal property.

3. Corporations ⇐114—Stock transferred without transfer of certificates held to pass equitable title subject to pledge.

Where stock was transferred other than by transfer of certificates, if the legal title did not pass, the full equitable title did, subject to a prior pledge of the stock existing at the date of the contract of exchange, if the buyer had actual or constructive notice thereof.

4. Corporations ⇐116—An unconditional offer to exchange stock unequivocally accepted constitutes a contract of exchange.

Where there was an unconditional offer to exchange corporate stock and an immediate and unequivocal acceptance of that offer, the contract was one of exchange, and not a contract to exchange, so that the title passed, the provisions of Civ. Code, § 1806, relating to sales, being applicable to exchanges.

5. Corporations ⇐119—Where neither party required to do anything precedent or concurrent, title to stock passed.

Where a contract exchanging corporate stock did not require either party to do anything precedent or concurrent, on which passing of the property was to depend, the intention was to pass title, even though it would be necessary to cause the transfer to show that it was made subject to a prior pledge.

6. Sales ⇐201(1)—Delivery not essential to passage of title.

As between the parties, delivery is not essential to passage of title.

7. Corporations ⇐119—Contract construed as passing present title to stock.

A written confirmation of a contract exchanging corporate stock, using the terms "hereby exchanges" and also "and agrees to transfer at once," construed as constituting an exchange transferring title.

8. Corporations ⇐116 — Addition of word "trustee" to holder's name does not alone imply that he could not deal with stock as his own.

Where shares of corporate stock stood in the holder's name, the addition thereto of the word "trustee" does not necessarily and alone raise an implication that the holder did not have a full right to deal with the stock as his own.

9. Corporations ⇐119 — Inability to deliver whole amount did not prevent passing of title to stock.

Though a purchaser bargained for 100 shares of stock from one who individually and as trustee controlled but 96 shares, title passed under the contract to the shares controlled.

10. Corporations ⇐123(4)—Transfer of stock on corporation's books not essential.

A transfer on the books of the corporation is not essential to a pledge of corporate stock.

11. Corporations ⇐140—Whether buyer had notice of former pledge of stock purchased held for the jury.

The question whether buyer of corporate stock on exchange had notice of a prior pledge thereof to a bank was one of fact for the trial court to determine from the conflicting evidence.

12. Corporations ⇐149—Buyer of stock with notice takes subject to prior pledge, but without notice he takes seller's title unincumbered.

If a purchaser of corporate stock by exchange had notice of a prior pledge thereof to a bank, then the only title that passed was such as remained in the seller as pledgor, but if buyer had no notice of pledge, or notice of circumstance which would put a prudent person on inquiry, he took whatever title seller had, unincumbered by such pledge.

13. Corporations ⟸117—Resolution to rescind an exchange of stock held not to pass title.

Even if a written notice to a corporation for rescinding an exchange whereby it acquired stock of another corporation had recited the contract actually made, the accepting resolution, providing that "the officers of this corporation be authorized to make, execute and deliver all the necessary documents to carry out the purpose and spirit of this resolution," indicating that something else was to be done, would not repass title where neither actual nor constructive redelivery could be made because the certificates were in the hands of a banking company, claiming the stock as pledgee.

14. Exchange of property ⟸11—Sales ⟸94—Agreement for rescission of executed contract will not alone repass title.

Where a contract of sale or exchange has been fully executed, merely rescinding it by mutual consent of the parties will not alone and ipso facto, in the absence of an intent to effect a restoration of title solely by reason of rescission, restore to either of the parties that which he may have parted with under the fully executed contract.

15. Corporations ⟸117—Intended formalities are necessary to repass title on rescinding executed exchange of stock.

A corporate resolution to rescind an executed exchange of stock, where it appears further formalities were intended to effect the re-exchange of property, cannot ipso facto repass the title.

16. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸57 — Granting nonsuit as to proper party error.

Where, in an equitable proceeding there is an answer to the complaint, the court may grant plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced by the issues, Code Civ. Proc. § 580, and it is error to grant a nonsuit as to one who is a proper, if not a necessary, party defendant.

17. Corporations ⟸133—Right of owner of stock to resort to equity to compel registration and issue of new certificate.

The true owner of stock may resort to a court of equity to compel the corporation to register its transfer on the books and to issue to him a new certificate, and in such case it is proper to bring before the court, as parties, all persons having any interest in the stock, whether legal or equitable.

18. Corporations ⟸133—Pledgee of corporate stock necessary party in proceeding to compel registration and issue of new certificate.

In a proceeding to set aside a rescinding resolution and to require registry of corporate stock and issue of new certificate, one claiming stock as pledgee is a necessary party to a complete determination of the controversy, and the court should, sua sponte, under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, direct that pledgee be brought in as defendant.

Two actions by J. A. Young and others against the New Pedrara Onyx Company and others. Both judgments were favorable to the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal. On rehearing. Both judgments reversed.

H. J. Bischoff and Bischoff & Thompson, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Laurence Hammond Smith, Eugene Ferry Smith, and Sam Ferry Smith, all of San Diego, for respondent Smith.

J. C. Hizar and F. W. Stearns, both of San Diego, for respondents Pedrara Onyx Co. and Lea.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiffs, stockholders of the New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company (hereafter referred to as the California company), suing on behalf of that corporation, brought this action to set aside a certain resolution adopted by the company's board of directors on June 27, 1911, whereby, so it is claimed, the board rescinded a transfer to the company of certain shares of the capital stock of another corporation, hereafter, for convenience, referred to as the Mexican company. There are two appeals, each upon a separate record. Both appeals are from judgments in the same case.

These two appeals were decided and opinions filed on December 10, 1919. 30 Cal. App. Dec. 828, 829. Thereafter, on petition of appellants, a rehearing was granted in each case. 31 Cal. App. Dec. 141 and 142. The appeal in case No. 3053 is from a judgment of nonsuit entered August 13, 1915, in favor of defendants Smith, Lea, and the Pedrara Onyx Company (hereafter referred to as the Arizona company), and the appeal in case No. 3011 is from a judgment on the merits, entered February 4, 1916. Both appeals will be treated in one opinion.

Our résumé of the principal facts, gleaned in part from the findings and in part from the evidence, will suffice for an understanding of the questions presented. It may be that, as to some of the facts set forth in our statement of the case, there is a conflict in the evidence. Needless to say, nothing that may be said by us should be regarded as a foreclosure of the trial court's exclusive right to decide, according to the evidence governed by the exercise of its own sound judgment, any controverted fact that may be presented on the retrial of any issue that may properly be the subject of a new trial upon the case being remanded.

The material facts of the case are these: Some time prior to July 3, 1906, the New Pedrara Onyx Company (the company herein referred to as the Mexican company) was incorporated under the laws of this state, with a capital stock of $10,000, divided into 100 shares of the par value of $100 each. Immediately upon its organization all of its shares were issued, one share to each of the company's five directors—one of whom was the defendant L. A. Blochman—and the balance, 95 shares, to "L. A. Blochman, Trustee." All of the 100 shares stood upon the books of the Mexican company in the names of these five persons until June 29, 1911, when they were transferred to the name of Pedrara Onyx Company, the corporation herein referred to as the Arizona company.

Shortly after the organization of the Mexican company, and prior to July 3, 1906, the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock were pledged to the Blochman Banking Company to secure an indebtedness due to it. The bank is not a party to the action. When this pledge was made the certificates evidencing the 100 shares were indorsed and delivered to the bank as pledgee, but the transaction was not noted on the records of the Mexican company in any manner whatever; and, so far as the books of that company show, the five original shareholders continued to be the record owners of the 100 shares until June 29, 1911, until which date 1 share stood on the books of the Mexican company in the name of L. A. Blochman and 95 shares in the name of "L. A. Blochman, Trustee."

The New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company (the California company) was incorporated shortly prior to July 3, 1906. It was incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $10 each. Its shares were divided into preferred and common stock—25,000 shares of preferred and 75,000 shares of common stock. Plaintiffs are holders of some of the shares of the capital stock of the California corporation, and, as we have said, they are prosecuting this action in its behalf.

Blochman was elected president of the California company at the first meeting of its board of directors, held July 3, 1906. At this first meeting—the certificates evidencing the 100 shares of the Mexican company still remaining in the hands of the bank as pledgee, but the shares evidenced thereby still being registered on the books of the Mexican company in the names of the five original subscribers—Blochman, so the minutes of the California company show, orally offered to sell and deliver to the California company the entire capital stock of the Mexican company, 100 shares, and receive in exchange therefor the entire capital stock of the California company, 100,000 shares. This offer, so the minutes show, was immediately accepted by the California company's board of directors. Thereupon, after the acceptance of Blochman's offer to exchange the 100 shares of the Mexican company for the 100,000 shares of the California company, Blochman offered to give to the California company the optional right to repurchase all of its 25,000 shares of preferred stock and 23,000 shares of its common stock for the sum of $160,000, payable at any time within two years. This offer was immediately accepted by the California corporation, and thereupon the first vice president and secretary of the California company were authorized and directed to enter into a contract with Blochman in accordance with his offer to give such optional right to repurchase said shares for $160,000.

Four days thereafter, viz. on July 7, 1906, a written instrument, subscribed by Blochman, was delivered by him to the California company. By this instrument, Blochman, in effect, confirmed his previous oral offer to exchange all of the capital stock of the Mexican company for the stock of the California company. This instrument, so far as material, is as follows:

"* * * L. A. Blochman, of San Diego, California, hereby exchanges and agrees to transfer at once one hundred shares of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] * * * for twenty-five thousand (25,000) shares of the preferred stock and seventy-five thousand (75,000) shares of the common stock of said latter company [the California company], being all of the stock of said company."

Then follows a paragraph in relation to the optional right of the California company to repurchase its shares for $160,000, and a further paragraph whereby Blochman agrees to deliver as many shares of the stock of the California company as that company should sell, provided he be paid $8 on each share sold by the company, less the cost of sale, the same to be credited on the purchase price of $160,000. Immediately thereafter certificates for all the shares of the California company's capital stock were made out in the name of Blochman, but remained in the manual possession of that corporation. As the California company's stock was sold to others at $8 per share, certificates for the shares so sold were issued and delivered to the purchasers, among whom are these plaintiffs. The trial court found that the California company neglected to pay to Blochman the proceeds of the shares so sold by it, but, instead, used the money in the conduct of its business.

The property of the Mexican company consisted almost entirely of certain onyx quarries in Mexico. From the date of the exchange of the California company's shares for those of the Mexican company, the directors and stockholders of the former seem to have treated that company as the owner of the quarries and of all onyx quarried therefrom, although it is alleged in the complaint, and we think the allegation is a correct conclusion from the facts of the case, that—

"Said Mexican company, at all times mentioned in the complaint, was and still is the owner of 5,000 acres of land in Lower California in which are situated the quarries of onyx known as the Pedrara Onyx Quarries."

On June 27, 1911, at a meeting of the board of directors of the California company,

Blochman presented to that company the following written communication:

"New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company, City —Gentlemen: On July 3d, A. D. 1906, your corporation made an agreement with me wherein and whereby I was to transfer to your corporation all of the capital stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] for the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand ($160,000) dollars, and in order to carry said purchase into effect I was to transfer to your corporation all the stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] in exchange for all the capital stock of your corporation, and I was then to give you an option to purchase all of the stock of your corporation transferred to me for the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand ($160,000) dollars. Your corporation has sold 3,200 shares of preferred stock and 2,564 shares of common stock, but nothing has been paid to me on said option and no consideration has been paid to me for the transfer of the stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company]. Your corporation has used from the quarries onyx to the value of more than ninety thousand ($90,000.00) dollars, and have paid nothing to me or the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] therefor. This condition certainly cannot continue much longer. I therefore give you notice that I rescind said contract for the sale of said stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] to your corporation for the said sum of one hundred and sixty thousand ($160,000.00) dollars, and herewith tender you all of the stock of the corporation [the California company] save and excepting such as you yourself have sold out of the same, and demand of you the immediate transfer to me of all the capital stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] and the payment to me of the sum of ninety thousand ($90,000.00) dollars for the onyx used from said quarries; or if you prefer, I will make you this alternative proposition: I will relinquish all claim to the 3,200 shares of preferred stock and the 2,564 shares of common stock sold by you; I will accept stock in part payment of said ninety thousand ($90,000.00) dollars, and will close matter on the following basis: You surrender to me the stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company], pay me five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars in cash and issue to me 9,000 shares of capital stock of your corporation [the California company], and I will surrender to you all the remainder of said stock, to wit: 72,436 shares of common stock and 12,300 shares of preferred stock. This last proposition will enable your corporation to continue business in fine shape. I will also surrender to your corporation all claim to all onyx on storage in all other parts of the United States, save and excepting the onyx now in your bonded yard. This onyx is the property of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] and you must release all claim thereto.

"Trusting that this proposition will meet with your favorable consideration, I am,

"Sincerely yours, L. A. Blochman."

It will be noticed that this communication from Blochman to the California company's board of directors misstated the terms and effect of the contract that had been made on July 3, 1906. That contract, so the court found, was not an agreement by Blochman to transfer or sell to the California company the stock of the Mexican company for $160,000, but was a contract of exchange, whereby Blochman had exchanged the shares of the Mexican company for all the capital stock of the California company, and then gave the California company the optional right to repurchase its own stock for $160,000.

Immediately upon the presentation of Blochman's communication of June 27, 1911, the board of directors of the California company adopted a resolution that purports to rescind the contract which, in Blochman's communication, is assumed to be the contract that he had made with the California company on July 3, 1906. In our future references to this resolution we shall refer to it as the "rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911." In this resolution of rescission, or purported rescission, after certain recitals in the preamble, not necessary to be set forth here, the California company's board of directors resolved:

"That the contract made and entered into on the 3d day of July, A. D. 1906, for the sale by L. A. Blochman to this corporation, and the purchase by this corporation of all the stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] be rescinded, and said stock be redelivered to the said L. A. Blochman; and that, in addition thereto, the said L. A. Blochman be paid the sum of five thousand ($5.000.00) dollars, lawful money of the United States; and that the said L. A. Blochman is to release all claim to the 3,200 shares of preferred stock and 2,564 shares of common stock heretofore issued; and that there be issued to the said L. A. Blochman in payment of the onyx used from the quarries of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] during the time that said contract has been in existence, 9,000 shares of the preferred stock of this corporation."

This resolution further provided that—

"The officers of this corporation be authorized to make, execute and deliver all the necessary documents of every kind, nature and description to carry out the purpose and spirit of this resolution, and to carry into effect the transfer of the stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company], and the onyx belonging to it, to the said L. A. Blochman."

It is alleged in the complaint that the board of directors of the California company was induced to adopt this resolution of rescission by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by defendants Blochman, Smith, and Lea, and certain false promises alleged to have been made by them without any intention of performance. As we view the case, the inducements that prompted the board of directors to adopt the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, are not material, because, for reasons stated infra, we think that, fraud or no fraud, the rescinding resolution did not divest the California company of any title that may have been received by it under the contract of exchange made July 3, 1906.

Though the board of directors of the California company, by this resolution of June 27, 1911, resolved that the officers of that corporation be authorized "to make, execute and deliver all the necessary documents of every kind, nature and description to carry out the purposes and spirit of this resolution," no attempt seems to have been made to carry out the resolution by the payment of any money to Blochman, or by the retransfer to him, or to any one for him, of any of the shares of the capital stock of the Mexican company, or by the transfer to him of any property owned or claimed by the California company. In short, the "rescission," assuming for the present that the board's resolution of June 27, 1911, was effective as a rescission of the contract of exchange that had been made on July 3, 1906, was not carried out by any attempt to redeliver or retransfer or reassign the stock that, it is claimed, Blochman, on July 3, 1906, had assigned to the California company in exchange for all the shares of that company's capital stock.

Shortly prior to the adoption by the California company's board of directors of the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, the Arizona company was incorporated and organized. And on June 29, 1911, the 100 shares of the capital stock of the Mexican company, for the first time since their issuance to the five original subscribers, were transferred on the books of the Mexican company; the transfer being made on the books of that company to the Arizona company, as the transferee, the certificates, meanwhile remaining in the possession of the Blochman Banking Company, as pledgee.

The trial court found that—

"The said 100 shares of stock of the New Pedrara Onyx Company [the Mexican company] were not delivered to said New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company [the California company], but, on the contrary, were at said time and at all times thereafter held by the Blochman Banking Company as pledgee to secure indebtedness due it from W. R. Ramsdell and other persons, and the title to said 100 shares did not pass to said New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company [the California company] by the contract between said L. A. Blochman and said company, set forth above, arising out of the meeting of July 3, 1906."

In its conclusions of law the trial court found that Blochman's agreement to exchange the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock for all of the shares of the California company never became effective, "for the reason that said stock was not in the possession of said L. A. Blochman, and was not delivered to the said New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company [the California company] or to anybody in their behalf, but was at all times in the custody and possession of the Blochman Banking Company as pledgee to secure an indebtedness due and owing it by W. R. Ramsdell."

The record before us is vague as to how or by whom the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock were transferred on the books of that company to the Arizona company. If the stock has been sold by the bank as pledgee, at a pledgee's sale, regularly conducted, and to an innocent purchaser for value and without notice, and thus has come into the possession of the Arizona company, it may be that that corporation has received an unimpeachable title to the 100 shares, freed from all claim on the part of the California company. As to this, however, the record before us furnishes no information, and we have no means of knowing what is the basis of the Arizona company's assertion of title, save this, that defendants, in their answers, allege that—

"On or about the 29th day of June, 1911, said Blochman, for a valuable consideration to him moving, sold, assigned, and transferred all his rights in and to said stock and the whole thereof to the Pedrara Onyx Company, hereinbefore designated as the Arizona corporation, and caused a delivery thereof to be made to said last-named corporation, and said stock was transferred on the books of said Mexican corporation to said Arizona corporation."

As already stated, the trial court, after plaintiffs had introduced their evidence and rested, granted a nonsuit in favor of defendants Smith, Lea, and the Arizona company. From the formal judgment of nonsuit, entered August 13, 1915, plaintiffs have appealed. After the entry of the judgment of nonsuit, the case was continued as to the remaining defendants, the Mexican company, the California company, on whose behalf the suit is being prosecuted, and Blochman; and on February 4, 1916, a judgment on the merits was entered as to these last-named defendants. By this judgment, the trial court adjudged and decreed: (1) That plaintiffs take nothing as to the Mexican company; (2) that the California company did not acquire or become the owner of the 100 shares of the capital stock of the Mexican company, by virtue of the transaction of July 3, 1906, between it and Blochman; (3) that the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, adopted by the board of directors of the California company, was illegal and void, and that it be set aside and declared void as to the defendant Blochman; (4) that defendant Blochman did not receive anything of value by reason of the transaction at the meeting of the board of directors of the California corporation on June 27, 1911, and that, therefore, plaintiffs and the California company take nothing as against the defendant Blochman; and (5) that plaintiffs recover their costs against the California corporation. Plaintiffs appeal from this judgment.

The principal question presented for our decision is this: Did the California company, by reason of its acceptance of Blochman's oral offer to exchange the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock for all the shares of the California company, and Blochman's subsequent written confirmation of the exchange, acquire any title to or interest in the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock?

For the purposes of these appeals, it may be assumed that the California company did not acquire any title to the 4 shares that had been issued by the Mexican company to Blochman's four codirectors. As to the remaining 96 shares, the California company, like the purchaser of any kind of personal property, could waive the deficiency in quantity and elect to receive and hold the 96 shares that stood in Blochman's name—the one that stood in his name individually and the 95 that stood in his name as trustee. Did the California company acquire any title to these 96 shares of the capital stock of the Mexican company? If it did, then as to at least three of the defendants, the three corporations, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a retrial of the issues respecting the ownership of this stock.

Respondents contend: (1) That because the stock certificates were held by the Blochman Banking Company as pledgee, and Blochman did not indorse and deliver the certificates to the California company, the attempted exchange of stock was a nullity; (2) that Blochman's offer of July 3, 1906, and the California company's acceptance thereof, was not an executed contract of exchange, but only an executory agreement to exchange, under which no title passed; and (3) that Blochman did not own the stock of the Mexican company. In our opinion none of these contentions is tenable.

[1] Shares of stock are personal property, and there is no reason why, as between the parties, they cannot be transferred as any other personal property. Shares in a corporation are a species of incorporeal property. They exist independently of any certificate. And though it is not uncommon to hear persons speak of the certificate itself as the "stock," nevertheless, the certificate that evidences the shares is but the paper representative of the incorporeal right, and stands on a footing similar to that of other muniments of title. It is not in itself the property, but is merely the symbol or paper evidence of the property, and the property right may exist without the certificate. A share of stock being an incorporeal right, incapable of manual delivery, and the certificate being nothing more than evidence of its existence, it is obvious that, in the absence of any controlling statutory inhibition, the shares, without an assignment or delivery of the certificate, may be assigned in any manner appropriate to the transfer of incorporeal personal property, as, for example, by a bill of sale, or any mode that will suffice to pass title to a chose in action or intangible property. The jus disponendi in shares of stock is an incident of ownership, and may be exercised in any manner not prohibited by law. Lipscomb's Adm'r v. Condon, 56 W. Va. 416, 49 S. E. 392, 67 L. R. A. 670, 107 Am. St. Rep. 938.

[2] But, say counsel for respondents, where, as here, certificates, evidencing title to the shares, have been issued, section 324 of the Civil Code prohibits a transfer by any made other than by an indorsement and delivery of the certificates. That section reads:

"Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock, except as hereinafter provided, are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor, * * * and delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by whom and to whom transferred, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer."

This section of the Code is intended for the protection of the corporation and those who claim under the persons to whom the certificates were originally issued. The section clearly does not cover the whole subject of transfer. Corporate stock would be transferable without such provision as that contained in this particular Code section. Civ. Code, § 1044. Says the court in Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 327, 163 Pac. 54, speaking through Mr. Justice Shaw:

"The provision merely prescribes a mode by which the transfer may be made. It does not prohibit a transfer by other methods, nor declare that when made in another manner a transfer may not be enforced by the party entitled to the shares."

This language of the court accords with the generally accepted rule that if a mode of assignment is provided by statute, such statutory mode is cumulative, in the absence of express words inhibiting other modes of assignment. Gardner v. Mobile, etc., R. R. Co., 102 Ala. 635, 15 South. 271, 48 Am. St. Rep. 84; 5 Corpus Juris, 898–899. For these reasons we are satisfied that even where, as here, certificates have been issued, a transfer of title, good as between the parties thereto, may be made in manner other than that recognized as a lawful mode of transfer by section 324; that a transfer of title, good as between the parties, may be made in any manner appropriate to the assignment of choses in action or intangible personal property, and that the mode adopted by the California company and Blochman on July 3, 1906, confirmed by Blochman's written instrument of July 7, 1906, was sufficient, as between the parties thereto, to transfer to the California company whatever title Blochman may then have had in the 100 shares, or any of them.

[3] It may be that the legal title did not pass. As to this it is not necessary to express an opinion. But if the legal title did not pass, the full equitable title did, subject, of course, to the special property that had previously vested in the pledgee, if, as claimed by respondents, the California company, at the date of the contract of exchange, had notice, actual or constructive, of the prior pledge to the Blochman Banking Company. Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, supra; Tregear v. Etiwanda Water Co., 76 Cal. 537, 18 Pac. 658, 9 Am. St. Rep. 245; Johnson v. Kirby, 65 Cal. 482, 486, 4 Pac. 458; Lipscomb's Adm'r v. Condon, supra; Hubbard v. George, 81 W. Va. 538, 94 S. E. 974, L. R. A. 1918C, 835; Manchester St. Ry. v. Williams, 71 N. H. 312, 52 Atl. 461; Baldwin v. Canfield, 26 Minn. 43, 1 N. W. 261, 276; Prince Inv. Co. v. St. Paul, etc., L. Co., 68 Minn. 121 70 N. W. 1079; Colton v. Williams, 65 Ill. App. 466; Richardson v. Longmont, etc., Co., 19 Colo. App. 490, 76 Pac. 546; Equitable Securities Co. v. Johnson, 36 Colo. 377, 85 Pac. 840; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313; Curtis v. Crossley, 59 N. J. Eq. 358, 45 Atl. 905. Though not all the cases we have cited are directly in point, all lend support to the conclusion at which we have arrived.

[4] Blochman's offer of July 3, 1906, to exchange the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock for all the shares of the California company, and the California company's acceptance of the offer, coupled with Blochman's written confirmation of the exchange on July 7, 1906, was not an executory agreement to sell or to exchange, but was a completed or executed contract of exchange, whereby, as between the parties to the exchange, whatever title Blochman possessed passed to and vested in the California company.

There was an unconditional offer to exchange and an immediate and unequivocal acceptance of that offer. Upon the acceptance of the offer a completed contract came into being. That contract, in our opinion, was a contract of exchange, not a contract to exchange. "The provisions of the title on sale apply to exchanges." Civ. Code, § 1806. "The title to personal property, sold or exchanged passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not." Here the "thing" exchanged, stock of the Mexican company, was identified.

[5] Did the parties agree upon a present transfer? In determining whether title has or has not passed, the primary consideration is one of intention. In each case the agreement is what the parties intended to make it. Their intention is to be gathered from the terms of the contract and such attendant circumstances as may legitimately be considered as evidencing the intention. Certain rules have been established for determining whether a contract is a contract of sale or an agreement to sell—rules that are applicable to exchanges as well as to sales. These rules are well stated by the United States Supreme Court in the Elgee Cotton Cases, 22 Wall. 180, 188, 22 L. Ed. 863. Two of these rules have no application here, as they refer to those steps necessary to put the property into a deliverable state, or a determination of the price by weighing, measuring, and testing. The third only is significant. It is there stated in these words:

"Where the buyer is by the contract bound to do anything as a consideration, either precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer."

Here the contract of exchange did not require either party to do anything, precedent of concurrent, on which the passing of the property was to depend. Nothing remained to be done by Blochman. He had 96 shares standing on the books of the Mexican company in his name—1 in his name individually and 95 in his name as trustee. These 96 shares he, presumably, could have had transferred on the books of the Mexican company to the name of the California company, even if it would be necessary to cause the transfer to show that it was made subject to the prior pledge to the bank.

[6] As between the parties, delivery is not essential to a contract of sale or exchange and the passing of title. Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 528, 77 Pac. 471. See, also, Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 337, 162 Pac. 1042.

Mr. Benjamin states the rule to be that—

"The presumption of law is that the contract is an actual sale, if the specific thing is agreed on, and it is ready for immediate delivery." Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 311.

"When there has been no manifestation of a contrary intention, the presumption of law is that the contract is an actual sale, and that the transfer of title takes place at once in advance of actual delivery, if the thing is agreed on, and is ready for immediate delivery." 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (2d Ed.) p. 1051.

Mr. Cook states the law thus:

"Generally the sale of stock is attended with an immediate delivery of the certificate therefor, or it is agreed that the certificate shall be delivered at some specific time in the future. If however, the vendor offers to sell his stock and the vendee accepts the offer, the contract is complete, and binds both parties, although nothing has been said as to the time when the certificate of stock shall be delivered."

[7] Further than this, Blochman, on July 7, 1906, by what we have called his written confirmation of the contract of exchange, uses language that unmistakably indicates his intention that the transaction should constitute an exchange in præsenti. He says:

"* * * L. A. Blochman, of San Diego, Cal., hereby exchanges and agrees to transfer at once one hundred shares of the [Mexican company] * * * being all of the stock of said company."

The language "L. A. Blochman * * * hereby exchanges" is not the language of an executory contract to exchange. It is the language of an executed contract of exchange, whereby an instant and immediate transfer of title is effected. It is true the words "hereby exchanges"—words importing a transfer eo instanti—are followed by the words "and agrees to transfer at once"—words that look to action in the future, even though it be the immediate future. However, the two expressions, one importing present action and the other looking to immediate future action, are in no wise inconsistent. For, without doubt, the word "transfer," used in the phrase "agrees to transfer at once one hundred shares," was intended by the parties to refer to a transfer on the books—a transfer or registration to be made "at once," in order that the exchange, already effected in fact and good as between the parties, might become effective as to all the world.

Moreover, Blochman, in his confirmatory writing of July 7, 1906, further says that he "also sells" to the California company "the option to purchase twenty-five thousand shares of the preferred stock and seventy-two thousand three hundred shares of the common stock" of that company for $160,000. By thus giving the California company the option to repurchase its shares for a stated sum, Blochman treated himself as the owner of the stock that he was to get in the exchange, thus showing that he understood that there already had been consummated an executed and completed contract of exchange whereby he had become the owner of the California company's capital stock, and, as such owner, could give that company an optional right to repurchase. Indeed, the whole course of conduct of the parties, at the date of the exchange and for a considerable period of time thereafter, points unerringly to the fact that it was their intention that the contract, from the time it was consummated by the California company's acceptance of Blochman's offer, should be an executed contract of exchange, under which title passed from one party to the other. The foregoing reasoning and our conclusion that, as between the parties, there was a present transfer of title, find support in the following authorities: Mason v. Lievre, 145 Cal. 514, 78 Pac. 1040; Majors v. Girdner, 31 Cal. App. 47, 159 Pac. 826; Beardsley v. Beardsley, 138 U. S. 262, 11 Sup. Ct. 318, 34 L. Ed. 928; State v. Whited & Wheless, 104 La. 125, 28 South. 922.

[8, 9] There is no merit in the contention that at the date of the exchange, July 3, 1906, Blochman did not own any of the stock of the Mexican company. Without doubt, he owned, at that time, the 1 share that stood on the books of the company in his name, subject, of course, to any right the Blochman Banking Company may have possessed as pledgee. As to the 95 shares that stood in the name of "L. A. Blochman, trustee," the addition of the word "trustee" does not necessarily and alone raise an implication that Blochman did not have the full right to deal with the stock as his own. Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99; Northwestern P. C. Co. v. Atlantic P. C. Co., 174 Cal. 308, 163 Pac. 47. The fact that 4 of the shares of the Mexican company's capital stock were owned by other parties, and that but 96 of the 100 shares stood in Blochman's name, either individually or as trustee, affords no reason for holding that title to none of the shares passed to the California company. If, under the contract of exchange, the California company could have insisted that it had bargained for and purchased all of the 100 shares, nevertheless, if it saw fit, it could accept, in fulfillment of the contract, fewer than 100 shares, and it would not lie with Blochman to complain or to evade his obligation because he did not or could not comply strictly with his contract. Dennison v. Chapman, 105 Cal. 447, 454, 455, 39 Pac. 61.

[10] The trial court found that all of the 100 shares had been pledged to the Blochman Banking Company. If, as that court found, this pledge was made to the bank, then when the pledge was made the bank, to whom all the certificates had been delivered as pledgee, became vested with a legal interest, a "special property," notwithstanding the pledge was not entered on the books of the Mexican company. Northwestern P. C. Co. v. Atlantic P. C. Co., supra; Fowles v. National Bank, 167 Cal. 658, 140 Pac. 271. "It is not the law of this state, nor is it the law generally, that a transfer upon the books of the corporation is essential to the creation of a valid pledge." Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 278, 45 Pac. 329, 331 (33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348).

[11] This pledge was good as against the California company, a subsequent purchaser, if the latter had notice of the pledge at the time when it and Blochman effected the exchange of shares on July 3, 1906. Weston v. Bear River, etc., Co., 6 Cal. 425; Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, supra, 113 Cal. 296, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348; Seymour v. Salsberry, 177 Cal. 755, 171 Pac. 938. The trial court made no finding upon the question of notice to the California company of the prior pledge to the Blochman Banking Company. Upon this question of notice, there is a decided conflict in the evidence. Two witnesses for defendants, Smith and Blochman, testified positively that, at the first meeting of the board of directors of the California company, the directors of that company were told that the 100 shares of the Mexican company had been pledged to the Blochman Banking Company to secure an indebtedness due the bank. This was as flatly denied by witnesses for the plaintiffs. Aside from the direct evidence of actual notice to the California company, as given by defendants' witnesses, the trial court could have weighed and considered any circumstances tending to impart constructive notice to the California company. Whether such circumstances, if any there be, were sufficient to put that company on inquiry and thus impart notice to it, as a subsequent assignee, was, and on any retrial will be, a question of fact for the trial court. Northwestern P. C. Co. v. Atlantic P. C. Co., supra.

[12] From the foregoing it follows that if, at the date of the exchange, July 3, 1906, the California company had notice of the prior pledge to the Blochman Banking Company, then the only title that passed to the California company was such as remained in Blochman as pledgor. On the other hand, if the California company did not have notice of the pledge, or notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent person upon inquiry, it took whatever title Blochman had to the shares free and unincumbered by any claim of the bank as pledgee. In either case, however, the California company would receive some title under its contract of exchange with Blochman. For, even if that company did take the 100 shares, or any one of them, subject to the prior pledge to the bank and subject to the special property vested in the bank as pledgee, still the general property would remain in the pledgor, and that general property, to the extent that it was vested in Blochman at the date of the exchange, July 3, 1906, would, in that case, pass to the California company.

For these reasons, we conclude that the court erred in finding, as it did, that no title to the shares of the Mexican company passed to the California company by reason of the contract of exchange whereby Blochman, on July 3, 1906, exchanged the Mexican company's shares for all of the stock of the California company.

It will be the duty of the trial court, on a retrial of the question of ownership, to determine just what title, if any, did pass to the California company. If the 100 shares were pledged, as claimed by defendants, and if, at the date of the contract of exchange, July 3, 1906, the California company had actual notice of such pledge, or actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent person upon inquiry, so that by prosecuting such inquiry such person might have learned of the pledge, then, on such retrial, the court should find that, as between Blochman and the California company, the latter became vested with title to such shares as Blochman owned, subject, however, to the prior pledge and the right of the pledgee to sell and convey to a purchaser, at a pledgee's sale, full title to so much of the stock as might be necessary to satisfy the indebtedness secured by the pledge. If, on the other hand, the court shall find that there was no pledge, or that the California company had no notice thereof, actual or constructive, then, on such retrial, it will be the duty of the court to find that, as between Blochman and the California company, the latter took title to all shares owned by Blochman, unincumbered by any prior pledge to the Blochman Banking Company. It also will be necessary, on such retrial, to determine whether the Arizona company was an innocent purchaser, for value and without notice, either from the pledgee, under a pledgee's sale, or otherwise. If it was an innocent purchaser, for value and without notice, then the Arizona company, as between it and its transferor, would acquire the title—a title unincumbered and free of all prior assignments of which it had no notice, actual or constructive.

[13] It does not necessarily follow from the foregoing that plaintiffs are entitled to relief as against all the defendants, or even all the relief prayed for as against any of the defendants, even if it be a fact that the California company, under its contract of exchange with Blochman, became vested with some title to the 100 shares. By their complaint plaintiffs pray that the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, be annulled. This relief was granted. The judgment declares that "the transaction entered into by the board of directors" of the California company and Blochman "on the 27th day of June, 1911, was illegal and void," and adjudges that it be and is "set aside and declared void." Plaintiffs, by their complaint, also pray that Blochman, Smith, Lea, and the Arizona company be required to account for everything received by them under the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911. This claim rests upon the erroneous theory that the 100 shares, or property of some kind, repassed from the California company to Blochman as a necessary result of the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911. This is an untenable theory. No shares of stock, or rights of any kind, that may have passed to the California company under the contract of exchange of July 3, 1906, could or did revest in Blochman by reason of the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, though many of appellants' claims are based upon the erroneous assumption that, by this rescinding resolution, the California company was wrongfully deprived of valuable property rights.

In the first place, notwithstanding Blochman's written notice of rescission on June 27, 1911, and the board's consent thereto, as expressed in the resolution complained of, appear, upon their face, to constitute a mutual rescission of a contract that had been entered into by Blochman and the California company on July 3, 1906, it is at least doubtful if the transaction of June 27, 1911, can be regarded as a rescission, or even an attempted rescission, of the contract of exchange found by the trial court to be the contract that actually was made on July 3, 1906. By his written communication of June 27, 1911, Blochman, after reciting that, on July 3, 1906, he had contracted to transfer to the California company all of the stock of the Mexican company for the sum of $160,000, proceeds to say that he gives notice that he rescinds "said contract for the sale of said stock * * * for one hundred and sixty thousand dollars." The board acted upon this notice of rescission by adopting the resolution of June 27, 1911, wherein it is recited that the board consents to a rescission of "said contract." There seems, therefore, to be ground for the contention that the transaction of June 27, 1911—the transaction evidenced by Blochman's written notice that he rescinds a contract for the sale of the shares of the Mexican company for $160,000, and the California company's resolution consenting to such rescission—was but an attempted rescission of a phantom contract, a contract that never was made. According to the court's findings, the contract that actually was made on July 3, 1906, was not the contract recited in Blochman's notice of rescission or in the board's resolution consenting thereto, but an entirely different contract.

But even if, for the purposes of this decision, we assume that, by the transaction of June 27, 1911, Blochman and the board of directors of the California company did mutually agree to rescind the contract that actually was made on July 3, 1906—the executed contract of exchange—nevertheless, that alone would not suffice to revest Blochman with title to the stock or with any property right that might be an incident of title to the stock. It appears from the resolution adopted by the board that it was the intention of the parties that something more than Blochman's mere notice of rescission and the board's consent thereto should be necessary before Blochman was to be revested with title to the stock. The board, by what we have termed the "rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911," resolved that "the officers of this corporation be authorized to make, execute and deliver all the necessary documents to carry out the purpose and spirit of this resolution." No actual or manual redelivery of the shares to Blochman was possible; such intangible property cannot be the subject of manual delivery. No constructive or symbolical redelivery of the shares by delivery of the certificates was possible, for the California company held no certificate of stock that it could redeliver to Blochman. The certificates were in the possession of the Blochman Banking Company, that claimed the stock as pledgee. And there is no evidence that title revested in Blochman through the execution by the California company of any document of any kind for the purpose of carrying out the "purpose and spirit" of the rescinding resolution. There was no deed, bill of sale, assignment, or other mode of transfer to Blochman, or to any of his associates. Unless, therefore, the purported rescission of June 27, 1911, ipso facto operated to retransfer the title to Blochman, there is no basis for an accounting or for any claim of damages based upon the theory that, solely by reason of the transaction of June 27, 1911, Blochman and his codefendants Smith, Lea, and the Arizona company became vested with title to property that rightfully belongs to the California company. Therefore, assuming that, by the transaction of June 27, 1911, there was a mutual rescission of the contract of exchange as actually made on July 3, 1906, the question that presents itself is: Did that rescission, ipso facto, effect a retransfer of title to Blochman?

[14] Where, for any reason, the title of a vendee has not been perfected, or where the contract, in any respect, remains executory, the idea of a rescission is quite appropriate; for rescission is nothing more nor less than the unmaking of a contract. But if a contract of sale or of exchange has been fully executed, and nothing remains to be done thereunder by either party thereto, the contract has fulfilled its purpose, and merely rescinding it by the mutual consent of the parties, i. e., unmaking it by mutual consent, will not alone and ipso facto, in the absence of an intent to effect a restoration of title solely by reason of the rescission, restore to either of the parties that which he may have parted with under the fully executed contract. Of course, if the sale or exchange is legally rescinded by the judgment of a judicial tribunal on account of fraud, mistake, undue influence, etc., the whole sale or exchange thereby becomes nullified ab initio; and in that case the property sold or exchanged is considered as never having been changed. But when the sale or exchange is honestly and fairly made, and perfected by a transfer of the title, so that the property in the article sold or exchanged is completely changed, an agreement of the parties thereafter made to rescind the contract, or to give up the bargain, as it often is expressed, amounts to no more than an executory agreement to resell or re-exchange, unless it shall appear that it was the intention of the parties that the rescission alone should operate as a completely executed contract of resale or of re-exchange. If such intention does not appear, then whatever was necessary in the first instance to constitute the original sale or exchange a legal transfer of the property is equally necessary to effect the resale or re-exchange.

[15] In short, whether the mutual rescission of the original contract of sale or contract of exchange ipso facto effects a resale or re-exchange depends, in the last analysis, upon the intention of the parties. For, unless a contrary intent appear, the mutual rescission of a fully executed contract of sale is but the equivalent of an independent agreement by the buyer to reconvey the property, and a similar independent agreement by the seller to repay whatever money may have been paid him, and title will not revest in the seller until the buyer has made a reconveyance or a redelivery with whatever formalities were necessary to pass the title in the first instance. If, therefore, from the language used by the parties to the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911, read in the light of all the attendant circumstances, it appears that it was their intention that further formalities should be had in order to effect a re-exchange, the property did not ipso facto repass upon the making of the rescission agreement, but, to accomplish that result, the further formalities contemplated by the parties were necessary. Quincy v. Tilton, 5 Me. 277; Blanchard v. Trim, 38 N. Y. 225; Hornberger v. Feder, 30 Misc. Rep. 121, 61 N. Y. Supp. 865; Klein v. Rector, 57 Miss. 538; Miller v. Smith, 1 Mason. 437, Fed. Cas. No. 9,590; Folsom v. Cornell, 150 Mass. 118, 22 N. E. 705; 35 Cyc. 129. In Quincy v. Tilton, supra, the court stated the rule as follows:

"* * * When the sale or exchange is fairly and honestly made and perfected by delivery, the property is completely changed in the articles which are the subject of the sale or exchange; and if, after this, the parties agree to give up the bargain, as it is often expressed, and place things as they stood before it was made, * * * this object can only be effected by what, in legal contemplation, amounts to a resale or re-exchange; and whatever was necessary to constitute the original sale or exchange a legal transfer of the property from one of the parties to the other is equally necessary to constitute a legal resale or re-exchange."

The provision in the resolution of the California company's board of directors, authorizing the officers of the corporation to execute and deliver all necessary documents to carry out the spirit and purpose of the resolution, evidences an intention that something further was to be done to effect a retransfer of the title.

[16] Moreover, even if we assume that the transaction of June 27, 1911, was an attempted "rescission" of the contract of exchange as actually made on July 3, 1906, still that transaction was something more than a mere "rescission." A "rescission," and no more, would have restored each party to the status quo. But Blochman accompanied his notice of rescission with an alternative proposal, under which he was to receive more than a mere return of the shares of the Mexican company. This alternative proposal was accepted by the California company's board of directors in the board's resolution of June 27, 1911. By this acceptance of Blochman's alternative proposal there was created, not an agreement for the restoration of the status quo, but an executory agreement—an executory agreement whereby each party agreed to convey certain things to the other. It appears from the terms of Blochman's alternative proposal and the board resolution of acceptance, that it was the intention of the parties that title should not pass as to any of the several articles or things mentioned in the alternative proposal until each had done what he or it had undertaken to do. For example, by its acceptance of Blochman's alternative proposal, the California company agreed to pay the former $5,000, and Blochman agreed to release all claim to certain of the shares of the California company's capital stock, and keep the balance. This was an executory agreement. It never did become an executed contract of sale or of exchange. It was not intended that there should be an executed contract of sale or exchange until the appropriate officers of the California company should do what the resolution authorized them to do, namely, execute and deliver "all the necessary documents of every kind, nature and description to carry out the purpose and spirit of this resolution."

For these reasons we think that whatever title to the 100 shares may have passed to the California company under the exchange contract of July 3, 1906, still remains in that company, and that it has not been divested of any title by the rescinding resolution of June 27, 1911.

This being the situation, there is no basis for an accounting or for any claim of damages as against the defendants Smith, Lea, Blochman, and the Arizona company; and since the evidence and defendants' pleadings show that Smith, Lea, and Blochman make no claim to the stock, the judgment, as to them, should be affirmed.

We think, however, that there are averments in the complaint sufficient to entitle plaintiffs, on behalf of the California company, to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel the Mexican company so to register the shares upon its books as that their registration shall show correctly the nature and extent of whatever title thereto, if any, the California company may possess. In their prayer for relief, plaintiffs not only pray for general relief, but specifically ask that the shares of the Mexican company's capital stock be transferred to the California company on the books of the Mexican company. Where, as in this case, there is an answer to the complaint, the court may grant the plaintiff any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues. Code Civ. Proc. § 580. For the purpose of such relief the Arizona company is a proper, if not a necessary, party defendant; and for that reason it was error to grant its motion for a nonsuit.

[17] It is an established doctrine of equity jurisprudence that the true owner of stock may resort to a court of equity to compel the corporation to register on the books a transfer of the stock and to issue to him a new certificate; for it is the owner's right to cause the corporation's books to show truthfully the real title or claim of each and every person having any lawful interest in the stock. In such an action it is proper to bring before the court as parties to the suit all persons having an interest in the stock, whether legal or equitable, in order that they may be bound by the decree, and further litigation prevented. Howard v. Corey, 126 Ala. 283, 28 South. 682; Thornton v. Martin, 116 Ga. 115, 42 S. E. 348.

[18] Here, the California company (a claimant of the stock on whose behalf the action is prosecuted), the Arizona company (also a claimant of the stock), and the Mexican company (the corporation that is to be compelled to enter a registration that will truthfully set forth the ownership of the stock and of every lawful interest therein) are necessary parties to any determination of the question of title to the 100 shares of the Mexican company's capital stock. Moreover, it would seem that the presence of the Blochman Banking Company, as claimant of a pledgee's special property, is necessary to a complete determination of the controversy, and that therefore the court, sua sponte, should make an order under section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure directing the bank to be brought into the action as a party defendant.

From the foregoing it follows that the case should be remanded for a retrial upon the single issue of title to the 100 shares of the capital stock of the Mexican company, and the latter company directed so to register the shares that its books shall correctly show the ownership; and, if it be found that more than one person or corporation is interested in the stock, that the company's books shall be made to show correctly the several interests of all rival claimants.

As to Blochman, Smith, and Lea, each of the judgments appealed from is affirmed. As to defendants New Pedrara Onyx Company (the Mexican company) and New Pedrara Mexican Onyx Company (the California company), the judgment in case No. 3011—the judgment of February 4, 1916—is reversed, and, as to them, the cause is remanded for a retrial of the issues respecting the ownership and proper registration of the 100 shares. As to the defendant Pedrara Onyx Company (the Arizona company) the judgment in case No. 3053—the judgment of nonsuit—is reversed, and, as to that defendant, the cause is remanded for a retrial of the issues respecting the ownership and proper registration of the 100 shares.

BANK OF NAPA v. FERGUSON BURNS ESTATE, Inc. (Civ. 2137.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, Division 1, California. June 26, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1920.)

1. Pledges ⇐23—Lien for optional advances is subject to execution levied before advances were made.

The lien of a pledge given to secure future advances made by a corporation which had not bound itself to make such advances is subject to the lien of an execution levied after the pledge, but before advances were in fact made.

2. Corporations ⇐123(9)—Evidence held to show pledgee made binding agreement for advances, so that lien was prior to execution.

In an action to recover corporate stock by the purchaser at execution sale, evidence held to sustain a finding that the corporation had made a binding agreement to advance money to the stockholder at the time the stock was pledged to the corporation, so that the lien of the pledge was prior to that of the execution, though the advances were not in fact made until after the execution was levied, and the corporation had no record of the agreement.

3. Corporations ⇐59 — Record of corporate acts and resolutions not essential.

It is not essential to the validity of corporate acts and resolutions that they be recorded in the minutes of the corporation.

4. Pledges ⇐23—Lien for subsequent advances under prior binding agreement is entitled to priority.

The lien of a pledge for future advances has priority over the lien of execution levied on the pledged property subsequent to the pledge, but before the advances were made, if the pledgee had obligated itself to make the advances.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Napa against the Ferguson Burns Estate, Incorporated. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U'Ren & Beard, of Napa, and O. G. Hopkins, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to recover judgment: (1) That plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation, standing on the books of said corporation, on the 23d day of June, 1915, in the name of Dorothy A. Lawson, formerly Dorothy A. Burns; (2) that defendant be ordered and directed to cancel the certificate for said 30,000 shares and to issue a new certificate therefor to this plaintiff; (3) that in the event said stock cannot be transferred on the books of the company, plaintiff have judgment against defendant for $30,000, the value of said shares of stock. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant for costs, and this appeal is prosecuted by plaintiff from said judgment.

It was alleged in the complaint that on January 30, 1915, in an action pending in the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento, a judgment was recovered by plaintiff against Dorothy A. Lawson for the sum of $9,485.56; that on June 21, 1915, an execution was issued out of said court, directed to the sheriff of Sacramento county, who on the 23d of June levied said execution upon defendant corporation, garnishing all of the capital stock of said corporation owned by and standing on the books of said corporation in the name of Dorothy A. Lawson. Plaintiff alleged, on information and belief, that at the time of the levy of said execution Dorothy A. Lawson was the owner of 30,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, represented by stock certificate No. 2. It was then alleged that on the 10th of November, 1915, the sheriff gave due notice of the sale of said stock at public auction on November 19, 1915, at which time said stock was sold to plaintiff for $3,000, which was the highest, best and only bid therefor; that in December, 1915, demand was made upon defendant to cancel said old certificate and to issue a new one to plaintiff for said 30,000 shares of stock, which defendant refused to do. The value of said stock was alleged to be $30,000.

The court found:

"(I) That on the 23d of June, 1915, Dorothy A. Lawson was the owner of 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant, as evidenced by certificate No. 2, and had been such owner since the 14th day of November, 1914, and remained such owner until the 29th day of October, 1915. That her ownership of said stock was subject to a pledge as hereinafter more particularly found; said stock having been pledged to the defendant on the 14th day of November, 1914.

"(II) That on the 14th day of November, 1914, the said Dorothy A. Lawson was the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest in certain real and personal property, some of the same belonging at that time to the estate of Ferguson Burns, deceased, and some to the estate of Mary Burns, deceased; the said Dorothy A. Lawson being an heir at law and devisee of both Ferguson Burns and Mary Burns, she being a daughter of them, they having been her parents, and at such time her interest in said properties was mortgaged to sundry persons for the purpose of securing the indebtedness owing by her to them, in the sum of $6,986.21, with interest thereon, as was agreed to be paid. That the co-owners of the said Dorothy A. Lawson at said time, who were likewise heirs and devisees in the same character as aforesaid averred, were her four sisters, Charlotte M. Flood, Irene E. Cochran, Myrtle T. Caldwell, and Elinor Burns." That the interests of Irene E. Cochran and Myrtle T. Caldwell were likewise mortgaged to secure indebtednesses owing by them to sundry persons. "That it became necessary, before the estate above referred to could be closed, that an additional sum of money be borrowed for the purpose of paying debts and claims against each of said decedents, as well as the expenses of administration, and therefore, on or about the 9th day of November, 1914, it was agreed among the said five heirs at law and devisees that a corporation should be formed, to be known as Ferguson Burns Estate, Incorporated, to which corporation all of the respective interests of the said persons named be transferred, and that the said corporation in consideration of such transfer should borrow a sufficient sum of money to pay the existing claims against each of said decedents, as well as the expenses of administration remaining unpaid, and also the indebtednesses of said Dorothy A. Lawson, Irene E. Cochran, and Myrtle T. Caldwell, and thereupon 30,000 shares of stock should be issued to each one of the incorporators," and that each of the last three named would then be indebted to said corporation for the sum of money owing by her and mortgaged upon her interest, and that she should pledge her stock to the corporation as security therefor. That said agreement was carried into effect, and in August, 1915, said corporation, having borrowed money, paid the indebtedness owing by each of said three persons. That, pursuant to said agreement, said Dorothy A. Lawson pledged her 30,000 shares of stock, represented by certificate No. 2, to the corporation to secure her indebtedness so paid off and discharged by the corporation. "The issuance of said stock to the said Dorothy A. Lawson, and the pledge thereof to the said corporation, and the agreement to pay her said indebtedness, and the transfer of her interest in said estates to defendant was a simultaneous transaction; but the said Dorothy A. Lawson never had the possession or control of the said 30,000 shares of stock, or any part thereof, or said certificate No. 2, or any other certificate, and the same was never issued to her, except as herein found."

Finding III was that the capital stock of defendant consisted of 150,000 shares, of the par value of $1 each, all of which were issued on November 14, 1914.

"(IV) On the 20th day of October, 1915, the said Dorothy A. Lawson was in default in the payment of her obligation to the said corporation, and on the 20th day of October, 1915, the corporation served upon the said Dorothy A. Lawson a demand for the performance of said obligation," which she refused and neglected to pay, and on said 20th day of October the defendant gave notice of the time and place of the sale of said 30,000 shares of stock, which was posted in three public places and personally served upon said Dorothy A. Lawson. That on the 29th day of October, 1915, at the time and place named, said shares of stock were sold at public auction to Irene E. Cochran, Myrtle T. Caldwell, and Elinor Burns for the sum of $7,067.71, "the same being the amount of the pledge indebtedness then owing from said Dorothy A. Lawson to the said corporation, and they being the highest and best bidders therefor," whereupon said certificate No. 2 was canceled, and a new certificate, numbered 6, was issued to the purchasers, who since said 29th day of October, 1915, have been the owners of said shares, and who immediately pledged the new certificate to the corporation to secure the existing indebtedness of said three purchasers to the corporation.

In finding V it was found that "plaintiff never has had, and does not now have, any right, title, interest, lien, or claim therein of any kind whatsoever."

Finding VI: "That at the time of the levy of the writ of execution referred to in the complaint, and at the time of the alleged sale under said writ, plaintiff knew that certificate No. 2 for 30,000 shares of stock was held by defendant corporation as a pledge, and had knowledge of the sale of said stock by the corporation to Irene E. Cochran, Myrtle T. Caldwell, and Elinor Burns. That on November 19, 1915, plaintiff knew that certificate No. 2 had been canceled and a new certificate issued in lieu thereof to the three parties last above named."

Finding VII: "That the said stock, or any stock, or the right, title, and interest of Dorothy A Lawson therein, was never levied upon or attached," as alleged in the complaint, "and no lien of any kind in favor of the said plaintiff, or in favor of the sheriff of the county of Sacramento, attached to the said, or any, shares of stock of Dorothy A. Lawson, or any of her right, title, and interest in and to the same."

As shown above, the court found that the attempted levy by appellant was ineffectual and invalid; but we may forego a consideration of that question since it is admitted in the opening brief that, if there was a pledge of said stock to said corporation, as found by the court, the judgment must be affirmed. Furthermore, it is conceded that the validity and sufficiency of the pledge must be determined by the answer to the question whether the promise by the corporation to pay the debts of Dorothy A. Lawson was absolute or conditional; in other words, whether it created an obligation or expressed a mere option. We may quote from appellant's brief as follows:

"The question then arises: When did defendant's alleged pledge lien attach, on November 11, 1914, or on August 25, 1915, when the money was paid? If the former, it was a superior lien to plaintiff's. If the latter it was a lien subsequent to that of plaintiff. * * * The pledge must rest, if at all, upon the proposition that on November 11, 1914, the corporation entered into an obligatory contract with Dorothy to make future advances on her behalf. * * * The understanding with Dorothy, as testified to by defendant's witnesses, was nothing more nor less than that the corporation would some time in the future, when it was able to make a loan and if it was able to make a loan, pay these debts of Dorothy. At no time between November 11, 1914, and August 25, 1915, was Dorothy in a position to compel defendant to pay her debts. In other words, she had nothing but a conditional understanding with defendant corporation, which they were not obliged to carry out, unless they saw fit to do so. The agreement, then, between Dorothy and the corporation, was merely an optional agreement for future advances."

[1, 2] If it was a mere optional agreement, as claimed by appellant, then the conclusion would follow, of course, that it could not operate to defeat a valid lien created by the levy of an execution made before the option was exercised. The authorities upon this point are cited by appellant, but the legal principle is not controverted by respondent. The trouble is, though, that in the testimony of the two distinguished members of the bar, who were witnesses for defendant, is found support for the theory that the corporation, at the time of the creation of the pledge, obligated itself to make such future advances; and the finding, based upon such testimony, cannot and should not be set aside by this court. It may be admitted that certain expressions may be found therein, which, apart from the context, lend some color to appellant's contention; but a fair consideration of the whole of the testimony leads to the conviction that the deduction therefrom made in the court below is not irrational.

Herein we may call attention to a portion of the testimony of Mr. Butler. After detailing a proposed arrangement for an adjustment of the financial affairs of the two estates, in which the incorporators were the devisees and legatees, and which scheme, after further consideration, was abandoned as impracticable, the witness said:

"The plan of operation was practically reversed. Instead of the corporation giving notes to those that had not borrowed upon their equities, those that had borrowed were to have their debts paid by the corporation, and were to reimburse—to make the corporation secure by giving the corporation notes for the amounts and by pledging their stock. Dorothy Lawson was to give a note to the corporation. * * * She was to give the corporation her note for $6,600. This amount was pledged by her stock for the amount. The other girls were to do likewise—one note for $3,000, and one for $2,300. That was the final plan. That was agreed to by everybody, and that was the plan that was ultimately carried out."

He admitted afterward that he might be mistaken as to the note having been given by Dorothy Lawson, but he reiterated that "it was agreed that the corporation should pay off the personal indebtedness of Dorothy A. Lawson, and she should give the corporation a note for the amount so paid, or to be paid, as secured by her stock in the corporation," and, furthermore, in the redirect examination this appears:

"Q. You remember, when the deeds were accepted, that the corporation agreed to advance this money that the girls owed to the bank, as part of the consideration? A. Yes, absolutely; that was the understanding. Q. Don't you remember, also, that the stock was to be pledged to secure the repayment? A. Absolutely correct. Q. Don't you also remember the girls were clamoring for some ready money? A. I should say they were. Q. It was agreed that the corporation would try to borrow and give them a thousand dollars apiece? A. Yes, sir."

In the recross-examination he also testified as follows:

"Q. How long subsequent to the incorporation was the agreement under which the corporation was to pay the indebtedness of Dorothy A. Lawson made—was that at the same time, or after the corporation was incorporated? A. I would not say how long afterwards. It was practically a simultaneous act. Q. Mr. Devlin testified it was after the incorporation was carried out? A. Yes. Q. Incorporated November 10th, and this occurred on the 11th? A. Yes; I think that is correct."

From the foregoing it is a fair inference that the corporation assumed the obligation to pay said indebtedness in consideration of said conveyance of said pledge and of the promise on the part of Dorothy Lawson to reimburse the corporation. The only optional part of the corporation's engagement related to the sum of $1,000 that was needed for pressing necessities. Mr. Devlin, it may be added, testified positively to the pledging of the stock, and as to the action of the corporation. This appears in his testimony:

"Q. Was there any resolution of the corporation authorizing and empowering the corporation to pay those indebtednesses off and take this stock as security? A. There was an oral resolution—the minutes were not written up; too many lawyers in it, I guess. Q. Was there any resolution ever entered in the books or records of the corporation? A. No; never entered in the books. There was one passed that day. * * * Q. The point is that there was no formal resolution ever passed? A. Yes; there was a formal resolution passed."

He proceeded to explain why the minutes were not written up, but that is immaterial here.

[3] It is to be regretted, of course, that a more formal memorial of the proceedings was not preserved, but a record of the corporate acts and resolutions is not essential to their validity. Citizens' Securities Co. v. Hammel, 14 Cal. App. 564, 112 Pac. 731; Boggs v. Lakeport A. P. Ass'n, 111 Cal. 354, 43 Pac. 1106.

[4] We have no reason to question the good faith of the parties to the transaction or the entire ingenuousness of said testimony; and we think it cannot be doubted that the court below was legally justified in finding that the pledge was made, and that the corporation obligated itself to pay said indebtedness. Since the obligation was incurred before appellant's lien was perfected, the advances might be made thereafter, and yet relate to the prior date of the agreement, and thus be effective and take precedence over appellant's lien.

The judgment is affirmed.

VALINE v. VALINE et al.

1. Appeal and error ⊜624—Ex parte order extending time for transcript not valid.

If Code Civ. Proc. § 473, permitting the court, after notice to the adverse party, and on such terms as are just, to extend the time for certain acts, is applicable to the filing of the transcript for appeal, it does not make effective an ex parte order by the trial court, extending the time for filing such transcript.

2. Appeal and error ⊜607(1)—Giving of notice to clerk within prescribed time is mandatory.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, the giving of notice to the clerk of the trial court by party intending to appeal within the prescribed time is mandatory, though the provisions fixing the time for preparation of the transcript by the clerk and stenographer are directory merely, since they are not under the control of the party.

3. Appeal and error ⟸627(2)—Dismissal for delay in filing transcript.

Where the time within which a transcript on appeal could be filed either by the old or alternative method had expired before the motion to dismiss the appeal was made, and also the time for filing a printed copy of the judgment roll in the cause, and no application for default had been made, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, the appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Chas. O. Busick, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Joe C. Valine against Rosa Valine and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

H. T. Hiatt, of Sacramento, for appellants.
Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, and G. W. Bedeau, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Presiding Judge pro tem. Motion to dismiss appeal. Plaintiff and respondent obtained judgment against the defendants in the superior court of Sacramento county for the sum of $1,250, or the restitution of a certain automobile, and also for the further sum of $62.40 damages and costs of suit. This judgment was entered on the 15th day of January, 1920. On January 29, 1920, defendants gave notice of motion to move for a new trial. On March 1, 1920, the court denied the defendants' motion. On March 3, 1920, the plaintiff served upon the defendants a notice of the order of the court overruling their motion for new trial, as above stated. On March 13, 1920, the defendants, Rosa Valine, Manuel Fernandez, and John Fernandez, filed in the superior court their notice of appeal. On March 16, 1920, said named defendants filed with the clerk of the superior court of Sacramento county a notice to prepare a transcript on appeal in this action, the same to be prepared under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the same day the defendants filed with the clerk an undertaking to pay the costs of the preparation of the transcript, and also filed an undertaking to stay execution. No further action appears to have been taken toward the preparation of the transcript, but the records certified to by the clerk of said superior court to this court show that on the 8th day of April, 1920, an affidavit was filed by the attorney of record for the defendants, in which it is stated that the notice to the clerk was not filed within the 10 days prescribed by the statute; that the reason therefor was that the attorney was awaiting the return of one of the persons who subsequently signed the undertaking delivered to the clerk to cover the costs of preparing the transcript. Upon this affidavit the judge of the trial court made the following order:

"Good cause appearing therefor, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the clerk of the above-entitled court prepare a transcript on appeal as requested by said defendants. Done in open court this 8th day of April, 1920."

[1] No transcript on appeal has been prepared in pursuance of said notice, nor any of the other provisions of the Code relating to the old method. The time for preparing and filing a transcript under the old method had expired at the time of the hearing of the motion to dismiss, and the excuse offered for not having a transcript prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure is that the stenographer who took the testimony in the case was no longer an official stenographer of the court, and had been busy in other matters. No effort appears to have been made to obtain any orders extending time within which to prepare the transcript, reliance being placed upon the order of the trial court herein set forth as being a release from default in the premises under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. This order, however, was made without notice, appears to have been ex parte, and, if section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, applies to such cases, which it is not necessary for us to decide, it can have no application to this case, because the procedure followed herein bears no semblance to the requirements of that section.

[2] On behalf of the respondent it is urged that the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, as to giving of notice to the clerk by the party intending to appeal, is mandatory. On behalf of the appellants herein it is insisted that all of the provisions of said section are merely directory.

The first case relied upon by the appellant is that of Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 Pac. 1023, 1026. This case was referred to and affirmed by the case of Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 782, 164 Pac. 800. An examination of these two cases reveals the fact that the point at issue before the court was not involved in either one of those actions. Delays in the preparation of the transcript were there involved. The court in both cases was dealing with the failure of officials to comply with the Code provisions relative to preparing the transcript within a certain period of time after the appellant had given his notice. The language used in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, in speaking of what an appellant must do, and what the clerk and stenographer shall thereafter do, reads differently. That section says that, an appellant having appealed, or intending to appeal, must, within 10 days after notice of the decision, etc., file his notice with the clerk, then, after receiving said notice, it shall be the duty of the court to require the stenographic reporter to transcribe the phonographic report of the trial, and that the stenographic reporter shall, within 20 days after said notice has been filed with the clerk, prepare a transcript, etc. The Code provision prescribes what an appellant must do, and then follows this requirement by a statement of the duty of the court and of the stenographic reporter. The two cases above stated deal only with the official duties prescribed by the statute, over which an appellant has no personal control, but must seek relief through the courts if the prescribed official duties are not being performed, which, of course, necessitates the ruling that such provisions of the section are directory, otherwise an appellant would often be denied a hearing upon his appeal through no fault or laches of his own. But the first requirement of the Code relates to his own act, is something over which he has exclusive control, is mandatory in form, and if any rights are lost by not giving notice, it is the fault of the appellant alone.

In Des Granges v. Des Granges, 175 Cal. 67, 165 Pac. 13, where a notice was not given by the appellant as required by the Code, and the trial court held this provision of the Code directory and not mandatory, the Supreme Court, in holding that the transcript prepared without giving such notice as required by the statute could not be considered, used the following language:

"This holding [meaning the holding of the trial court that the provision requiring the giving of notice was directory and not mandatory] is clearly erroneous. It finds no support in the decisions of this court, and is in no wise justified by the scheme embodied in the alternative method of appeal. On the contrary, the application of such reasoning to the facts of this case practically nullifies the clear provisions of the Code relating thereto. The obvious conclusion is therefore that, by failing to give the notice within the time fixed by law, the plaintiff lost her right to proceed with the preparation of the transcript of the evidence on appeal in the manner provided by the section."

To the same effect is the holding of the court in the case of Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 Pac. 611.

In the Matter of the Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 110 Pac. 109, the court holds, in effect, as decided in the later cases, though in the Keating Case it does not appear that any notice whatever was given. The Keating Case, however, does hold that if relief from such default can be given, the requirements of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, must be complied with, and that the relief must be sought in the trial court.

The notice of appeal, as required by section 940, Code of Civil Procedure, the notice to the clerk, as required by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and the requirements of what the court and the stenographic reporter shall thereafter do, are three separate and distinct matters. Confusion appears to have arisen in the holding of some of the cases by not keeping in mind such distinction, and where such distinction is made, as appears by the decision in the Des Granges Case, the requirement that appellant must give notice within the required number of days specified in the Code is held mandatory.

[3] The time having expired when a transcript on appeal can be prepared and filed with this court either by the old or the alternative method, the time also having expired when a printed copy of the judgment roll in this cause could be filed, and no application for default having been made as required by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, if that section can be held applicable, there remains nothing for this court to do but to dismiss the appeal, and it is so ordered.

Ex parte STONE. (Cr. 722.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 9, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇐178 — Licensing elevator operator is not regulating "use and operation" of appliances in building.

An ordinance, requiring operators of elevators to procure a license from the board of mechanical engineers, does not conflict with a provision of the charter giving the board of public works charge of ordinances regulating the use and operation of mechanical appliances in buildings, since the licensing of operators is not a regulation of the use and operation.

2. Carriers ⇐8—Elevator operators may be licensed.

An elevator is a dangerous instrumentality unless properly managed, and it is within the power of the city council to safeguard the public against injury resulting from the incompetency of elevator operators by requiring the licensing of such operators.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐213—Council held to have power to appoint mechanical engineers.

Los Angeles Charter, § 6, empowering the mayor to appoint the officers mentioned in the charter, does not deprive the council of the power to appoint the board of mechanical engineers, which board was created under the authority of section 2, subd. 23, empowering the city to provide for the election or appointment of officers other than those designated in the charter.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂131—Charter provisions in derogation of powers of council strictly construed.

Under Los Angeles Charter, § 12, which vests all legislative power in the council, and the general rule that the power of appointment may be exercised by the legislative body in the absence of a provision to the contrary, the power of the council to appoint officers should not be restricted by inference, but a provision, claimed to have such effect, must be construed strictly according to its express terms.

Application by Charles L. Stone for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody after conviction of violation of a city ordinance. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

James E. Degnan and Lawler & Degnan, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Emmet H. Wilson, Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, and J. D. Taggart, Deputy City Prosecutor, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Petitioner was charged with operating an elevator without a license, in violation of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles. He now seeks to be discharged from imprisonment following conviction and sentence, claiming the ordinance to be void.

The ordinance in question provides for the creation of a board of mechanical engineers, to be appointed by the city council, and prescribes, among other things, that it shall be unlawful for any person to operate an elevator without first obtaining a license from such board. It is contended that the ordinance is void, because (1) the powers of the board of mechanical engineers, as set forth in the ordinance, encroach upon the duties of the board of public works, as fixed by the charter; and (2) the ordinance provides for the appointment of the board of mechanical engineers by the city council instead of by the mayor.

"The board of public works shall have charge of the enforcement of all ordinances relating to the construction, alteration, repair, demolition or removal of buildings and structures in the city; and of the arrangement, alteration and repair, use and operation of all heating, plumbing, lighting, ventilating and electrical and mechanical appliances therein."

Counsel concedes in his argument that it is within the powers of the municipality to require that an elevator operator should be subjected to tests to ascertain his proficiency, and should procure a license to pursue his calling. But, petitioner argues, the expression "use and operation" includes the human as well as the mechanical agency by means of which the use and operation is accomplished, and that, under the provisions of the charter above quoted, the jurisdiction to examine and license operators should therefore be vested in the board of public works. Admitting that the operator while engaged in the performance of his duties should be held to be within the purview of the charter, it does not follow that the legislative body of the city may not prescribe the conditions under which he may be eligible to employment in that capacity.

[2] An elevator is a dangerous instrumentality, unless properly managed; and it is within the province of the council to safeguard the public against injury resulting from the incompetency of those who are to be intrusted with the operation of elevators. To that end it may impose reasonable restrictions upon the right to enter that employment, by requiring a person seeking to engage therein to procure a certificate that he is skilled in that class of work. Such a limitation does not relate to the "use and operation" of the appliance, but is in the nature of a condition precedent to such use and operation.

The charter provides (section 41) that the mayor shall be "vigilant and active in the enforcement of the ordinances of the city," and (section 50) that he shall appoint the city prosecutor, who shall be qualified to practice in all the courts of the state. It could not be successfully contended that the court which admitted the city prosecutor to the bar was invading the jurisdiction of the mayor, or that the mayor should be vested with the power to admit him, in order to qualify him for the appointment.

We therefore conclude that the ordinance, in so far as it provides for the licensing of elevator operators by the board of mechanical engineers, is not in conflict with the charter provision regarding the duties of the board of public works.

2. In support of his contention that the power of appointment of the board of mechanical engineers, should be lodged in the mayor instead of in the council, as provided by the ordinance, petitioner compares some of the old provisions of the charter with the amendments. He attempts to show that by such amendments all appointive power was vested in the mayor, and, by implication, taken away from the council. It is true that some of the officers of the city who were formerly appointed by the council were, by amendments, placed within the jurisdiction of the mayor. The question then arises, Do such amendments indicate an intention on the part of the electorate of the city to remove all power of appointment from the council?

[3] Section 2, subdivision 23, of the charter, in enumerating the powers of the city, provides:

"The city of Los Angeles, in addition to any other powers now held by, or that may hereafter be granted to it under the Constitution or laws of the state, shall have the right and power: * * * To provide for the election or appointment of officers other than those designated in this charter, whenever the public necessity or convenience may require, and prescribe their duties and fix their compensation; provided, that such duties shall not include any of the duties of any officer designated in this charter, or of his deputies or assistants."

Section 6 reads as follows:

"The Mayor shall appoint a Clerk of the Mayor, the Chief of Police, the chief engineer of the Fire Department, and the Health Commissioner. He shall also appoint, subject to confirmation by a majority of the council, the officers of the municipality mentioned in this charter whose appointments are not otherwise specifically provided for herein."

Petitioner argues that by the use of the words "mentioned in this charter" the framers of the charter meant to include, not only those officers designated by title, but also such as might be created under the grant of power contained in subdivision 23 of section 2; and that if it had not been intended to include subsequently created offices, the section should have provided for the appointment by the mayor of the officers named in the article of which section 6 is a part, and thus limit the appointive power of the mayor to the officers specifically named in that article. We do not attach so much significance to the changes in the method of appointment made by the amendments. It could as logically be construed that the provisions of the charter were meant to limit the appointive powers of the mayor by specific mention of those subject to appointment by him. The general clause was obviously intended to cover cases where by inadvertence the manner of appointment was omitted, and thus to complete the scheme of filling the places created by the charter. Several of the officers mentioned in article 2 are by the provisions of subsequent articles to be appointed by other officers or boards, thus demonstrating that it was not the purpose to cast upon the mayor the sole responsibility for the personnel of the officials of the city government.

[4] It is conceded by counsel that the power of appointment may be exercised by the legislative body in the absence of provision to the contrary, but it is claimed that the amendments which took away from the council some of the powers theretofore possessed repel the presumption of any implied power in that respect. We are not in accord with this conclusion. By the terms of the charter, all legislative power is vested in the council (section 12), and any intention to abridge that power must be made manifest by express provision to that effect. The power of the council to provide for the appointment of officers is not presumptive or implied, but is derived from the organic law which created the council and defines its authority. No inference of an intent to restrict its power generally is to be drawn from an amendment to the charter which limits its authority in a particular case. Such a provision, being in derogation of its inherent powers, is to be construed strictly according to its expressed terms, and should not be extended by implication beyond its immediate effect.

We are of the opinion that the method of appointment provided by the ordinance does not violate the charter or invade the jurisdiction of the mayor, and that therefore the board of mechanical engineers is a legally constituted body.

Writ discharged and petitioner remanded.

BAKER v. WESTERN AUTO STAGE CO.
(Civ. 3206.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 22, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⇐123(11)—Appeal and error ⇐1050(1)—A bus driver's statements immediately after collision with an automobile held not res gestæ, but harmless.

In a passenger's action against an auto stage company for injuries from an automobile collision on a public road, testimony of declarations by defendant's driver immediately after the accident were no part of the res gestæ and incompetent, but could not have caused a miscarriage of justice where driver, as witness, repeated statement as to speed and his other objectionable declarations could not have injured defendant's case.

2. Carriers ⇐300—Bus owner liable for injury to passenger in collision for not giving right of way to automobile entering street from right.

Where an auto bus was traveling at a high rate of speed on reaching a street on which an automobile was approaching from his right, the automobile had the right of way, and failure to have the bus under such control as to let the automobile pass in front of it was negligence, rendering the defendant bus owner liable to a passenger for injury from the collision.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)—Negligence in operation of bus held a question of fact for trial court.

In a passenger's action against an auto bus company for injuries resulting from a collision, it was for the trial court to say from all of the evidence under the circumstances whether defendant was or was not negligent in the operation of its bus.

4. Damages ⟸134(1) — $1,000 not excessive for injuries to able-bodied man whose earnings for seven months were lost.

Where plaintiff had a hospital bill of $55, suffered much pain up to time of trial, was incapacitated for labor, had been prior to the accident, a strong, able-bodied man, earning $4 a day as a carpenter, and during the seven months intermediate the accident and the trial was unable to earn more than $57, an award of $1,000 damages was not excessive.

5. Carriers ⟸322 — Finding of negligence without finding as to negligence of driver of vehicle with which bus collided held sufficient.

Where a passenger's complaint against his carrier alleged carelessness, recklessness, and negligence on the part of defendant's auto bus driver causing collision with another automobile, a finding of negligence following substantially the allegation of the complaint was sufficient without a specific finding that the driver of the other automobile, not mentioned in the pleadings, was negligent, though, if he was, it would be probable that the defendant was not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by O. H. Baker against the Western Auto Stage Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richard A. Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. In this action for personal injuries, sustained in an automobile accident while a passenger on one of defendant's auto busses, plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,000, from which defendant appeals.

Defendant, a common carrier of passengers, runs auto stages or busses between Los Angeles and Bakersfield. Plaintiff was injured in a collision between one of defendant's auto busses and another automobile, a Buick, owned and driven by a man of the name of Maxwell. At the time of the collision, defendant's bus, on which plaintiff was a passenger, was travelling from Los Angeles to Bakersfield. The collision occurred in Los Angeles county, at the intersection of Glendale street and San Fernando road. Glendale street enters, but does not cross, San Fernando road. Plaintiff alleged, and the court found, that the collision was the result of the negligent driving of the auto bus by defendant's employé, William Dukelow. Immediately before the accident, Dukelow, driving defendant's auto stage, was traveling northwesterly along San Fernando road. He approached the place where that road is entered by Glendale street from his right. Maxwell, operating his Buick car, and traveling southeasterly on Glendale street, was approaching the point where defendant's auto bus would pass the intersection. Dukelow, travelling at a rate of 35 miles an hour, according to one of plaintiff's witnesses, turned his machine toward the left-hand side of the road upon which he was traveling, for the purpose of avoiding a collision with the Buick. Maxwell's car struck the stage, with the result that the stage was turned over and plaintiff thrown under and injured. One of plaintiff's witnesses, who was riding on the front seat with the driver of defendant's stage, testified that Maxwell's car came into sight when the stage was about 75 feet from the intersection. Maxwell testified, in substance, that, as he reached the place where Glendale street enters San Fernando road, he looked to his left and saw defendant's auto stage approaching at a distance of about 150 or 160 feet; that, intending to turn into San Fernando road in the direction from which the stage was coming, he proceeded across the center line of that road, at a moderate rate of speed—between 8 and 10 miles an hour—for the purpose of making the turn; that defendant's auto stage, traveling along San Fernando road, swerved to the left, and the collision occurred. Dukelow, on the other hand, testified that before reaching the point of the accident he had been traveling at a speed of about 25 to 30 miles an hour, and that, as he approached the corner where the two roads meet, he began to slow down, and when about 20 feet from the nearest curb on Glendale street he saw Maxwell's automobile; that, believing there was ample room for him to pass, he bore to the left-hand side of San Fernando road in order to allow Maxwell's car to pass; that Maxwell appeared to slow down at first, but that his automobile suddenly shot forward as the stage was passing, and struck the latter; that it appeared to him that Maxwell was an incompetent driver; and that, instead of putting on the brakes of his machine, as he evidently intended to do, he had pressed the foot throttle, with the result that Maxwell's machine darted forward and thus caused the collision.

This case and another brought by Maxwell against this defendant and Dukelow were tried together in the court below; it being there stipulated that testimony taken in the one case should be deemed evidence in the other. During the trial a witness called by Maxwell testified that, coming upon the scene shortly after the accident, he questioned the driver of defendant's auto bus, Dukelow, who, in reply, stated that he was traveling about 25 miles an hour, and later that he was not going over 20 miles an hour. In this same conversation Dukelow, when asked why he did not use the emergency brake, replied that he did not because it would have been dangerous to use it; that he could lock his wheels with his foot brake as effectively as he could with his emergency brake, without so much danger of overturning the stage. To this testimony counsel for the defendant here objected upon the ground that, as against it, evidence of Dukelow's declarations after the accident was incompetent and inadmissible.

This brief sketch of the evidence will suffice for an understanding of the questions presented by this appeal. The grounds urged for reversal are: (1) That the court erred in admitting in evidence the declarations made by Dukelow shortly after the accident; (2) that the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of defendant; (3) that the damages awarded to plaintiff, $1,000, are excessive; and (4) that the trial court failed to find that the accident was not due to negligence on the part of Maxwell, the driver of the Buick.

[1] Testimony as to the declarations made by the driver of defendant's auto bus immediately after the accident was doubtless incompetent as against this defendant. They were no part of the res gestæ. But the error could not possibly have been the cause of a miscarriage of justice. There was nothing in Dukelow's declarations as to the speed at which he was driving defendant's auto bus that differed materially from his own testimony. He himself, when a witness in the case, testified that he was traveling along San Fernando road at a rate of 25 or 30 miles an hour, and that, as he approached the intersection, he slowed down to approximately 20 miles an hour. So far, therefore, as Dukelow's declaration related to the speed of appellant's auto bus, it accords substantially with his own testimony given as a witness in the case. As to the remaining part of the objectionable declaration, that wherein Dukelow told the witness that he did not use the emergency brake because it was less dangerous to use the foot brake, no possible injury to appellant's case could be caused thereby. Moreover, when the evidence of Dukelow's declarations was offered, counsel for the Western Auto Stage Company, the appellant here, made a statement in reply to a remark by counsel for Baker, the respondent on this appeal, that may well have led the latter to believe that, as to his client, the objection to the evidence of Dukelow's declarations was not urged. The statement made by appellant's counsel was ambiguous, and doubtless he did not intend that it should have the meaning that respondent's counsel evidently gave it. But it was sufficient to justify the latter in inferring that the objection to evidence of Dukelow's declarations was not to apply to his client.

[2, 3] The finding as to defendant's negligence is sustained by the evidence. As Dukelow, driving defendant's auto bus, approached the intersection, traveling at a high rate of speed, according to plaintiff's witnesses, the Buick, driven by Maxwell, was on Dukelow's right-hand side. The Buick was approaching the intersection at the right of defendant's stage, its driver, Maxwell, intending to make the turn. The Buick, therefore, had the right of way—that is, the right to cross in advance of the stage—and should have been allowed by the driver of the latter sufficient time to make the crossing. Had the stage been under such control as to enable its driver to bring it to a stop before crossing Glendale street, the collision doubtless would not have occurred. There was a hedge at the first right-hand corner which the stage was approaching. The driver admitted that this obscured his vision of any vehicle that might be coming from that direction. He testified that he was within 20 feet of the first curb line when he first saw Maxwell's automobile. From all the evidence, it was for the trial court to say whether, under the circumstances, defendant was or was not negligent in the operation of its auto bus. No such clear case is presented by the record as to make it appear as a matter of law that there was negligence or the lack of it on the part of defendant's driver.

[4] As a result of his injuries, plaintiff was confined to his bed for the greater part of 3 months; he had to remain in a hospital for 12 days after the accident; his hospital bill alone amounted to $55; he suffered considerable pain, even up to the time of the trial; as a result of his injuries he was partially incapacitated for labor; prior to the accident he had been a strong, able-bodied man, earning in his trade, that of builder and carpenter $4 a day; during all of the seven months intermediate the accident and the trial, and by reason of his incapacity, due to his injuries, he was unable to earn more than $57. In view of these facts, and considering plaintiff's age, we cannot hold that the damages awarded by the trial court, $1,000, were excessive. The law governing the question of excessive damages has thus been expressed in Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019, approved in Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513, and Smith v. Royer (Sup.) 183 Pac. 660:

"It is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation, warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury."

While this rule was stated with relation to the verdict of a jury, it applies equally to the findings of a trial court when considered on appeal. We cannot say that the judgment herein is "so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation, warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice."

[5] There is no merit in the claim that the court erred in failing to make a specific finding as to whether Maxwell was or was not negligent in driving his machine. The averment of negligence in the complaint is this:

"That, * * * through the carelessness, recklessness and negligence" of the driver of defendant's auto bus, the bus "was caused to collide with and against another auto which was then and there being driven in a southerly direction on said Glendale street; * * * that by reason thereof the said bus * * * was caused to turn over * * * and plaintiff * * * was thrown under * * * and * * * thereby * * * injured."

Thus was the issue respecting defendant's negligence presented by plaintiff in his pleading. The finding upon the issue of negligence follows substantially the allegation of the complaint. No more was necessary. Though it is quite possible that, if Maxwell was negligent, defendant was not, it was not for that reason necessary to find specifically that Maxwell was not negligent in order to justify a judgment against the defendant here. The complaint presents no direct issue respecting carefulness or negligence on Maxwell's part. He is not mentioned in the pleadings. The finding of defendant's negligence substantially in the language of the complaint, and that plaintiff's injuries were proximately caused thereby, was all that was necessary.

We find no reversible error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

LEFEBVRE v. LEFEBVRE. (Civ. 2192.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 10, 1920.)

1. Divorce ⟹303(1)—Decree can be modified from time to time as to custody of children.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, decree of divorce can be modified from time to time as to custody of children as circumstances change.

2. Divorce ⟹298(1)—Welfare of child consideration in directing custody.

In directing custody of the child of divorced parties, the controlling and paramount consideration is the child's welfare, to be decided from all the facts of which the court has obtained knowledge in a competent manner.

3. Divorce ⟹303(1), 312—Modification of decree as to child's custody addressed to court's discretion.

Application for modification of divorce decree as to custody of child is addressed to the trial court's sound and legal discretion, and its award, though to the guilty party, will not be disturbed unless a clear abuse of its discretion appears.

4. Divorce ⟹312—Award of custody having support in evidence not disturbed.

The determination of the trial court as to custody of the child of the divorced parties cannot be disturbed on appeal, there being in the record substantial evidence, not appearing incredible, to support a rational inference that it was for the child's best interests, and nothing to impeach the fairness or good faith of the decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Divorce suit by Arvine Lefebvre against Henri C. Lefebvre. From order modifying the decree as to custody of the child, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Otis & French, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. On May 26, 1916, plaintiff obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce against the defendant on the ground of cruelty, and she was awarded the custody and control of Leon Lefebvre, who is now the age of six, except that the grandparents of said child and the defendant were to have his custody for a certain portion of the time. Thereafter a final decree was rendered, and subsequent thereto both appellant and respondent remarried. Appellant is living with her second husband, G. F. Schmidt, and respondent is living with his second wife. Appellant has a child by her second husband, but respondent has no other than the said Leon.

On the 20th day of August, 1919, respondent filed a petition in the superior court of Sacramento county, praying for a modification of the final decree to the extent that defendant be awarded the custody of said minor child, supported by certain affidavits filed therewith. Subsequently appellant filed counter affidavits, denying most of the allegations set forth in defendant's affidavits. Thereafter the application came on for hearing, and was submitted upon said affidavits and also the testimony of various witnesses. After consideration of said matter, the court modified its decree by making the following order:

"It is further ordered that the care, custody, and control of the minor child of said parties, to wit, Leon Lefebvre, be and the same is hereby given to Henri C. Lefebvre, the father of said Leon Lefebvre, except that plaintiff shall have the right to be with said child and take said child out one day of each week between the hours of 8:30 a. m. and 6:30 p. m., at which hour said child shall be returned to said defendant."

From this order modifying the final decree of divorce the appeal has been taken, and appellant urges two grounds for the reversal of the order as follows:

"That the court erred and overstepped its discretionary powers in taking the care and custody of the minor child of tender years from the mother without first requiring some evidence, however slight, of the moral or mental unfitness of the mother; that the court erred in refusing to admit evidence as to the qualifications and personal fitness of the defendant."

[1-3] As to the principles of law applicable to the situation, there is no controversy between the parties. It is sufficient to cite them as follows:

The court has the power to vary and modify its decree as to the custody of the minor children from time to time as circumstances change. Section 138, Civ. Code; Simmons v. Simmons, 22 Cal. App. 448, 134 Pac. 791; Crater v. Crater, 135 Cal. 633, 67 Pac. 1049. The controlling and paramount consideration in directing its custody is the welfare of the child, and this the court must decide from all the facts of which it has obtained knowledge in a competent manner. Miller v. Higgins, 14 Cal. App. 156, 111 Pac. 403; Beyerle v. Beyerle, 155 Cal. 266, 100 Pac. 702. All such applications are addressed to the sound and legal discretion of the trial court, and although it may award the care and custody of the children of a marriage to the guilty party, whatever may be the offense, its conclusion will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it should clearly appear that its discretion has been abused. Miller v. Higgins, supra; Black v. Black, 149 Cal. 224, 86 Pac. 505.

[4] Viewing the record in the light of the foregoing consideration, we are bound to conclude that said order must be affirmed. There is no warrant for us to say that the lower court abused the discretion committed to the trial tribunal. The rule which obtains in this class of cases is the same as in other judicial determinations of issues of fact, and similar presumptions and intendments must be indulged. In other words, if we find substantial evidence in the record to support a rational inference that the order is for the best interests of the child, and such evidence does not appear incredible, and there is nothing to impeach the fairness or good faith of the decision, it would be an excess of our authority to disturb the determination of the trial court.

An examination of the transcript would convince any one that both in the affidavits and the oral testimony is found ample evidence to show that the minor has been inhumanly treated by his stepfather, with the encouragement and connivance of the mother; that the child lives constantly under the shadow of fearful apprehension of punishment at the hands of said stepfather; that he is a nervous, sensitive boy, and does not receive the care, encouragement, sympathy, and affection of which he stands so much in need; and that his welfare would be promoted by committing him to the custody of his father.

There is no ground upon which we would be justified in rejecting such testimony or nullifying its effect, and we must hold that the trial judge exercised his discretion in obedience to a conscientious understanding and appreciation of the facts and the law and of his grave responsibility in the premises.

It is due, however, to appellant to say that she made a strong showing to the effect that the child was not abused; that the punishment administered to him was not unduly severe, but only what was needed for proper discipline and training; that both she and her husband had for the child the affection that usually exists toward their offspring on the part of parents; and that her home was an entirely suitable place for the welfare and happiness of said minor. This conflicting evidence, though, was manifestly for the determination of the trial judge and, whatever might be our judgment of its weight, it cannot be substituted for his. We deem it inadvisable to recite specifically the distressing story of the witnesses for respondent deeming it sufficient to say that it has been carefully examined in connection with the showing made in behalf of appellant.

As to the second point made by appellant, it is quite apparent from the record that she was not precluded from introducing evidence as to the unfitness of the natural father for the care and custody of the child. The court simply directed that the showing as to the qualifications of the mother be made first. It is true also that evidence on the subject both in favor of the appellant and the respondent was subsequently received without objection.

The order is affirmed.

LALLY v. KUSTER. (Civ. 3384.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 29, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1097(1)—Decision on former appeal law of case unless facts differ.

The decision on a former appeal is binding as the law of the case, where the evidence is the same; it being only where the facts differ that it is not conclusive.

2. Trial ⊂⊃163—Motion for nonsuit should state grounds.

If colloquy between court and counsel in regard to proposed motion for nonsuit could be deemed equivalent to a motion, the ground must be stated, in order to be available, so that the requisite evidence might be offered by plaintiff.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1061(3)—Denial of motion for nonsuit held no ground for reversal.

In an action against an attorney for damage for failure to diligently prosecute a foreclosure suit, the denial of a motion for nonsuit on the ground that there was no proof that the note and mortgage had not been paid, even if technically erroneous, will not be reversed, where attorney failed to prove any payment made, for he might show a payment to establish the amount to which he was entitled to credit.

4. Trusts ⊂⊃140(1)—Mortgage passing on termination of trust by death of beneficiary not affected by mortgagor's dealings with deceased.

A beneficiary's widow to whom no trust property consisting of a mortgage is delivered by the trustee on the beneficiary's death is not estopped from enforcing the mortgage by a secret agreement between the beneficiary and the mortgagor; and if the latter has any claim against the beneficiary it must be presented against the beneficiary's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Marie Lally, formerly Marie Fleming Everest Brown Eastes, against Edward G. Kuster. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart M. Salisbury, Stannard A. McNeil, and Edward G. Kuster, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment for $2,694 awarded as damages for negligence as an attorney in failing to prosecute diligently a mortgage foreclosure suit which was dismissed for lack of prosecution after the statute of limitations had expired on the mortgage debt. The case was tried once before, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant. On the appeal of the plaintiff the Supreme Court reversed the judgment, and in a lengthy opinion written by Mr. Justice Wilbur reviewed the essential and unchangeable facts. Lally v. Kuster, 177 Cal. 783, 171 Pac. 961.

The essential facts are that one George Brown, the former husband of the plaintiff, was the beneficiary of a trust under the will of his father, by which he was to come into the body of the trust estate on his reaching the age of 30 years. During the continuance of the trust he had no right to or control over the principal of the trust funds. Mrs. Marisco Brown, who was not related to George Brown, but who had been his nurse when he was a child, owned certain real property in Los Angeles burdened with a mortgage. George Brown, being in ill health, went to Los Angeles, and made his home with Mrs. Brown, who took care of him and at times gave or advanced to him small sums of money. She was old and infirm, and was disturbed by the mortgage on her property. George Brown caused her to deed the property to him, and he executed a new mortgage which was then transferred to the trustees under his father's will, and he then deeded the property back to her subject to the mortgage. The proceeds of the new mortgage, a part of the principal of the trust estate, were presumably used to satisfy the pre-existing debt. It is claimed by the defendant that it was the intention of George Brown to cancel the mortgage on coming into the trust property. Regardless of his intention in this regard, when the mortgage was accepted by the trustees it became a part of the trust property over which he had no control. He died before reaching the age of 30, and the trust was thereby terminated. The trustees were required to and did turn over the trust property to George Brown's widow, the plaintiff in this action.

The defendant was retained as an attorney by the plaintiff to collect the mortgage debt. After investigation he urged the plaintiff not to proceed with the suit he was retained to commence, and advised her that there might be a good defense to the action. After a series of delays and excuses the defendant was instructed on April 7, 1907, to push the case and get judgment as soon as possible. On January 13, 1910, the defendant wrote that the case was pending and awaiting trial. In reply to a letter complaining about the time the matter had dragged along, on January 31, 1910, the defendant wrote that the attorney for Marisco Brown had told him a demurrer had been interposed merely for time, and that he would file his answer as soon as he could get a complete statement from Mrs. Brown. The suit had been filed before October 17, 1907, for the defendant wrote on that day that he had filed suit, and would have summons served at once. An amended complaint was filed October 15, 1908, and demurrer thereto was filed on June 17, 1909. Mrs. Marisco Brown's motion to dismiss the foreclosure suit was granted on March 16, 1912. In opposition to the motion the defendant made an affidavit of merits on behalf of the plaintiff, in which he stated that he had fully investigated the facts and circumstances, and he verily believed the plaintiff had a good cause of action against Marisco Brown.

Substantially the same facts were before the Supreme Court on the first appeal. It decided as a matter of law that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, and established the rule for the measurement of damages as the amount which could have been recovered in the foreclosure suit, less, if any, the value of the barred note and mortgage.

[1] The appellant contends that the determination of the Supreme Court on a first appeal is not conclusive as to matters of fact which may be developed on the retrial. This rule is unquestioned, but it applies only where new or additional evidence is received or offered on the second trial, the effect of which would or might be to change the ultimate facts or to show the inapplicability of the rules of law announced on the first appeal. The record in this case shows no evidence, or offer of evidence, which could have changed or modified the record which has been set forth, and it was upon this record that the Supreme Court decided, not as a matter of fact, but as a matter of law, that the defendant had been guilty of negligence. This court is bound, as was the trial court, by that determination. The instruction to the effect that there was but one question to be passed on by the jury, and that the Supreme Court had passed on all phases of the case, but the amount of damages was a correct statement of the law applicable to the case under the former decision.

[2, 3] It is contended that the defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been granted, and reliance is placed on the statement that there was no proof that the note secured by the mortgage had not been paid. The ground of the motion was not stated, if, indeed, any motion for nonsuit was made. There was a colloquy between court and counsel in regard to the proposed motion. If it be deemed equivalent to the motion, the ground should have been stated, so that if the evidence were requisite it might have been offered by the plaintiff and the oversight cured. Sanchez v. Neary, 41 Cal. 487; Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184. Furthermore, there was no effort on the part of the defendant to show as a part of the defense that the note was paid. The negligence of the defendant was shown by the evidence that in disregard of the instructions of his client he failed to prosecute the suit to foreclose the mortgage until it was dismissed for want of prosecution after the statute of limitations on the debt had expired. Under the rule for the measurement of damages laid down on the former appeal, the parties submitted evidence in accordance with that rule. If the defendant was entitled to credit for payment made it was an element tending to reduce the amount of damages, and evidence of actual payment would have been permissible. None such was offered. Even if there were technical error in the denial of the motion for nonsuit, the judgment will not be reversed where the defendant had an opportunity and failed to make proof of the amount of any credit to which he might have been entitled.

[4] The defendant contends the trial court erred in rejecting certain evidence which he maintains would have shown that the plaintiff was estopped to maintain this suit because Marisco Brown and George Brown had so dealt with each other that it would have been inequitable for him to have sought to foreclose the mortgage, or because Marisco Brown had a valid claim against Brown which might have been set off against the mortgage debt. This contention is without force for several reasons. There were no facts pleaded to support evidence of estoppel, the holder of the mortgage was not affected by any secret negotiations between George Brown and Marisco Brown, and if Marisco Brown had any claim against George Brown it must have been asserted against his estate or have been barred.

The record has been examined carefully, and the other points relied on by the appellant have been considered, but it is not necessary further to review the evidence, nor to discuss the appellant's other contentions. The outstanding facts are that the defendant failed to prosecute the foreclosure suit, in direct violation of the instructions of his client, under such circumstances that the conclusion of negligence is irresistible. On conflicting evidence the jury determined the amount of damages in accordance with the rule laid down on the former appeal. There does not appear to have been any miscarriage of justice.

VIETTI v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (Civ. 2051.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1920.)

1. Carriers ⟸303(4)—Duty of carrier to stop train sufficient time to allow passenger to alight.

When a carrier sells a ticket entitling a passenger to ride on its train to a specified destination, it is its duty to see that the passenger is afforded all reasonable means for reaching and alighting at his point of destination with safety to himself, and, having reached the point of destination, it is its duty to stop the train for a time sufficient to enable the passenger to safely leave the train.

2. Carriers ⟸347(11) — Contributory negligence of passenger alighting from moving train for jury.

In an action against a carrier for damages for personal injuries, whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to alight from a moving train, which simply slowed down for the station, held for the jury.

3. Negligence ⟸122(3)—Burden of proving contributory negligence on defendant.

Where contributory negligence is set up as a defense to an action for personal injuries, the burden is upon the defendant to prove such defense.

4. Carriers ⟸333(5)—Passengers not negligent per se in alighting from moving train.

Whether one alighting from a moving train, and thereby receiving personal injuries, is guilty of contributory negligence is a question which must be determined from all the circumstances and conditions surrounding the passenger immediately prior to the injury.

5. Carriers ⟸333(5) — Passenger placed in difficult position not expected to act with highest degree of prudence.

Where a passenger was placed in a difficult position, so that he was compelled to decide in an instant of time whether he would jump from a moving train or miss an important engagement, by reason of refusal of carrier to stop the train, he could not be expected to act with the highest degree of prudence, and, if it happened that he did not exercise the best judgment with that degree of prudence which he would have shown under ordinary circumstances, he would not be held to have been guilty of such negligence as would preclude him from recovery, where injury resulted to him from jumping.

6. Evidence ⟸588—Inconsistency in testimony on cross-examination goes only to credibility of witness.

Admissions of a witness on his cross-examination at variance with the testimony given on his direct examination go no further than to impair his credibility as a witness, or reduce the weight of his testimony, and it is solely the function of the trier of facts to say whether they have such an effect or may be rationally reconciled with the theory that the witness, in his testimony in chief, has told the truth.

7. Carriers ⟸347(11)—One following another in jumping off train not negligent per se.

The mere fact that a person precedes another in jumping off a moving train does not stamp the act of the latter, if he happens to sustain injury by reason of his act of so jumping, as negligence per se.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by Amedeo Vietti against Walker D. Hines, as Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.
Oscar Geballe, of San Francisco, and Carr & Kennedy, all of Redding, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in an action for personal injuries, the cause having been tried by the court without a jury.

On April 16, 1918, plaintiff, a woodcutter, employed by Lamoine Lumber Company, at Lamoine, was visiting in Redding. He went to Redding, he testified, to take a "couple of days' lay-off." At about 5 o'clock that evening he received a telegram recalling him to Lamoine. The telegram read:

"Lamoine, California. 9:08 a. m. April 16th, 1918. A. Vietti, care of B. Vietti, Redding, California. Come up at once. We found several mistakes in the bill. Cannot wait longer. Andrew Vaconi. 9:30 a. m."

He then went to the office of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in Redding, bought a ticket for Lamoine, for which he paid $1.40, and boarded the next train leaving Redding, which was train known as No. 14. He sat in the smoking car, the conductor took up his ticket, and gave him the usual "hat check." At Kennett, Hurtzig, another employé of the Lamoine Lumber Company, boarded the train bound for Lamoine. At about 11:30 p. m. the train reached Lamoine, which was a "flag station." The conductor of the train when he took up plaintiff's hat check, told him he would have to jump; that he could not stop, as he "had a string of cars." The train slowed to four or five miles an hour, and Hurtzig and the plaintiff started toward the platform of the car for the purpose of alighting. The plaintiff, according to his testimony, said to the conductor that he would not jump; but it appears that Hurtzig alighted while the train was still moving, and thereupon, and after having been ordered several times either by the conductor or the brakeman to jump, the plaintiff leaped to the ground. The plaintiff testified, as did also Hurtzig, that the train or the car in which they rode was, at the time the former alighted, between 300 and 400 yards from the station. The plaintiff further testified that, before he attempted to jump from the car and while he was standing on the steps leading to the platform of the car, he heard the noise incident to the pulling of the bell cord, signaling, as Hurtzig testified, the engineer to speed up. He also testified that he had on a few previous occasions alighted from the same train at Lamoine in the night time when it was in slow motion, but that, before doing so or attempting to do so, either the conductor or the brakeman would first alight to the ground and have a lighted lantern so that a passenger leaving the train while it was moving could see where to alight on the ground. On the occasion of the accident, however, neither the conductor nor the brakeman left the train, he testified; nor, he further testified, did either have a lighted lantern on the platform to enable a passenger leaving the train to guide himself in making a leap so as to avoid striking some object which might be near the track. In fact, the plaintiff testified, there was no light about the station at all. He said that when he reached the ground he struck a "pebble" or a loose rock and fell to the ground, and thus sustained the injuries (a sprained ankle and bruises on and about the face) of which he here complains.

The witness, Hurtzig, testified that the train had gone about 20 feet from the time that he alighted and the time the plaintiff jumped, and that he heard "the air" and the bell cord pulled, but whether this was done before or after the plaintiff jumped he could not say.

The above embraces, in substance, a recital of the circumstances under which the injuries complained of were received.

In appellant's brief it is stated:

"That plaintiff was injured is not to be disputed, and there is no contention made that the amount of damages awarded to the plaintiff is excessive, or that any ruling respecting the admission or rejection of testimony is of sufficient importance to urge as a ground for reversal. Nor is it necessary to refer to the witnesses who testified for the defendant. Our contention is that the testimony of the plaintiff shows that he was guilty of contributory negligence that bars recovery by him."

[1, 2] In the first place, it may be laid down as a settled and indisputable rule that when a carrier of persons for hire sells a ticket entitling a passenger to ride on its train or other vehicle used for the transportation of passengers to a specified destination it is the duty of such carrier to see that the passenger is afforded all reasonable means for reaching and alighting at his point of destination with safety to himself. Having sold the plaintiff a ticket to Lamoine, it was the duty of the defendant, upon reaching that point, to have stopped the train for a time sufficient to enable the plaintiff to leave the train without, in doing so, incurring a risk to his personal safety which could not arise or exist under the usual or ordinary conditions existing or peculiar to that particular station; and, in failing to stop its train at Lamoine so as to enable the plaintiff to alight without subjecting him to some risk or danger to his personal safety, and compelling him to leave the train while it was in motion, however slow the speed of the train was diminished at that point, the defendant was guilty of the violation of a duty it owed to the plaintiff. Its negligence thus committed must be held to have been the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, unless it could be held, upon a view of the evidence, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, without which the damage would not have occurred, and, we do not think we can justly so hold. Our opinion is rather that, upon the evidence, the question whether the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as would exonerate the defendant from culpable blame for the accident and the injuries received by the plaintiff as a result thereof was one for the jury to solve.

[3] It is obviously true, as is said by the Supreme Court, in Loftus v. Pac. Elec. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 467, 137 Pac. 34, 35, that—

"Ordinarily * * * the question whether a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury. It becomes a question of law for the decision of the court only where the facts are undisputed, and, even then, only where, on those facts, reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion on the issue of plaintiff's negligence. Herbert v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Johnson v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 97 Pac. 520; Hoff v. Los Angeles P. Co., 158 Cal. 597, 112 Pac. 53; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific, 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513. 'It has often been said by this court that it is very rare that a set of circumstances is presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown. As a general rule, it is a question of fact for the jury. * * *' Seller v. Market St. Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 271, 72 Pac. 1006."

And where contributory negligence is set up as a defense to an action for damages for personal injuries received through the alleged negligence of the defendant, the burden is upon the latter to prove such defense.

In this case, while the conductor and the brakeman, testifying for the defendant, gave an entirely different version of the matter from that of the plaintiff, saying that neither ordered the plaintiff to jump from the train while it was in motion, and that it was the intention to stop the train so that he (plaintiff) could alight therefrom in the usual way, this court must be guided solely in determining the question of the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff by the latter's testimony, it having been accepted by the trial court, to which the determination of the questions of fact was submitted, as involving a truthful narrative of the circumstances under which he came to jump from the train while it was in motion.

[4] Modern authority does not sanction the proposition that it is negligence per se on the part of a passenger to alight from a moving train, the true doctrine being that, whether one alighting from a running train, and thereby receiving personal injuries, is guilty of contributory negligence, is a question which must be determined from all the circumstances and conditions surrounding the passenger immediately prior to the injury. Carr v. Eel River etc. R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 366, 373, 33 Pac. 213, 21 L. R. A. 354. In the case just named the Supreme Court said:

"That there was more hazard in leaving a car while in motion, although moving ever so slowly, than when it is at rest is self-evident; but whether it is imprudent and careless to make the attempt depends upon circumstances; and where a party by the wrongful act of another has been placed in circumstances calling for an election between leaving the cars or submitting to an inconvenience and a further wrong, it is a proper question for a jury whether it was a prudent and ordinarily careful act, or whether it was a rash and reckless exposure of the person to peril and hazard."

In 10 Corpus Juris, p. 1131, § 1502, it is said, after a review of many authorities:

"A passenger is not guilty of negligence per se in jumping from a moving train or car by the advice, direction, invitation, or order of the conductor or other authorized employé of the carrier, on whose opinion or judgment in the matter he has a right to rely, if the danger of such an act would not be apparent to a prudent man, as where the train at the time is moving slowly, and in such case it becomes the province of the jury to say how far the passenger's act may be excused, and whether or not it was negligent."

See, also, Filer v. New York Central, 49 N. Y. 47, 10 Am. Rep. 327.

In this case the testimony shows that the train had slowed down to a rate of speed which would enable the average person of ordinary alertness to alight from it with safety. Hurtzig, before the plaintiff leaped from the train, had stepped to the ground from the train in safety. The testimony further shows that the plaintiff himself, under like circumstances and in the night time, had on several previous occasions alighted from the same train while it was in motion. On these occasions, it is true, as the testimony shows, either the brakeman or conductor first alighted and held up a lighted lantern in such manner as to enable the plaintiff to see that he would or might not, in jumping, strike some object on the ground which might cause him to receive personal injuries, while on the occasion in question the conductor and the brakeman failed to provide him with any such assistance, which was, as a matter of fact, negligence on their part. It is thus very clear that there was no obvious danger in the act of the defendant in leaping from the train. In other words, it is manifest that the act of the plaintiff in jumping from the train, under the indicated circumstances, did not involve such an act of imprudence or carelessness as to justify the declaration that it amounted to negligence per se or as a matter of law.

But there is still another consideration in the evidential features of the case which possesses much significance in the determination of the question whether the plaintiff's act in leaping from the train did or did not constitute negligence per se.

[5] The plaintiff, as his testimony shows, had gone to Redding for a few days' "lay-off" from his customary employment or labor. He received a telegram immediately after his arrival at Redding, and on the day of his arrival there, urging him to return to Lamoine immediately or "at once" to attend (as we may infer from the telegram) to the correction of certain alleged mistakes in a bill or an account with which he was concerned. The telegram, it will be noticed, stated that the sender could not "wait longer"; that is, as we may also infer, that it was urgent that the mistakes should be corrected at the earliest possible moment, and that the plaintiff should be present to correct them. The importance, in his mind, of an immediate return to Lamoine is evidenced by the fact that he immediately, upon receiving the telegram, arranged to return as soon as he could conveniently do so—that is, on the first train leaving and going in the direction of Lamoine after the receipt of the message—and that in so returning he was ready and willing to forego the "lay-off" or rest to secure which was his purpose in going to Redding. The trainmen had told him that the train would not stop at Lamoine, and in fact it did not come to a stop when it reached that station, and, having been ordered several times by the trainmen to jump to the ground, there was but one of two things he could do, viz. either go on with the train beyond the point of his destination, and so fail promptly to meet the engagement which it clearly appeared it was in his mind necessary and urgent to meet with haste and promptness, or take the chances of leaping with safety to himself from the steps of the car in which he was riding. Moreover, it appears that, as he was considering whether he had better attempt to alight from the train by leaping or jumping, the bell cord was pulled by one of the trainmen and, he testified, he interpreted that act as a signal to the engineer to increase the speed of the train. Thus it is plain that the plaintiff found himself suddenly placed in a position where he was compelled to decide in an instant of time which of the two alternatives which were open or available to him he should choose; that is, whether he should attempt to alight from the train while it was in motion and before its speed was increased or go on to the next station some distance from Lamoine. The position in which plaintiff was thus put was the result of the defendant's own wrongful act or tort; and it was, indeed, a difficult position in which the plaintiff found himself under the circumstances, and one which naturally was calculated to deprive him of his self-possession, or that cool and calm judgment which alone admits of deliberation and prudence before selecting one of two alternative courses, one of which might in his mind entail upon him an inconvenience in a business transaction or matter of great significance or importance to him, and the other attended by more or less risk of sustaining personal injury. In such circumstances a person is not to be expected to act with the highest degree of prudence, and if it happened that he has not exercised the best judgment or that degree of prudence which he would have shown under ordinary circumstances, particularly where his position has been brought about by the negligent or wrongful act of the defendant himself, he should not be held to have been guilty of such negligence as would preclude him from a recovery for such negligent or wrongful conduct of the defendant, where physical or other injury has resulted to him from the course he has, under such circumstances, elected to adopt. The rule as thus stated is well explained and aptly applied in Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 417, 11 Pac. 750, 59 Am. Rep. 428. Also, what is said by the Supreme Court of Kansas in Walters v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 82 Kan. 739, 109 Pac. 173, 175, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1058, has cogent pertinency to the case here, and is particularly illuminating upon the point now under consideration. See, also, Kansas City, etc., Co. v. Worthington, 101 Ark. 128, 141 S. W. 1173.

[6] But appellant emphasizes the proposition that the plaintiff, on cross-examination, admitted that, having observed Hurtzig alight from the train with safety, thought he could do likewise, and that he was governed more or less in his act in leaping to the ground by the successful performance of Hurtzig in that respect. In the first place, it is to be observed that the admissions of the plaintiff thus referred to on his cross-examination were somewhat at variance with his testimony given on his direct examination, and such inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness can go no further than to impair his credibility as a witness or reduce the weight of his testimony, and it is solely the function of the trier of the facts to say whether they have such an effect or may be rationally reconciled with the theory that the witness, in his testimony in chief, has told the truth.

[7] "In passing on the legal effect of plaintiff's evidence, the examinations in chief are not to be detached from the cross-examinations" (Masten v. Griffing, 33 Cal. 111), and it may be added that in passing upon the testimony of a witness elicited on cross-examination, such testimony is not to be detached from his examination in chief or considered without reference to the latter. In other words, the testimony of the witness must be considered in its entirety to determine the weight to which it is entitled. As is said in Firth v. Southern Pacific Co., 186 Pac. 815, it is for the court or the jury to determine how far, if at all, inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness go toward weakening such testimony or in impairing the credibility of the witness. In the second place, it is to be remarked that the mere fact that a person precedes another in jumping off a moving train does not stamp the act of the latter, if he happens to sustain injury by reason of his act of so jumping, as negligence per se, or is such an act as would justify this court in this case, when considering all its circumstances, in holding as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Filer v. N. Y. Central Ry. Co., 49 N. Y. 47, 10 Am. Rep. 327; Trinity Valley, etc., Co. v. Green (Tex. Civ. App.) 154 S. W. 278. Of course, if the plaintiff had voluntarily, and without being urged to do so by the trainmen, jumped from the train, a different situation would be presented, but, as we have shown, he was not only repeatedly told by the trainmen to leap from the train while it was in motion, but it was undoubtedly very plain to him that he would have to leave the train while it was moving or be taken some distance beyond his point of destination.

From all the foregoing considerations, it is obvious that it cannot justly be held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. As stated, that question, upon the evidence presented, was one for the court, as the selected arbiter of the facts, to determine.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 2, 1920. Rehearing Denied July 27, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 30, 1920.)

1. Partnership ⊜53—Evidence held to show partnership in building business.

In an action for an accounting, testimony by plaintiffs, and the books kept by defendant's intestate, held conclusively to show the existence of a partnership between plaintiffs and defendant's intestate for the conduct of the building business, notwithstanding declarations and admissions that plaintiffs were foremen for intestate.

2. Appeal and error ⊜1169(3) — Judgment for defendant not sustained because of defects in complaint which were amendable.

A judgment rendered for defendant after trial on the merits will not be sustained on appeal, because the defendant's demurrer to the complaint for failure to state cause of action should have been sustained, unless the complaint could not have been amended, so as to state a cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Charles N. Fink and another against Bessie E. Loynes, as administratrix, of the estate of Richard Loynes, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appealed. Reversed.

Louis N. Whealton, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Skinner & Jaques, of Long Beach, and Wheaton A. Gray, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for an accounting. Their principal contention in support of the appeal is that the findings of the court are unsupported by the evidence. The complaint set forth that the plaintiffs had entered into a copartnership or joint venture with the defendant's intestate, Richard Loynes, who died without any settlement or accounting between the parties having been arrived at, and prayed for such accounting. It is the finding of the court against this allegation of copartnership or joint venture, which is thus attacked by the appellants.

[1] The evidence in the case upon the subject of the formation and existence of said alleged copartnership is undisputed and is briefly as follows: The plaintiffs, Charles N. Fink and O. Mickelson, were brickmasons and building contractors engaged in business in and around Los Angeles. Richard Loynes was a brick manufacturer and building contractor doing business in Long Beach. In September, 1905, he invited the plaintiffs to go to Long Beach and enter into copartnership with him for the carrying on of a building and contracting business, informing them at the time that that branch of the business was getting too much for him. They acceded to his request and verbally agreed with him to enter into such copartnership, the terms of which were that the business should be conducted in the name of Richard Loynes: that the plaintiffs should devote their time to conducting the building operations, while Loynes attended to procuring contracts, keeping the accounts, and collecting moneys to become due as the result of the firm's operations. All brick used by the firm was to be supplied by Richard Loynes at the market price, if he chose to supply it, and the profits, if any, arising from the building contracts executed were to be divided equally between the plaintiffs; Loynes' profit to come from sales of brick to the firm, in which sales the plaintiffs had no interest. Loynes was also to finance the enterprise. Settlements were to be had every three months.

The plaintiffs, immediately upon the making of this agreement, removed to Long Beach, bringing with them their building paraphernalia, consisting of scaffolding, timbers, an electric hoist, a horse and wagon, etc., and during the existence of the partnership these appliances were used in its business. The building operations thereafter conducted by the parties, while quite numerous, were individually, in general, not of great magnitude, and the plaintiffs, being both practical brickmasons, acted as foremen on the jobs, and participated in the manual labor of laying the brick. When two jobs were proceeding simultaneously each supervised or acted as foreman on one of them. Each drew from the firm sums of money as he needed them, for which checks were made and signed by Loynes upon their request. These sums of money had no relation to the time each spent upon the work of building, although on some occasions, when the contract price was based upon the cost of materials and labor entering into the particular job, a record of such time was kept. Account books relating to the firm's operations were kept by Loynes, either personally or with the assistance of a bookkeeper, who, in such work, took his instructions exclusively from Loynes. In those books the plaintiffs were charged with the various sums paid to them or paid to others for their account, and they were credited with their respective shares of the profit arising from each individual contract.

The operations of the parties proceeded thus from the year 1905 to 1914. About three months after their inception the plaintiffs requested of Loynes an account showing what profits, if any, had arisen from the venture, but no account of such was made at the time, for the reason, given by Loynes, that no jobs were then complete. Plaintiffs made similar requests from time to time, but for one reason or another, advanced apparently, however, in perfectly good faith—sickness in the family, misplacement of a book, or the illness of Loynes himself—no settlement of profits was arrived at. The relations of the parties were intimate and perfectly harmonious; they addressing one another as Dick, or Charley, or whatever the given name might be. In 1914 a change was made in the terms of their business relations, according to which Fink thereafter had the superintendence of one piece of work, and Mickelson of the next; the profit, if any, arising from a particular contract going to the one having the superintendence of its execution. In other respects the arrangement remained the same, there being in reality now two separate partnerships, although, apparently, the significance of the change was not apparent to the parties, and we find in this an illustration of the informality which all the way through characterized their dealings.

In 1917 Loynes died; no settlement of the partnership affairs either up to 1914 or thereafter, having ever been had. The defendant, surviving widow of Loynes, as administratrix of her husband's estate, took possession of the books, assets, and properties of her husband, and of the firm of which he was a member, including building appliances belonging individually to the plaintiffs, and, being apparently ignorant of the precise nature of the business arrangements between the plaintiffs and the deceased, she denied the existence of any partnership, claimed that the plaintiffs were but employés of her deceased husband, and refused to account to them for any assets of the association.

The defendant's evidence in opposition to this uncontradicted showing was very brief, and may be narrated in detail:

W. J. Morrison, president of the bank of which the deceased was a director and in which he carried an account, was asked, "Do you know whether or not he [Richard Loynes] ever had any partners?" to which he replied, "Not to my knowledge."

A stipulation was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant at the trial that an absent witness, if called, would testify that the plaintiff Fink had not been introduced to him as a partner of the deceased. This evidence was offered in contradiction of a statement of said plaintiff in which he mentioned said absent witness as one of a number of persons to whom the deceased had introduced him as a partner.

Mrs. Loynes, a hostile witness, testified:

"In referring to the work such as that, he always spoke of these men as foremen."

Louis J. Kelly testified that on one occasion, when he took to the plaintiff Mickelson a number of envelopes containing the men's wages, one of such envelopes was marked with Mickelson's name.

George Phillipson testified:

"I have heard Mr. Fink state at one time him and Mr. Mickelson was foremen for Mr. Loynes for a great number of years. * * * That was the time they were dissolving the partnership, * * * the day that Fink and Mickelson dissolved partnership."

Finally, the defendant's son, a boy, testified:

"There was a man on the pier, and he said to another man, 'Whose boat is that?' And this other man told him: 'That is Charley Fink's, foreman for Dick Loynes. He is a brick man. He don't know anything about boats.' But after that I was down looking at the boat, and I said to Mr. Fink, 'This man out here don't think much of your ability as a sea captain;' and he says, 'How is that?' so I told him that this man had said that you were Charley Fink, Dick Loynes' foreman, and didn't know anything about boats, and he laughed. He did not contradict, when I told him he was a foreman."

It will thus be seen that the entire evidence upon which the finding of the court, that the alleged partnership did not exist, is based, is that a certain business associate of the deceased did not know of it; a denial by another person that one of the plaintiffs had been introduced to him as a partner; the fact that in conversation with his wife the deceased, in referring to certain work, spoke of the plaintiffs as foremen; the incident of the sending to Mickelson of an envelope with his name upon it and containing money; the statement, attributed to Fink, that he and Mickelson were foremen for the deceased for a great many years; and the boatman's quizzical reference to Fink as a poor sailor, in which he designated him as Dick Loynes' foreman.

It requires no critical analysis of this testimony offered by the defendant to demonstrate that there is nothing therein contradictory of the formation and existence of the alleged partnership, directly testified to by the plaintiffs, and conclusively established by the books of account of the deceased. It appears to us that there was nothing anomalous in the firm's business being conducted in the name of Richard Loynes exclusively. It was an established, going concern at the time of the plaintiff's admission to it. Loynes was financing the undertaking, and great informality characterized the dealings of the parties all the way through. Except for the purpose of satisfying the amour propre of the plaintiffs (of the existence of which to any marked degree there is no evidence in the record), there was no reason why they should desire the name by which the business was already known to be changed. The fact that they sometimes referred to themselves as foremen for Loynes, and that the latter also at times so designated them, is sufficiently explained by the circumstance that they in fact, throughout the duration of the partnership, acted in this capacity. It is obvious that by so doing their contractual relations to Loynes were not changed. No inference contrary to the existence of the alleged partnership is to be drawn from the receipt by Mickelson of an envelope containing money, as testified by Kelly; for it is made clear by the testimony of Mickelson that at times, when in charge of a job, a laborer would leave his employment before the end of the week, in which case Mickelson, instead of sending him to the office for the money due him, would himself pay him, and would be reimbursed for this outlay in the manner indicated by Kelly. And, finally, the boy's narration to Fink of his conversation with the boatman, and which testimony was offered as an admission against interest, was in fact no such admission, as the circumstances under which the narration was made were not such as to call for any response from Fink.

The whole of this evidence offered by the defendant is entirely consistent with the existence of the copartnership claimed by the plaintiffs; and in our opinion it affords no foundation for the finding of the court in question. This view of the evidence necessitates the reversal of the judgment, unless the respondent is correct in her contention that it should be affirmed, for the reason that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that her demurrers thereto, general and special, were improperly overruled.

[2] Without stopping to consider what effect should be given to the circumstance that the record on appeal discloses no such demurrers, nor order of the court thereon, it is settled by recent decisions of our Supreme Court that the respondent in an appeal, in whose favor a judgment has been rendered after a trial upon the merits, cannot protect his judgment by urging that his demurrer to the complaint ought to have been sustained, unless such complaint were incapable of amendment so as to state a cause of action. In this respect he is not in the position he would be, if he were himself appealing from the judgment. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett et al., 177 Cal. 560, 171 Pac. 304, and cases cited.

CRUICKSHANK v. VOGH et al. (Civ. 3381.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 30, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 26, 1920.)

1. Deeds ⟸211(3)—Deeds and contracts of elderly persons annulled after death of one party only upon clearest evidence.

While courts are disposed to relieve elderly persons from their improvident acts on any substantial showing of overreaching or fraud, still they cannot from motives of sympathy either annul deeds or make contracts after the death of one of the parties, except upon the clearest evidence, both upon the subject of the existence of the contract and its terms.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

The appellate court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the trial court on the facts; the trial judge, who saw and heard the witnesses, being the best qualified to determine questions of fact based on conflicting evidence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, and section 2061, subds. 2, 3, and 6.

3. Deeds ⟸210—Finding that plaintiff failed to prove lack of consideration for grant of remainder supported by evidence.

In an action to quiet title and to have a remainder dependent on a life estate in plaintiff annulled, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the plaintiff failed to prove to the satisfaction of the court that an alleged contract for support of plaintiff was made and that there was no consideration for the conveyance.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1) — Judgment supported by findings supported by evidence not disturbed.

Appellate court cannot disturb a judgment, when it is supported by findings which are themselves sustained by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Sarah Arnold against Alice Bertha Vogh, as administratrix of the estate of Valentine Arnold Vogh, deceased, and others. Plaintiff dying after trial, her executor, Lewis Cruickshank, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis Cruickshank and Vincent B. Vaughn, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jesse R. Shafer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in a suit to have it determined that a remainder dependent on a life estate in Sarah Arnold, deceased, be annulled. In the complaint the original plaintiff, Sarah Arnold, set up three causes of action. Her death occurred after the trial, and the appellant as the executor of her will was substituted as plaintiff. The facts beyond dispute are that the plaintiff was an elderly and sick woman, but of undiminished mental ability. She was the aunt of Arnold Vogh, and had lived with him or he with her until he was about 13 years of age. He also was sick. He had married the principal defendant. Mrs. Arnold had come to California from Mississippi, and was living with the Voghs. They treated her kindly and took care of her. She paid the grocery bills. Vogh was employed in a mill, and his health was failing. Mrs. Arnold was advised to go to the mountains, and the Voghs accompanied her. She purchased for $4,500 the property in suit, causing the deed to be made to her as the life tenant, with remainder over to Vogh. She purchased lumber for two small dwellings, which Vogh had practically completed, when, a short time after he had given up his position, he went to the hospital to undergo an operation. He died on October 1, 1911. The deed was dated September 4, 1911, acknowledged September 7, and recorded September 22, 1911.

In the first cause of action the plaintiff alleged that the consideration for causing the remainder to be conveyed to Vogh was his promise that he would take care of her for the remainder of her life, and that by reason of his death without having made provision for her care, and because of the failure of his wife and of his estate to provide for her, the consideration for the conveyance had wholly failed. The second cause of action was based on allegations of fraud and undue influence, and it has been abandoned by the appellant. The third cause of action contained the formal allegations of a suit to quiet title to the property, of which the plaintiff alleged she was the owner. She also alleged that the defendants claimed some interest adverse to her, without right. The prayer was that the provision of the deed, which was set up as an exhibit, vesting an estate in remainder in Vogh, be declared void, and that the plaintiff's title be quieted. The court found that the first and third causes of action were barred, that Vogh did not agree to give the plaintiff personal care and attention through life, and that there was a sufficient consideration for the conveyance. The appellant attacks each of these findings, and makes no other contention. If the findings in regard to the contract and the consideration for the conveyance are supported by the evidence, the error, if error there were, in applying the bar of the statute, is immaterial.

The only direct evidence concerning the contract for support is that of the plaintiff. She testified that Vogh promised to care for her during her life, and that when she went to the office of the title company, and directed the deed to be made to her, he took her out into the hall and told her he would not go onto the place, he and his wife, unless she put his name in the deed with his wife's. Subsequently, on learning of pending divorce proceedings between Mrs. Vogh and her husband, the plaintiff directed the deed to be made in its final form. At the time of the conversation, she testified, in reply to a direct question as to whether he had made any promises or not, that he said:

"You know you need care and attention, and we are willing to give it to you; that is what I want to do."

Mrs. Travels, formerly Mrs. Vogh, testified that Mrs. Arnold had said:

"She had provided for the rest of them—that is, that she had done something for the rest of them—and that her husband had promised to give Mr. Vogh something for the name of Arnold, and she would buy a home, and then give it to him. She didn't say where then, until somebody told her to go to the mountains. * * * And after we moved up there with her, she said she would buy some cows and put him in the dairy business. That is all that was ever said; that is, the same thing talked over every time. There was never anything said in my presence by Mrs. Arnold or Mr. Vogh about him giving his personal care and attention during the rest of his life; she said, when she got better, she was going back to Mississippi, to her home."

Another witness for the defendant testified that—

"She said she would give him a place if he would come up there, and she told him she bought the lumber to build the house, and if he built two houses it would be to his advantage, for when she got better she was going back to Mississippi, where she came from, and then it would all be his, or to be her house; he would have it, if he would build the two houses. It would be no disadvantage to him is the way I remember it now. That is what I heard her say to him, him to her, and they were talking between each other. That is as far as I know about that."

[1] Mrs. Arnold was not recalled to rebut this evidence of Mrs. Travels. Parts of the testimony of Mrs. Arnold in regard to when she first learned that she could not sell the property after the death of Vogh and in regard to other collateral matters were shaken by cross-examination and were contradicted by other witnesses. She gave some testimony which could only have been addressed to the second cause of action, based on fraud and undue influence; but it was of so weak a character that those claims were abandoned. While it is unhappily true that elderly persons far too often make the mistake typified by that of King Lear, and courts are disposed to relieve them from their improvident acts upon any substantial showing of overreaching or fraud, still courts cannot from motives of sympathy either annul deeds or make contracts after the death of one of the parties, except upon the clearest evidence, both upon the subject of the existence of the contract and its terms. As was said by the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Van Fleet:

"The plaintiff's case depended entirely upon oral testimony as to transactions with the deceased Blythe. That testimony was of such a nature as to make direct contradiction absolutely impossible. No documents of any kind were produced to substantiate it, nor was it corroborated by any independent fact. Plaintiff's claim was never heard of until more than a year after the appointment of an administrator on Blythe's estate, not even by parties who were jointly interested in the alleged commissions." Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 523, 39 Pac. 203, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87.

Mrs. Vogh was appointed administratrix of the estate of Vogh on October 31, 1911. No claim was made by Mrs. Arnold against the estate. The suit was not commenced until August 30, 1915, nearly 4 years after Vogh's death. Regardless of any bearing the delay might have had upon either the question of laches or that of limitations, it was a circumstance which the trial court was warranted in considering in weighing the testimony of Mrs. Arnold.

[2-4] Even though this court might have reached a different conclusion in regard to the existence of the agreement alleged by the plaintiff or in regard to the consideration for the conveyance, it could not substitute its judgment for that of the trial court in such a case as this. The judge, who saw and heard the witnesses, was best qualified to determine whether or not the presumption that Mrs. Arnold told the truth in regard to the single conversation out of the hearing of all other persons was repelled by the manner in which she testified or by the character of her testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, and section 2061, subds. 2, 3, and 6. There was sufficient evidence to support the findings to the effect that the plaintiff had failed to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the alleged contract for support was made and that there was no consideration for the conveyance. This court cannot disturb the judgment, when it is supported by findings which are themselves sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOULD v. CRAWFORD et al. (Civ. 3359.)

1. Mortgages ⟸581(5)—Attorney's fee held reasonable on foreclosure.

On foreclosure of a mortgage, where judgment was for nearly $6,500, and counsel presented to the court practically every technical problem the law permitted, an allowance of attorney's fees in the sum of $250 held reasonable.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1073(5) — Filing of order nunc pro tunc held harmless, if error.

In a foreclosure proceeding, where mortgagors in writing waived notice of further proceedings after service of the original complaint, and the attention of the court was called to waiver on a certain date when a motion was made to amend the complaint, and the bill of exceptions shows such facts, an order, permitting the waiver to be filed nunc pro tunc as of the date on which it was called to the attention of the court, added nothing to, and did not militate against, the effect of the judgment and junior incumbrancers, and, if erroneously entered, was harmless.

3. Appeal and error ⟸900—Every intendment in favor of regularity of exercise of jurisdiction.

On appeal from a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, every intendment is in favor of the regularity of the exercise of the jurisdiction shown by the record.

4. Appeal and error ⟸496, 913(1)—Service of amended pleadings presumed on appeal, and need not appear in judgment roll.

On appeal from judgment, proof of service of amended pleadings need not appear in the judgment roll, as it will be presumed, in the absence of affirmative showing to the contrary, that they were regularly served, and that evidence thereof was before the court when it made its judgment.

5. Appeal and error ⟸918(1)—Insufficient waiver held not to overcome presumption of service of amendment.

In a mortgage foreclosure, an insufficient waiver of further notice after service of original complaint does not prevent the operation of the presumption on appeal that proper service of amendments to the complaint were made.

6. Mortgages ⟸401(4)—Mortgagee may exercise option of declaring entire debt due by suing.

Under a mortgage providing that on default of interest the mortgagee might declare the entire debt due, mortgagee could exercise his option of declaring the entire debt to be due simply by suing for it.

7. Pleading ⟸354(2)—Cross-complaint in mortgage foreclosure properly stricken out.

Where matters set forth in cross-complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage, seeking to bring in parties, were not in any way responsive to the cause of action of the plaintiff for the foreclosure of her mortgage, and did not affect in any way the rights of defendants in the matter of priorities as between the plaintiff and the defendants, nor as between the defendants and the other parties, court properly struck it out.

8. Trial ⟸404(1)—Finding that allegations were untrue is finding that defendant did not prove same.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, a finding that allegations of the answers were untrue was only a finding that defendants did not prove what they alleged under oath, and was not a finding that certain defendants, who alleged in their answer that they were owners by reason of a certain conveyance, and not simply junior incumbrancers, were merely junior incumbrancers and not owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Gould against Frances E. Crawford and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order entered nunc pro tunc, defendants George E. Mills and Belle Haecker Mills appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Mills and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. H. Merriam and Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. George E. Mills and Belle Haecker Mills, sued as junior incumbrancers, appeal from a judgment decreeing the foreclosure of a mortgage on real property and from an order made after judgment permitting the filing, nunc pro tunc, of a waiver of notice, signed by the original mortgagors and called to the attention of the court before the amendment of the complaint, in regard to which the appellants make their principal contention.

[1] It is contended that the court erred in allowing attorney's fees in the sum of $250. The evidence was that the plaintiff agreed with her attorney that the court was to fix the amount of the fee, but that if the plaintiff should be compelled to buy the property at the foreclosure sale to protect her interest the attorney was to receive $100. The judgment was for nearly $6,500, and of the 50-odd defendants, the appellants were the only ones who actively engaged in the litigation. Their activities in the suit were most diligently carried forward. Their counsel, acting in their behalf, presented to the court practically every technical problem the law permitted. Upon a consideration of the entire record the amount of attorneys' fees allowed appears both reasonable and in conformity with the agreement.

[2] The appeal from the nunc pro tunc order is without merit. The essential facts are that the mortgagors in writing waived notice of further proceedings after the service of the original complaint, and that the attention of the court was called to the waiver on November 2, 1917, when the motion was made to amend the complaint. The bill of exceptions on the appeal from the judgment printed in the appellants' transcript shows these facts. The order permitting the waiver to be filed as of the date on which it was called to the attention of the court added nothing to, and did not militate against the effect of the judgment. If the order was erroneous the appellants were not injured by it.

[3-5] The appellants' main contention is that the lien of the mortgage was not extinguished by the foreclosure decree. The original complaint was served on the mortgagors as well as the appellants. The former defaulted, and signed the waiver of notice of all further proceedings. The appellants demurred successfully to the complaint, and the plaintiff was given leave to amend. In the original complaint it was alleged that default had been made in the payment of interest. The mortgage provided that in the event of such default the mortgagee might declare the entire indebtedness due. In the amendment to the complaint it was alleged that no payments had been made on the principal of the note, nor on account of accrued interest. The appellants contend that without service of the amendment they would not have been protected had they bought at the sale. The record shows the service of the original complaint and the default of the mortgagors. The judgment recites these matters, and it contains nothing to show whether or not the amendment was served. The judgment is of a court of general jurisdiction, and every intendment is in favor of the regularity of the exercise of the jurisdiction shown by the record. "The statute concerning the contents of the judgment roll in such cases does not require the proof of service of amended pleadings to appear therein, * * * and in our opinion it must be presumed—in the absence of affirmative showing to the contrary—that the amendments were regularly served, and that evidence thereof was before the court when it made its decree." Riverside County v. Stockman, 124 Cal. 222, 56 Pac. 1027. If the contention is that the waiver of notice prevents the operation of this presumption the appellants are not benefited. If the waiver was sufficient, service of the amendment on the mortgagors was not required. If it was not sufficient, then the presumption of such service as was necessary becomes operative, in the absence of showing that service was not made.

[6] It is contended that the mortgage was not due. It provided that on default of interest the mortgagee might declare the entire debt due. The plaintiff alleged the default in payment of interest in the original complaint when she sued for foreclosure. She could not more effectively have exercised her option of declaring the debt to be due than by suing for it. Trinity Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 Pac. 385.

tions and dismissing the action as to these parties. The appellants filed a cross-complaint, in which they repeated substantially the allegations of the complaint, and sought to bring in the parties who had been dismissed from the suit. On motion of the plaintiff the cross-complaint was stricken out. The matters set forth in the cross-complaint were not in any way responsive to the cause of action of the plaintiff for the foreclosure of her mortgage, nor did they affect in any way the rights of the appellants in the matter of priorities as between the plaintiff as the holder of the superior lien and the appellants, nor as between the appellants and the other parties named. The cross-complaint was filed without leave of the court, and on the motion to strike it out it properly determined that the parties were not necessary to the determination of the cause before it. Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 565–570, 79 Pac. 171.

[8] The appellants alleged that they were the owners of the mortgaged land under a conveyance from the original mortgagors subsequent in date to the mortgage. On the trial the appellants, who were the only defendants who had not defaulted, refused to introduce any evidence. The court made specific findings sufficient to support the judgment, and also found that the allegations of the answers were untrue. On this appeal the appellants contend that this general finding is a determination that they did not receive the conveyance they alleged under oath that they did receive, and that, therefore, it must be assumed they are simply junior incumbrancers and not the owners of the property. From this it is argued that by reason of the errors which it is claimed the trial court made the original mortgagors as owners may attack the decree. The effect of the general finding was merely that the appellants did not prove what they alleged under oath. Upon the record made they cannot be heard in this court to stultify themselves.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Ex parte HOLDER. (Cr. 731.)

1. Habeas corpus ⟸54—Portion of petition held surplusage, a legal conclusion.

The quoted portion of the petition for habeas corpus that H. is imprisoned by virtue of an indictment charging him with embezzlement, "under Pen. Code, § 506, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1090," is mere surplusage, being at most an averment of a legal conclusion.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸54—Averment of petition, constituting legal conclusion, not admitted by failure to deny.

Averment of petition for habeas corpus, constituting surplusage, a legal conclusion, that indictment charging embezzlement was under a certain section of the Code, is not admitted by failure to deny.

3. Habeas corpus ⟸92(1)—What the ultimate proof will be not considered.

What the ultimate proof will be cannot be considered on application for habeas corpus by one in custody under indictment.

4. Habeas corpus ⟸30(2)—Not ground for release that indictment erroneously states section of Code.

The indictment under which petitioner for habeas corpus is held, by its allegations of facts substantially charging embezzlement under Pen. Code, § 503, is no ground for release that it alleges not a violation of that section, but of another, claimed to be unconstitutional.

Original application by W. H. Holder for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

John S. Cooper, M. G. Phillips, and Bennett, Collings & Cooper, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petition alleges, among other things, "that W. H. Holder is imprisoned, detained, confined and restrained of his liberty" by the sheriff of Los Angeles county "by virtue of an indictment charging him with embezzlement under section 506 of the Penal Code of the State of California, as amended in 1919, a copy of which indictment is herewith attached and made a part hereof." (Italics ours.)

The indictment is in two counts, identical in form, but relating to separate offenses of the same class. For our present purposes we quote the preamble to the indictment and the first count only, which are as follows:

"W. H. Holder is accused by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by this indictment of the crime of embezzlement, a felony, committed at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and before the finding of this indictment, as follows, to wit: That the said W. H. Holder, on or about the 17th day of November, 1919, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, was then and there a contractor by virtue of a contract entered into by and between Harry Scholl and Alva M. Scholl, and the said W. H. Holder for the erection and construction of a dwelling house, and was then and there by virtue of said contract relation and contractor, intrusted with and there came into the possession, care, custody, and control of him, the said W. H. Holder, money of the value of $2,000, lawful money of the United States, of the value of $2,000 in gold coin of the United States, and of the personal property of the said Harry Edward Scholl and Alva M. Scholl. And he, the said W. H. Holder, after the said money had come into his possession, care, custody, and control, as aforesaid, did then and there, to wit, on or about the 17th day of November, 1919, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously convert, embezzle, and appropriate $1,500 of the said $2,000 to his own use, and to uses and purposes not contemplated by his said contract, contrary to his trust and contract and contractor's relation as such contractor, servant and agent of the said Harry Edward Scholl and Alva M. Scholl."

The writ was issued and made returnable before this court, and on the return day the sheriff of said county filed his return, which, in words and figures, is as follows:

"I, John C. Cline, sheriff of the County of Los Angeles, state of California, in obedience to the order contained in the within writ, do hereby return to the honorable district Court of Appeal, in and for the Second District of the state of California, that before the coming to me of the within writ, the said W. H. Holder was arrested and held on a grand jury indictment, nevertheless, I have the body of the said defendant before you at the time and place mentioned."

On the issues thus presented, the respective parties presented their arguments, and the cause was submitted. It was admitted at the time of argument that the "indictment" referred to in the sheriff's return was the same "indictment" referred to in and made a part of petitioner's application for the writ.

[1-3] It is contended by petitioner that the italicized portion of the first paragraph of this opinion is admitted by a failure to deny the same on the part of respondent; also that said section 506 is unconstitutional, and that therefore the restraint is illegal and void. The first question, perhaps, that should be decided by us is, therefore: Does such failure to deny the statement italicized by us admit the truth thereof? It is our opinion that the portion referred to is mere surplusage, and, hence, redundant and immaterial, being at most but an averment of a legal conclusion. We think that a failure to deny such an averment cannot be treated as an admission thereof. 31 Cyc. 90; Gates v. Salmon, 46 Cal. 361, 379; McCaughey v. Schuette, 117 Cal. 223, 46 Pac. 666, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 176. It follows from this reasoning, therefore, that for our present purposes we are concerned, not with the question whether section 506 of the Penal Code as amended by St. 1919, p. 1090, is or is not constitutional, but, rather, in ascertaining from an examination of the allegations of fact in the indictment itself whether any public offense is charged and, if so, what that offense is. We cannot concern ourselves as to what the ultimate proof may be. Re Kennedy, 144 Cal. 634, 78 Pac. 34, 67 L. R. A. 406, 103 Am. St. Rep. 117, 1 Ann. Cas. 840; People v. Goodrich, 142 Cal. 216, 75 Pac. 796; Re Leonardino, 9 Cal. App. 690, 100 Pac. 708; Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605.

"Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted."

Viewed in the light of this section, we think the indictment under which petitioner was arrested and by virtue of which he is held by the sheriff as aforesaid, sets forth the essential elements of embezzlement, which, as we understand them to be, are: (1) The fiduciary relation arising where one intrusts property to another; and (2) the fraudulent appropriation of the property by the latter. We think, too, that notwithstanding the surplusage contained in the indictment, it alleges, substantially, the crime denounced by section 503. Petitioner is distinctly charged with having received the money for and on account of the Scholls, and with having feloniously embezzled and converted it to his own use, and not in the due and lawful execution of his trust. For the reasons stated in the Matter of Rogers, 160 Cal. 764, 118 Pac. 242, it is of no consequence to petitioner that a violation of section 506 of the Penal Code was charged in the indictment, instead of section 503, supra, under which the facts bring the offense. The case is within the doctrine enunciated in Re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674, a habeas corpus proceeding, where, contrary to the contention of petitioner here, the court holds that—

"The writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the office of a demurrer, * * * and will not lie, when the court has jurisdiction of the kind of offense charged, and there is an attempt, however defective, and however subject to a demurrer, to state a public offense, and the facts alleged squint at a substantive statement of such offense."

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

FRITZ v. MILLS et al. (Civ. 3327.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 28, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 26, 1920.)

1. Property ⟸9—Evidence held to show that money deposited in court to pay mortgage belonged to plaintiff.

Evidence that plaintiff in an action for specific performance borrowed the money deposited in court to pay off a mortgage on the property, as required by the court's decree, which was later reversed, held to show that the money belonged to plaintiff, and not to her attorney.

2. Equity ⟸65(2)—Unsuccessful litigation by plaintiff held not to establish want of clean hands.

Where plaintiff had sued for specific performance and paid a mortgage on the premises, as required by the court's decree for specific performance, which was later reversed, contracts of sale by plaintiff and litigation defended by her in good faith on grounds which, though not sustained, there was legal cause for advancing, do not show that plaintiff came into court without clean hands, so as to be deprived of the right to subrogation, especially where defendant had received through the litigation full compensation for the use of the premises and the satisfaction of a mortgage thereon by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Charles Wesley Reed, for whom Mary A. Fritz was substituted as plaintiff, against Laura J. E. Mills and another. From a decree subrogating plaintiff to the rights under a mortgage and directing foreclosure and sale, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 170 Cal. 449, 150 Pac. 375.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arthur H. Barendt, Charles J. Heggerty, Charles Wesley Reed, and George H. Pippy, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendants, Laura J. E. Mills and Frederick J. Mills, from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, Mary A. Fritz, subrogating plaintiff to the rights of a mortgagee and awarding judgment against the defendants for the amount of the lien, with the usual decree of foreclosure and order of sale. This is the third appeal of this action and a recital of the history of the litigation seems necessary in order to clearly state, and afterwards to intelligently discuss, the points raised on this appeal.

The action was commenced on October 31, 1906, by Charles Wesley Reed, to compel the specific performance by the defendants of a contract for the sale to Reed of certain real property situate in the city of San Francisco, which, at the time, was mortgaged to the Mechanics' Building & Loan Association for the sum of $5,000. On October 24, 1907, the mortgagee commenced foreclosure proceedings. On May 19, 1908, the present plaintiff, Mary A. Fritz, was in the action at bar substituted as party plaintiff in the place of Reed. On May 18, 1908, pursuant to an interlocutory judgment to the effect that it would be equitable for plaintiff to deposit with the clerk of the court the sum of $6,988.99, to cover the amount due said defendants under said contract of sale, including a rental of $35.83 per month from April 9, 1906, from which time plaintiff had occupied the premises, plaintiff tendered to the clerk that amount, and, on May 29, 1908, the court entered a finding to that effect. Thereafter, on June 9, 1908, the court rendered its final decree in favor of plaintiff, and it was, among other things, decree that defendants should, within five days, deposit with the clerk of said court a deed of said premises to plaintiff, or, upon their failure to do so, the clerk should execute said deed and deliver the same to plaintiff, and that upon the delivery of said deed the clerk should pay said mortgage, including certain counsel fees and costs, to said Mechanics' Building & Loan Association, and, after making certain other payments, should pay the remaining money to the defendants. It was provided, however, that before making any of said payments said defendants should execute and deliver to the clerk a satisfaction of the judgment in the action. The defendants refused to execute said deed, and, on July 14, 1908, the clerk of the court executed a deed to plaintiff and delivered it to plaintiff's attorney. It was filed for record the following day. Before the delivery of the same, however, the clerk obtained from plaintiff's attorney a written waiver of that part of the judgment which required defendants to execute a satisfaction of said judgment prior to the disbursement of said money. Thereafter, on August 5, 1908, the court directed the treasurer, to whom the money had been paid by the county clerk, to pay off the amount of said mortgage of said Mechanics' Building & Loan Association, amounting to $5,707.17, which was done, and said mortgage was then satisfied of record accordingly. No bond for a stay of execution of the judgment was ever given by defendants, but on December 1, 1908, they took an appeal

On appeal the judgment was, on December 3, 1909, reversed (Fritz v. Mills, 12 Cal. App. 113, 106 Pac. 725), upon the ground that the complaint in the action declared upon a written agreement for the sale of real estate, whereas the findings and judgment were based upon an equitable estoppel in pais, which had not been pleaded. The effect of the reversal of the judgment was to nullify plaintiff's deed to the premises.

After the cause was remanded to the superior court the plaintiff filed a third amended complaint and also a supplemental complaint. In the supplemental complaint all of the proceedings taken by the court and the parties after the first trial, relating to the execution of the deed, the payment of the money, and the satisfaction of the mortgage, were set out substantially as they are hereinabove recited. The prayer was that plaintiff be reimbursed for such payments and be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, in case plaintiff should not obtain a conveyance of the property, and for such other and further relief as should be just and equitable. On the second trial the judgment was in favor of the defendants. The court denied the prayer of the third amended complaint for specific performance, and in reference to matters pleaded in the supplemental complaint held that the payment of the money into court by plaintiff and the satisfaction of the mortgage were voluntary acts on her part, and she was therefore entitled to no relief. A motion for a new trial was made by plaintiff, and the court denied the motion as to that part of the judgment which denied specific performance, but granted the motion as to the supplemental complaint, "solely upon the ground that in the opinion of the court the payment of the mortgage by Reed was not a voluntary payment, and that plaintiff is entitled to relief on account of such payment." Appeals were then taken by both plaintiff and defendants, and, on June 21, 1915, the Supreme Court (Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 449, 150 Pac. 375) sustained the views of the lower court on the motion for a new trial. In doing so the Supreme Court declared in unmistakable language that the facts pleaded in the supplemental complaint entitled plaintiff to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and that she should be granted relief accordingly.

The next trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in accordance with the views expressed by the Supreme Court. The plaintiff was subrogated to the rights of the Mechanics' Building & Loan Association, and was given a decree of foreclosure and order of sale for the amount of her lien.

The decision of the Supreme Court, speaking through an opinion written by Mr. Justice Shaw, in which all of the Justices concurred, is full and comprehensive, and, in our opinion, disposes of all of the important questions arising on this appeal. After a full recital of the facts the decision reads:

"Upon these facts, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to relief on account of the payment of said mortgage out of the money deposited in court, if it shall be finally determined that she is not entitled to specific performance. The allegation that the payment was made pursuant to the orders and decree of the court is true, and the finding to the contrary is without support in the evidence. The payment was made in good faith for the purpose of complying with the judgment given by the court and with the agreement which that judgment purported to enforce. The plaintiff cannot justly be made to suffer loss by such compliance, and it would be inequitable to allow the defendants to profit by a successful appeal taken after the plaintiff, relying on that judgment, had complied with its terms by paying money on the defendant's debt which the plaintiff was otherwise under no obligation to pay.

"We are also of the opinion that the court has power, under such a supplemental complaint, to declare that the plaintiff shall be subrogated to the lien of the mortgage and to enforce such lien in her favor by an appropriate judgment in the action, in case it should conclude that the plaintiff was not entitled to enforce the alleged agreement of sale. The matters upon which the supplemental complaint were based all took place in the course of the proceedings in the main case and in pursuance of the orders and judgment made by the court. The acts of the plaintiff were both authorized and required by the court itself, and, when the matter was regularly brought to its notice before final judgment, the court could and should, in justice, give appropriate relief in the action in which the payments were made, in order, so far as it is able to do so, to restore to plaintiff the money she had paid for the defendants in pursuance of its own erroneous judgment. For these reasons, we hold that, so far as the matters presented by the supplemental complaint are concerned, the new trial was properly granted."

And in conclusion the court said:

"For these reasons we think the court below should have limited its order for a new trial to the matters presented by the supplemental complaint and the answer thereto, and that it was correct in denying the new trial so far as the merits of the case of the plaintiff for specific performance is concerned. The order granting a new trial operated to vacate the judgment provisionally, in the event that the order should be sustained on appeal. In the existing circumstances, we think the judgment should stand vacated in order that the court below, upon the going down of the remittitur, may proceed to a retrial of the issues arising upon the supplemental complaint, and, after determining the rights of the plaintiff thereunder, may proceed to enter an appropriate judgment for the relief therein claimed, simultaneously with a re-entry of the judgment denying the plaintiff's case for specific performance, that the new trial shall not embrace a retrial of the issues arising upon the third amended complaint, but that the findings already made shall stand as the final decision thereon."

[1] Appellants now contend, however, that during the last trial certain additional evidence was presented which was not considered by the Supreme Court at the time it rendered its decision, and it is claimed that such evidence renders the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court, in so far as it holds that plaintiff was entitled to subrogation, inapplicable to the merits of the present appeal. In this respect it is first claimed that the money deposited with the clerk and paid on the mortgage was Reed's money, and not that of Mrs. Fritz. The evidence shows to the contrary. Reed, on May 1, 1908, executed an assignment and transferred all of his interest to Mrs. Fritz, and that assignment was filed in court on May 4, 1908. The interlocutory decree, requiring the deposit to be made, was rendered and filed on May 16, 1908, and two days afterwards, on May 18, 1908, Mrs. Fritz personally borrowed $6,800 from the First National Bank on her promissory note, and delivered the money to Reed, as her attorney, to pay into court, and Reed deposited the money with the clerk of the court accordingly. Afterwards Mrs. Fritz personally paid the note at the bank. Whatever Reed may have said about the money being his money was merely his opinion, and is contrary to the established facts. He admitted that Mrs. Fritz had obtained the money in the manner testified to by her, and it was conclusively shown that at the time he made the deposit he had legally transferred all of his interest in the case, and he expressly admitted while testifying that he claimed no interest as a party in the litigation.

[2] It is next contended that plaintiff's case is without equity, and that she does not come into court with clean hands. In support of this contention appellants rely principally upon certain acts of plaintiff in relation to two other suits which grew out of this transaction. On September 30, 1908, after Mrs. Fritz had obtained a deed to the property, she entered into an installment contract to sell it to Isabella Laing. During the life of that contract, to wit, on June 30, 1909, plaintiff commenced suit under the McEnerney Act to perfect the title. In that suit it was alleged in the verified petition of Mrs. Fritz that she was the owner in fee and in the actual and peaceable possession of the property. Her affidavit contains substantially the same statement, and further states that there were no subsisting mortgages, deeds of trust, or other liens on said property, and that any claim of Mrs. Mills was without foundation or right. The remittitur of the District Court of Appeal on the first reversal of the action at bar was filed on February 10, 1910, and afterwards, on April 30, 1910, Mrs. Fritz, assuming to act as the owner of the property, entered into a further agreement with Mrs. Laing for the sale of the property. The two suits above referred to, in the defense of which the acts of Mrs. Fritz are assailed, were both in ejectment, instituted by Mrs. Mills for the restitution of the premises and for damages for their use and occupation. The first suit was commenced against Reed and Mrs. Fritz on April 8, 1911, subsequent to the date of the first reversal. In the answer in that action Mrs. Fritz alleged that since April 9, 1906, she had been and was then the owner of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof. That action was dismissed on December 2, 1915, for want of prosecution. On December 4, 1915, two days afterwards, Mrs. Mills commenced the second action in ejectment against the Laings, to whom Mrs. Fritz had contracted to sell the property. This action was commenced a few months subsequent to the date of the decision of the Supreme Court. The Laings were represented in that action by an attorney employed by Mrs. Fritz, and Mrs. Fritz financed the defense of the action. Among the defenses urged were those of adverse possession and the statute of limitations. On June 27, 1916, Mrs. Mills recovered a judgment against the Laings for $4,535.70, with interest and costs, for damages on account of the withholding of the possession of said premises from December 4, 1910, to the date of judgment. An appeal was taken by the Laings, and the judgment was afterwards, on November 26, 1918, affirmed by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District. Mills v. Laing, 38 Cal. App. 776, 177 Pac. 493, Mrs. Fritz financed the appeal, and afterwards paid the judgment, together with the interest and costs.

The position of Mrs. Fritz throughout the course of the prolonged litigation above mentioned and the matters pleaded by her in the defense of those actions, and the assumption by her of the ownership of the property subsequent to the reversals, together with other acts done and performed by her incidental to the litigation, the importance of which is not sufficient to here discuss, is claimed by appellants to be contrary to equity and good conscience and sufficient to deprive Mrs. Fritz of the right to seek any relief in a court of equity. With this contention we cannot agree. In 1908 Mrs. Fritz borrowed $6,800 to invest in a perfectly legitimate transaction, which afterwards developed into a complicated and seemingly endless subject of litigation. In the course of that litigation, in order to protect her legal rights, it was necessary for her to present her cause in the manner advised by legal counsel. It was not until November 26, 1918, at the time the District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment in Mills v. Laing, that it was definitely determined that Mrs. Fritz and her successors were not the owners of the property or entitled to the possession thereof, and until that question was definitely decided her attorneys were entitled to make and present any defense which they believed to be consistent with the law. The discussions contained in the opinions of the appellate courts show that while those defenses were not sustained, there was sufficient legal ground for urging them. Mrs. Fritz has been compelled to pay the judgment recovered against the Laings, which, with interest and costs, amounted to upwards of $5,000, which compensated the appellants for the use of the premises from December 4, 1910, to December 4, 1915, and there has also been deducted from the judgment in the instant case upwards of $5,000 for the use of the premises from April 9, 1906, to December 4, 1910. She has also repaid to the Laings the amount paid by them on the purchase price of the property, and, furthermore, Mrs. Fritz has met the expenses of three trials in the superior court and the cost of two appeals, and now, at the conclusion of 12 years of continuous litigation, she will recover the net sum of $7,443.75. On the other hand, defendants at the commencement of the litigation were the owners of an equity in this property, over the amount of the mortgage interest, of approximately $1,100. During the 14 years they have been out of the possession of the property they have received cash and credit to adequately compensate them for the use of the property. If plaintiff shall now be denied the amount of money originally invested by her in this transaction, which is represented by the present judgment, and if appellants are allowed to take the property free and clear of a lien, toward the liquidation of which they contributed nothing, it would be manifestly unjust and contrary to the established principles of equity and justice. We can find no merit in the contention of appellants that the respondent does not come into court with clean hands.

The other points raised by appellants are either immaterial or they have been disposed of by the decision of the Supreme Court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

McPHAIL v. NUNES et al. (Civ. 2152.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 29, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=1099(3)—Decision on former appeal as to binding effect of judgment law of case.

A decision on former appeal of the same action that a prior judgment was not binding on plaintiff is the law of the case thereafter.

2. Taxation ⊂=710—Though tax deed was void, redemption money must be paid purchaser instead of state.

Though a tax deed was void, yet where the purchaser had paid the state the entire amount of taxes and penalties so as to be entitled to a deed, the owner cannot, by paying such amount to the state, redeem; the state having parted with its interest.

3. Quieting title ⊂=44(4) — Prima facie title conclusive as against defendants having no interest.

Proof of a chain of title from the patentee down to plaintiff, establishing a prima facie title, was conclusive as against defendants, who were not in possession of the land, and whose tax deed was void.

4. Taxation ⊂=814(1)—Refusal of tender by holder of invalid tax deed does not warrant judgment without provision for payment.

Under Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1917, p. 715, relating to invalid tax titles, judgment should not be entered for the owner of land, where the tax deed was invalid, without provision for payment to the purchaser of the amount of the taxes, and this is so though the purchaser in open court declined the tender of such amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Hugh McPhail against A. F. Nunes and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Lamberson, Burke & Lamberson, of Visalia, for appellants.

John G. Covert, of Hanford, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiff to quiet title to a certain tract of land in Kings county, Cal., particularly described as the northeast quarter of section 3, township 24 south, range 18 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, and to have set aside and declared null and void a certain judgment entered in the superior court in Kings county on the 10th day of June, 1909, in the case of Nunes v. Copper et al. The complaint was filed June 19, 1915.

Defendants answered, and in the second amended answer denied that plaintiff was the owner of the lands in question, and denied that the judgment in the case of Nunes v. Copper et al. was void and of no effect, but admitted that they claimed an interest and ownership in the lands, and alleged in that respect that they were the owners of said land.

Defendants as a separate defense alleged: (1) That the sum of $87.12 by them paid for said lands had not been returned to them by plaintiff, nor offer made to return the same; (2) that defendants and their immediate predecessors had acquired title by prescription; and (3) that said action was barred by section 318 and subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On issue joined by the pleadings the case came on for trial on March 23, 1916, and the court made and entered its findings and gave judgment for defendants, quieting their title to said lands. However, the court found against defendants upon prescriptive title, bar of the statutes, and a certain tax deed under which defendants claimed, but found that the judgment rendered in the case of Nunes v. Copper, on the 10th day of June, 1909, was a valid and subsisting judgment, and on this finding entered judgment, quieting title in defendants as above stated.

From this judgment plaintiff Hugh McPhail appealed, and on the 7th day of November, 1918, this court reversed the judgment of the lower court, and remanded the cause. McPhail v. Nunes, 38 Cal. App. 557, 177 Pac. 193. On the second trial judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and from the judgment so entered defendants have appealed.

[1] As appears from the above statement the court on the first trial held that plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations, and that defendants had no title by virtue of a certain tax deed under which they claimed, but that defendants had title by virtue of the judgment rendered in favor of defendant Nunes in the case of Nunes v. Copper et al., in which action service of summons was made by publication, and which service this court held to be invalid, and by reason of such invalid service reversed the judgment. McPhail v. Nunes, 38 Cal. App. 557, 177 Pac. 193.

This decision upon the question of the service of summons has become the law of the case, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to enter into any further discussion of the matter.

The point is made by appellants upon this appeal that plaintiff cannot maintain this action, for the reason that the property had been sold to the state of California, and that the plaintiff had not redeemed from such sale to the state, and that plaintiff is in no position to maintain an action to quiet title.

[2] It appears from the record that the real property was sold to the state for delinquent taxes on the 27th day of June, 1900, and that the state received a deed for the same on the 8th day of July, 1905; that on the 26th day of July, 1907, a deed from the state was made by the tax collector of Kings county on behalf of the state to defendant A. F. Nunes, pursuant to a sale at public auction, noticed for and held on the said 26th day of July, 1907. This deed was held to be invalid for the reason that no proper notice was given of the sale as required by law, which defect rendered the said deed void. But the said defendant paid to the state all taxes and penalties necessary to entitle him to a deed. Under these circumstances, we agree with the respondent that—

"The plaintiff could not redeem from the state, after the state had been fully paid, and the money due from the plaintiff for these taxes was no longer due to the state, but to the defendant who had paid the state."

Defendants, in support of their claim that plaintiff is in no position to maintain an action to quiet title, cites the cases of Sears v. Willard, 165 Cal. 12, 130 Pac. 869; Schroder v. Aden Gold Mining Co., 144 Cal. 628, 630, 78 Pac. 20; Maginnis v. Hurlbutt, 34 Cal. App. 508, 168 Pac. 368; Klumpke v. Henley, 24 Cal. App. 35, 140 Pac. 289, 313, and Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 682, 178 Pac. 712. None of these cases support this contention. In Sears v. Willard the facts are different from the facts of the case at bar. There the plaintiff sued to quiet title to two lots of land. Defendants answered, denying plaintiff's title; setting up their own title by conveyance as well as by open and exclusive possession of the property and payment of taxes thereon, and pleading the bar of the statute of limitations. The court found that plaintiff was not the owner of nor entitled to the possession of the land in question; that for more than five years after their entry thereon under a certain tax title pursuant to certificates of sale of said premises for nonpayment of city taxes for the year 1900 defendants had held exclusive possession of, and had paid all taxes upon, said property, and that plaintiff had not repaid, nor offered to repay, any of the amounts so expended.

In the case at bar the answer alleges that the defendants are in the possession of the land, but it is found by the court that the defendants have not, nor have their predecessors in interest, for five years prior to the filing of the complaint, or at all, been in the possession of said land, or any part thereof, under any claim of right, and have not paid all the taxes levied and assessed upon said real property during said five years.

In the case of Schroder v. Aden Gold Mining Co., supra, the court simply announced the rule that a plaintiff must obtain judgment upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that of the defendants, and to the same effect are the cases of Maginnis v. Hurlbutt, 34 Cal. App. 504, 508, 168 Pac. 368, Klumpke v. Henley, 24 Cal. App. 35, 36, 140 Pac. 289, 313, and Rockey v. Vieux, 179 Cal. 681, 682, 178 Pac. 712.

"It was stipulated by the respective parties that title to the lands described in plaintiff's complaint as the northeast quarter of section 3, township 24 south, range 18 East, Mount Diablo base and meridian, were conveyed by patent from the United States to Grant Copper; and by deed conveyed by Grant Copper to Jennie V. Copper. A deed was then offered by plaintiff and admitted in evidence without objection, whereby Jennie V. Copper and John A. Copper, her husband, conveyed to plaintiff Hugh McPhail said lands, which deed was properly acknowledged and executed and recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Kings, state of California, on August 18, 1913, in Book 52 of Deeds at page 50 thereof."

This record, under the circumstances in this action, surely establishes a prima facie case of ownership in plaintiff, and, the defendants not being in possession of the property, or any part thereof, and having no title whatever in themselves, are in no position to attack this prima facie case made by the plaintiff. Williams v. City of San Pedro, 153 Cal. 44, 49, 94 Pac. 234. Mr. Justice Shaw, in his concurring opinion in Williams v. San Pedro, 153 Cal. at page 50, 94 Pac. at page 237, says:

"The rule is elementary and practically universal that no party will be permitted to interpose to defeat the prima facie title of another party to the thing, derived by him from a third person, unless such attacking party pleads, or shows in some authorized manner, that he has some right, title, or interest in the thing. A defendant who does not himself claim some right, title, interest, or possession, has no status to question the validity of a conveyance of the property by a third person to the plaintiff."

[4] It was stipulated at the trial and the court found that the defendants had paid to the tax collector of Kings county for the purchase of the lands $87.12, and that this sum was the accrued costs, including back taxes and the accrued interest at that time, and that since the time of the said purchase the defendants have paid the further sum of $91.50 for taxes.

Section 3898, subdivision 5, of the Political Code as amended by St. 1917, p. 715, provides:

"Whenever in any action at law, it has been or shall be determined by a court that the sale and conveyance provided for in this and the preceding section or in section three thousand seven hundred seventy-one of this Code heretofore or hereafter made are void for any reason, and that the purchaser from the state may not be finally awarded the property so purchased, no decree of the court shall be given declaring a forfeiture of the property until the former owner, or other party in interest, shall have repaid to the purchaser the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him, to be determined by the court, in pursuit of the state's title to the property so sold. * * *"

There is no provision in the judgment entered in this action, providing that said judgment should not take effect until payment by the plaintiff to defendants of the amount of taxes paid by said defendants upon the property. While it is true that at the trial of this action the plaintiff offered in open court to pay defendants the full amount of taxes, penalties, and costs paid out and expended by them in pursuit of the state's title to the property in question, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the time such payments were made, to the date of the trial, and that this offer was by the defendants in open court refused, nevertheless, we are of the opinion that under said section 3898, subdivision 5, of the Political Code it was incumbent upon the court, in rendering its judgment in favor of plaintiff, to provide that said judgment should not take effect until plaintiff made such payments. Said section 3898 of the Political Code provides positively that no decree shall be made until this relief is granted to the purchaser of a tax title. Smith v. Golden State Syndicate, 185 Pac. 209. The mere fact that the defendants refused to accept the said offer made by plaintiff prior to judgment to reimburse them for their expenditures did not constitute a waiver on their part of the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 3898 of the Political Code, nor deprive them of any of their rights under said section.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff, conditioned that the judgment shall not take effect until payment by the plaintiff to the defendants of the amount of taxes, penalties, and costs paid by the said defendants upon the property.

AAROE v. CROSBY et al. (Civ. 3494.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Division 2. July 6, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1920.)

1. Licenses ⟸11(1)—Plumbing work so related to public health that license may be required.

Generally speaking, plumbing work is so related to the public health that the Legislature may, under its police power, make reasonable regulations governing it, and for that reason may provide for the examination and license of those engaged in such work.

2. Monopolies ⟸4—Statute creating monopoly in plumbing trade cannot be sustained as health regulation.

An act, designed for the purpose of controlling the plumbing trade and creating a monopoly in favor of those able to pay the tax, cannot be sustained as a health regulation, and for that reason St. 1917, p. 73, providing for the examination, certification, and registration of plumbers, which by its terms relates solely to master and journeymen plumbers, and merely prohibits any journeyman or master plumber in specified localities from personally installing any plumbing unless he shall first obtain a temporary permit, and does not apply to itinerant plumbers, etc., cannot be sustained as a health regulation.

3. Licenses ⊂=11(1)—Lawful occupation may be subject to license.

A lawful and useful occupation may be subjected to regulation in the public interest, even though the regulation involves in some degree a limitation upon the exercise of the right regulated, and the test for determining the validity of such an act is whether the limitation is by way of regulation for the purpose of throwing reasonable safeguards in the public interest around the exercise of the right.

4. Constitutional law ⊂=208(6)—Statute regulating plumbers invalid as discriminatory.

St. 1917, p. 73, providing for the examination, certification, and registration of plumbers, which relates solely to master and journeymen plumbers, making it unlawful for any journeyman or master plumber, who is one having an established place of business and who works by contract, to personally install any plumbing or drainage system, is discriminatory in favor of the employing master plumber against one who has an established place of business and performs plumbing work himself, the effect of the act being that the employing master plumber can operate without any license or fee, while one who works individually under contract is required to pay an annual license, and may be deprived of his means of livelihood at the caprice of examining board.

5. Statutes ⊂=81—Act regulating plumbers invalid as class legislation.

St. 1917, p. 73, purporting to regulate plumbing in designated municipalities, which applies only to journeymen and master plumbers having an established place of business and who work by contract, requiring a license if they personally install any plumbing, is invalid as special legislation, because it allows the larger contractor to escape all restriction if he employs but one licensed plumber to supervise unlicensed helpers and apprentices, while every contractor who performs his own work must comply with the act.

6. Statutes ⊂=81—Discrimination in later act held not removed by earlier act.

The discriminatory feature of St. 1917, p. 73, purporting to regulate the business of plumbing trade, which in effect allowed master plumbers having an established place of business and working by contract to escape all regulation, is not removed, but is rather emphasized, when read in connection with Act March 3, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 72), as amended March 9, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 58), which requires every person engaged in the business or labor of master or journeyman plumber in any incorporated city to obtain a license, to be issued on examination, the license provided for being irrevocable and issued with charge.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ, for Journeyman Plumbers' & Gas Fitters' Local No. 442.

NOURSE, J. An alternative writ of mandate was issued out of this court on application of the petitioner, requiring respondents, as members of the plumbers' examining board of Alameda county, to show cause why they should not order an examination of petitioner as to his competency under the statute of April 6, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 73), entitled "An act providing for the examination, certification and registration of plumbers, prescribing powers and duties of the state board of health in reference thereto, and penalties for a violation of the provisions hereof." The answer of respondents is that the act is unconstitutional for various reasons, and that they are therefore not qualified to examine petitioner, or to issue to him the license or certificate of competency required by the act.

Petitioner contends that the statute is constitutional upon the broad ground that it is an exercise of the police power of the state designed for the protection of the public health, and that for this reason the alleged discriminatory features of the statute do not render it void.

[1, 2] Generally speaking, plumbing work is so related to the public health that the Legislature may, under its police power, make reasonable regulations governing it, and for that purpose may require the examination and licensing of those engaged in such work. Such legislation has been sustained by the great weight of authority. Commonwealth v. Beaulieu, 213 Mass. 138, 99 N. E. 955, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1080; People v. Warden, 144 N. Y. 529, 39 N. E. 686, 27 L. R. A. 718; State v. Benzenberg, 101 Wis. 172, 76 N. W. 345; Ex parte Smith, 231 Mo. 111, 132 S. W. 607. But where an act has no such relation to the public health, and is designedly for the purpose of controlling the plumbing trade, "to shut out competition, create a monopoly and force those unable to pay the tax and possessing a knowledge of the business to look to the ones in control of the monopoly for employment," it cannot be sustained as a health measure. Wilby v. State, 93 Miss. 767, 47 South. 465, 466, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 677; State v. Smith, 42 Wash.

237, 84 Pac. 851, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 674, 114 Am. St. Rep. 114, 7 Ann. Cas. 577.

The act in question does not pretend to be a health measure. It is entitled "An act providing for the examination, certification and registration of plumbers," etc. By its terms it relates solely to master and journeymen plumbers, the first being defined as one who has an established place of business and works by contract, and the latter as "one who, as an employé, personally installs plumbing work." The only prohibitory feature of the act is that "it shall be unlawful for any journeyman plumber or master plumber in any city or town maintaining a public sewer system to personally install any plumbing or drainage system or portion thereof unless he shall first obtain a temporary permit or a certificate of competency." The examining board created by the act is required to issue a temporary permit to every applicant, valid until the examination is held and the certificate of competency granted or denied. Certificates of competency are issued for one year, upon examination, subject to renewal annually upon payment of the required fee and subject to revocation for violation of the rules of the examining board or of the regulations of any municipal building, plumbing or sanitary ordinance.

[3] A mere reading of the act disposes of the contention that it is a health measure. It is plainly designed to control those engaged in the plumbing trade in certain localities. It has no application to the itinerant plumber or other artisan who has no established place of business if he works upon contract. Thus a plumber who has no established place of business or a person without any skill as a plumber might do all the acts prohibited to a master plumber having an established place of business. However, it is not necessary that the act should be a health measure to sustain its validity. As said by the Supreme Court in Riley v. Chambers, 185 Pac. 855, 856:

"It is equally true that a lawful and useful occupation may be subjected to regulation in the public interest, and that all regulation involves in some degree a limitation upon the exercise of the right regulated. The test is whether or not the limitation imposed is really by way of regulation only; is one whose purpose and effect go no further than throwing reasonable safeguards in the public interest around the exercise of the right. If the limitation is of this character, its imposition is a proper exercise of the police power resident in the Legislature, and whose exercise is one of the latter's most important functions."

[4] But the statute is attacked because it discriminates against the master plumber who has an established place of business and in favor of the one who has no established place of business, and because it discriminates in favor of the employing master plumber and against the one who from an established place of business individually performs plumbing work by contract. This is so for two reasons: (1) The prohibitory features of the act relate solely to the personal installation of plumbing work; and (2) they do not relate to a helper working under one who has a license. The effect of these provisions of the act is that the employing master plumber can operate without any license or fee and free from all penalties of the act, while the one who works individually under contract is required to obtain a license, pay the annual renewal fees, and subject himself to all penalties of the act, including that of being deprived of his means of livelihood, at the caprice of the examining board.

[5] But beyond all this the fatal defect in the act is that the large contractor escapes all restriction if he employs but one licensed plumber, who may supervise an unlimited number of unlicensed helpers and apprentices, whereas each contractor who performs his own work must comply with the act. The individual contractor must therefore choose between subjecting himself to all the restrictions of the act or letting himself out as an employé of one who has an established place of business and who works by contract. Here is therefore a discrimination between those engaged in the same trade without any reasonable basis for a classification. For this reason the act offends the constitutional inhibition against special legislation and is void. In re Raleigh, 177 Cal. 746, 751, 171 Pac. 950, and cases there cited.

[6] It is argued that this objection is removed by reading the act in connection with the act of March 3, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 72), as amended March 9, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 58), which requires a license for every person who engages in the business or labor of master or journeyman plumber in any incorporated city. But if the earlier statute was not intended to be repealed by that of 1917, it merely emphasizes the unlawful discrimination made in the later act. By the act of 1887 all persons who engaged in the business or labor of master or journeyman plumber in any incorporated city were required to procure a license from the local board of health or health officer. But the license was required to be issued upon examination before the board of health or health officer without charge, without an annual renewal fee, and without power of revocation. Having such a license, one could engage in the business or labor of master or journeyman plumber in any incorporated city, free from any restriction under the act of 1917, unless he was a master having a fixed place of business and doing his work personally under contract, or unless he was a journeyman not working as a helper under the direct personal supervision of another.

Other points raised do not require consideration. The petition is denied and the alternative writ discharged.

FRASER v. CUMMINGS, City Clerk. (Civ. 3519.)

1. Mandamus ⟸164(4)—Allegations in return conclusive when not controverted.

The petitioner for mandamus to compel certification of a recall petition having the burden of proof, the determination of the clerk that certificates were not properly verified cannot be disturbed, where the return to the writ, setting forth improper verification, was not controverted by petitioner, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1091.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸159(1)—Election in which mayor selected held last general municipal election within recall proceedings.

Where the number of signatures to a petition for recall of an official of the city of Oakland was under the charter to be determined on the basis of the total vote cast for all candidates for mayor at the last preceding general municipal election at which a mayor was elected, the estimate may be based on the last preceding primary municipal election at which the mayor was selected, under a charter provision that a candidate at a primary election, who receives the majority of votes cast, shall be deemed elected.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸159(1)—Petitioner for recall of officer need not sign entire name.

One signing a petition for recall of a municipal officer may sign his usual signature or use his initials without appending his entire name as it appears on the registration records.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸159(6)—Sufficiency of recall petition held for city clerk.

Where the charter of the city of Oakland prescribed a form for certificates to signatures to a recall petition, and provided that the clerk should examine and ascertain whether or not the petition conformed to the requirements of the charter, the question whether the certificates gave the addresses of the signers is for the clerk, and his action cannot be reviewed by the court unless there is a showing of an abuse of discretion, even though the clerk reached a decision different from that which the court might reach.

5. Mandamus ⟸76—Writ lies where city clerk refuses to determine sufficiency of recall proceedings.

Where the clerk of a municipality refuses to determine the sufficiency of the recall petition, which was his duty under the charter, the court may, by mandamus, compel him to act.

De Lancey C. Smith and Clinton G. Dodge, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., and T. Ledgwich, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. [1] This is an original proceeding in mandamus. The petition alleges that on the 19th of May, 1920, the petitioner filed with respondent, as city clerk of the city of Oakland, a petition for the recall of a commisioner of said city containing something over 10,000 individual certificates, and that respondent, within the time prescribed by the municipal charter, examined said certificates, and on the 29th of May determined that they were insufficient to constitute a recall petition. Of the certificates so filed it is alleged that the clerk found 4,364 defective solely because the signers thereof failed to name the streets between which they resided; that others were found defective because the verification deputy used his initials only in signing his name to the verification; that others were found defective on both of these grounds; and that a small number were found defective because the signers thereof did not sign their names in full as they appear on the records of registration. The truth of the foregoing facts is admitted in the return, except as to the certificates rejected because of defective verification. As to these, the return alleges that the verification deputy in each case "signed by a different name, or in a different manner, or with a different signature than that of any regularly appointed and qualified verification deputy." These allegations of the return were not controverted by proof or otherwise by petitioner as he might do. Section 1091, Code Civ. Proc. Of course, if the certificates are not verified by the true signature of a regularly appointed and qualified verification deputy, they are invalid. The certificates are not before the court, and it is impossible to determine what number were rejected for that reason. The burden being upon petitioner to show the sufficiency of the petition, the determination of the clerk that some of the certificates were invalid because of defective verification cannot be disturbed.

[2] Another issue is raised by the pleadings, which is, however, a pure question of law. That is whether the number of signatures required should be estimated on the basis of the total vote cast for all candidates for the office of mayor at the last preceding general municipal election at which a mayor was elected, as provided by section 7, subdivision 2, of the charter, or whether the vote cast at the last preceding primary municipal election at which a mayor was elected should form the basis. The controversy arises because after section 7, subdivision 2, was enacted, the charter was amended to provide that any candidate at the primary election who received a majority of all the votes cast for all candidates for any particular office should be deemed elected to that office, otherwise the election should be deemed to be a nominating election only. Acting upon the theory that votes cast at the last preceding general municipal election should form the basis of estimate, the city clerk determined that 6,475 signatures were necessary. Upon the basis of votes at the last preceding primary but 5,319 signatures would be required. It is undisputed that the last preceding municipal election at which a mayor was elected in the city of Oakland was that held in 1917, and generally designated as a primary or nominating election. The successful candidate, having received a majority of all the votes cast at said election for all candidates for the office of mayor, was declared elected. If he had not received such a majority the election would have been deemed a nominating election, and the two highest candidates would have been required to run again at a second or final election. Section 5, subd. 21, Charter. Having been elected, the clear inference is that as to him it was a final election, and hence the "last preceding general municipal election at which a mayor was elected" within the terms of section 7, subdision 2. The vote at that election should therefore form the basis for the number of signatures to the petition presented.

[3] The petitions which were rejected upon the sole ground that the signers did not sign their full names, but used one or more initials, should have been counted, if the signature used was sufficient to identify the signer and was otherwise unobjectionable. It is not necessary that an elector in signing a petition should use his full name, as it appears upon the records of registration. He may sign with his usual signature or use his initials. Opinion of Justices, 116 Me. 557, 103 Atl. 761; Conn v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 705, 713, 121 Pac. 714, 719.

[4, 5] The petition would have contained a sufficient number of signatures if those signatures which failed to indicate the streets between which the signer resided had been counted. The controversy over these certificates arises from the fact that in the form of the certificate prescribed by the charter the following appears: "I reside at No. ——— street, between ——— street and ——— street." On more than one-half of the certificates filed the signer, though filling in the blank showing his street address, failed to fill the other blanks showing between which streets he resided. The charter provides that the certificates shall substantially follow the form prescribed. The respondent ruled that these certificates did not substantially comply with the form prescribed, and rejected them for that reason. It may well be said that this provision is for the aid of the clerk only, and that, if satisfied with the genuineness of the signatures, he might have counted them, waiving the technical defect in the form. Conn v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 705, 121 Pac. 714, 719; Osborn v. Board of Supervisors, 27 Cal. App. 85, 148 Pac. 970. On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that the charter prescribes the same form for other certificates such as those for the nomination of candidates for office (section 5, subd. 3), the initiative (section 163), the referendum (section 181) as well as the recall (section 7, subd. 3). Ordinarily such a petition or certificate is required to indicate the voting precinct of the signer in addition to his home address, and a petition failing in that respect has been held insufficient. Thompson v. Vaughan, 192 Mich. 512, 159 N. W. 65, 69. See, also, In re Referendum Petitions, 78 Okl. 47, 186 Pac. 485, 487.

But in any event it is the clerk, and not the court, which must determine whether the certificates substantially comply with the requirements of the charter. By the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 7 of the charter the clerk is directed to examine the petition "to ascertain whether or not it conforms to all the requirements of this charter." This examination must be commenced immediately upon the presentation of the petition, and "within ten days after such presentation he must finally determine whether or not it so conforms and shall forthwith attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of his examination."

In a similar case our Supreme Court has said that the power conferred upon the registrar of voters by the San Francisco charter to finally determine whether the petition is signed by the requisite number of voters means that he "must complete his investigations as to the conformity of the petition to legal requirements, and as to the number of lawful signatures, and thereupon * * * finally determine both propositions, and that his decision is final. Baines v. Zemansky, 176 Cal. 369, 378, 168 Pac. 565, 569. And again in the same case (176 Cal. 379, 168 Pac. 570) the court say:

"But that the registrar's decision upon such evidence as he may take is to be final upon both propositions, that is, whether the petition conforms to all legal requirements, and whether it contains sufficient genuine signatures, is evident."

To the same effect is Watts v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. App. 692, 697, 173 Pac. 183.

In Fickert v. Zemansky, 176 Cal. 443, 446, 168 Pac. 891, the Supreme Court say:

"Unquestionably the registrar is required to examine these affidavits as well as the several sections of the petition, to ascertain whether or not they conform to the legal requirements of the charter. The time allowed is very short, and his inquiry must necessarily be of a summary character. The extent of the inquiry and the nature of the other evidence he may take in respect to these matters are not specified. The subject is left to his discretion."

Where the city clerk refuses to act as required by the charter, or where there is a showing of such an abuse of discretion as would indicate that no discretion was exercised, the courts may by mandamus compel the clerk to perform his duty under the charter. But here the showing is that the clerk did perform his duty and if, in the exercise of that duty, he reached a different conclusion from what this court might reach on the question of the necessity of showing the cross streets, this court has no jurisdiction to substitute its judgment for his. In other words, the people of the city of Oakland have in their charter conferred upon the city clerk the exclusive power to finally determine whether a recall petition conforms to all requirements of the charter, and they have thereby denied to the courts the power of reviewing such determination in a proceeding of this kind. It is the function of the courts to interpret the law as they find it, and to leave to the municipal officers the duty of executing the law as enacted. Where the people have conferred upon a ministerial officer an exclusive power to determine for them a certain fact, it is not the province of the courts to substitute their judgment for that of the officer so chosen. To do so would be to set aside the plain dictates of the law. What might be done in a case where fraud is shown need not be determined, because the petition here does not pretend to allege any fraud on the part of the clerk.

For the reasons given the petition is denied, and the alternative writ discharged.

McDOWELL et al. v. TITLE GUARANTEE & TRUST CO. (McDOWELL et al. Interveners). (Civ. 3079.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 1, 1920. On Petition for Rehearing, July 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 30, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜607(1)—Knowledge of entry of judgment starts running of time for giving notice to clerk of appeal.

Knowledge of entry of judgment, though no written notice has been served starts the running of the time for filing notice with clerk that party intends to appeal and demand for transcript, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

2. Appeal and error ⊜628(3)—Payments held not to show waiver of right to undertaking fees so as to permit late filing of transcript.

Where appellants did not serve notice on clerk and demand for transcript, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, within 10 days after they learned of entry of judgment, and it did not appear that their payments on account to the reporter were sufficient to pay the fees in full, or that they obtained a waiver of his right to be secured by an undertaking, to be filed pursuant to section 953b, the transcript of the testimony, filed some years after entry of judgment, will not be considered.

3. Appeal and error ⊜607(1)—Default in filing notice to clerk of appeal cannot be excused more than six months thereafter.

Default in filing notice to clerk that party intended to appeal and demand for transcript of testimony cannot be excused by the trial court under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, more than six months after it had occurred.

On Petition for Rehearing.

4. Limitation of actions ⊜180(6), 182(5)—Defense cannot be asserted for first time in appellate court.

The defense that the complaint did not state a cause of action, because it showed on its face it was barred is waived, where not in some manner asserted in the trial court, either by demurrer or answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by F. C. McDowell and Frank D. McDowell against the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, in which Charles O. McDowell and another, executors of the estate of Hattie N. McDowell, intervened. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Elon G. Galusha and Isador Morris, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. G. Cooke, E. W. Sargent, and John F. Keogh, all of Los Angeles, for defendant and respondent.

Jones & Weller and Walter F. Keen, all of Los Angeles, for interveners and respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this action judgment in favor of the respondents was entered on December 3, 1915. On the 24th day of January, 1916, plaintiffs filed notice of appeal from the judgment. The clerk's transcript on appeal was filed on June 27, 1919, and it appears therein that on April 11, 1919, the plaintiffs by their attorney filed with the clerk of the superior court a notice, requesting that a transcript of the testimony, etc., at the trial be made up and prepared. No bond to secure the reporter's fees for the transcript was filed, but the notice stated that the plaintiffs "have made arrangements with the court reporter to pay for the cost of the same." The reporter's transcript, containing 218 pages, was certified by the reporter, and on the 11th day of October, 1919, the truth and correctness thereof was certified by the judge who tried the case. This transcript was filed on the 23d day of October, 1919. The appellants' opening brief was filed on the 26th day of August, 1919. All of the grounds of appeal presented therein depend upon contents of the reporter's transcript. It thus appears that at the time of the filing of appellants' brief, and during the entire time allowed by the rules of court for filing of respondents' brief, the reporter's transcript referred to in that brief was not on file, and therefore there was nothing in the records of this court furnishing data upon which respondents could base any reply in their briefs. Respondents have filed no brief, and at the hearing they have objected to consideration of the matters presented in appellants' brief and to consideration of the appeal on its merits.

In the judge's certificate to the reporter's transcript statements are made showing that the reporter's transcript was filed by the reporter in the superior court on May 9, 1919, and that the judge refused to grant a certificate thereto; that thereafter, on August 15, 1919, pursuant to notice, appellants moved for an order vacating the order of May 14, 1919, whereby the court declined to certify to said transcript, which motion was opposed, and the court refused to vacate the order of May 14th, and again refused to certify to the transcript; that thereafter, on October 11, 1919, pursuant to notice, plaintiffs again moved the court to vacate said order of May 14th, which motion was granted, and the court then made the certificate as requested by plaintiffs. By recitals in the certificate it appears that the order as finally made was based upon an affidavit showing that on December 18, 1915, plaintiffs "ordered the reporter who reported the above-entitled action, at the trial thereof, to prepare his transcript to be used on appeal, and paid said reporter therefor, on said date, $5 on account of his charges for the preparation of said transcript; and that, thereafter, on December 29, 1915, said plaintiffs and appellants paid said reporter, on account of his charges in preparing said transcript, the further sum of $30. The defendants, interveners and respondents, by counsel, opposed said motion on all grounds heretofore urged, among said grounds of opposition being that the court has no jurisdiction of this case; that the court has no jurisdiction to grant the motion of plaintiffs and appellants; that plaintiffs and appellants have been guilty of unreasonable delay and inexcusable neglect."

[1-3] Section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the notice to the clerk, stating that the party demanding a transcript of the testimony desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed from the judgment, and requiring that a transcript of the testimony, etc., be made up and prepared, "must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment. * * *" In Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 Pac. 611, it was held, in accordance with previously established decision, that the filing of the notice of appeal from a judgment is conclusive evidence that the appellant knew of the judgment and its contents at the time of the filing of the notice, and that this fixed the beginning of the time to give notice to the clerk, in the absence of anything to show that he had notice thereof theretofore. "It is explicitly declared that a written notice of the entry of the judgment or order is not necessary to start running the time for filing said notice to the clerk, when the appellant has actual knowledge thereof." It was further held that by failing to give such notice within the time fixed by law the appellant loses his right to proceed with the preparation of his transcript on appeal in the manner provided by section 953a.

This record shows by the statement made by the judge indicating the evidence produced before him that the plaintiffs, according to their own showing, admitted that on the 18th day of December, 1915, they had actual knowledge of the entry of the judgment. The statements concerning payments on account made by the plaintiffs to the reporter are not sufficient to show, either that they paid the reporter's fees in full, or that they obtained credit from him or a waiver of his right to be secured by an undertaking to be filed, as required by section 953b, Code of Civil Procedure. If the appropriate notice to the clerk required by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, had been filed, it would have become the duty of the reporter to prepare the transcript and file the same with the clerk of the superior court within 10 days after the notice to prepare transcript, with the appropriate undertaking, was filed with the clerk. But, as we have seen, no such notice was filed with the clerk, nor was any further proceeding taken by the plaintiffs to obtain a transcript until more than three years after the notice of appeal was filed. According to the provisions of the Code, the time within which the plaintiffs were entitled to have the reporter's transcript prepared expired 10 days after appellants had knowledge of the entry of judgment, and, as above stated, they have admitted having such actual knowledge as early as December 18, 1915. If the order of October 11, 1919, and allowance of the transcript at that time by the judge, be regarded as an attempt to grant relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, it was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, since the period of six months after default, within which such relief might be granted, had expired more than three years before the order was made.

Upon the facts and in accordance with the law above stated, this court will not now regard said reporter's transcript as a part of the record on appeal. Since appellants do not rest their appeal upon any claim of error shown by the judgment roll, no question on the merits of the case remains to be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; JAMES, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Presenting their petition for a rehearing, appellants challenge the statement made in the opinion filed by this court that all of the grounds of appeal presented by them depend upon the contents of the reporter's transcript. They insist that there are errors on the face of the judgment roll, which are mentioned on pages 31 to 34 of their brief, which they say that we have overlooked. It is true that they were overlooked, but by a very excusable inadvertence. Under the general heading "Points of Law," the brief contains a long list of such points, most of them not accompanied by any attempt to apply them to the case at bar. The items now designated by petitioners were buried in the mass of print, like needles in a haystack.

[4] Now considering the points on their merits: Appellants claim that the complaint in intervention did not state a cause of action because it shows on its face that it is barred. This defense was not made, either by demurrer or answer. Unless such defense is in some manner asserted in the trial court, it is waived. Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 526, 51 Pac. 848. Counsel for appellants assert that such defense was made in their answer to the complaint in intervention. The clerk's transcript does not contain any answer by appellants to the complaint in intervention. It is next suggested by counsel that the answer of defendant was a sham. Inspection of the answer shows that it was made in the usual direct form, and not for want of information or belief, and it met the issues tendered. Counsel say that "the answer does not deny that defendant had a mortgage to F. C. McDowell." The answer of the defendant denied that the said note and mortgage were made in favor of F. C. McDowell, and alleged that, on the contrary, they were executed in favor of Hattie N. McDowell. The findings follow the answer in the determination of this matter. There are two or three other items directed to alleged errors shown by the judgment roll, but, as they have no greater merit than those already discussed, a further statement of them would be useless.

Concerning the matters which were discussed in the original opinion filed herein, we are satisfied with the decision as made.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

FARMERS' EXCH. NAT. BANK v. DREW.
(Civ. 3382.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 2, California. July 8, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife ⊂=267(4)—Husband has right to mortgage community property.

Under Civ. Code, § 172, a husband has the right to mortgage community property to pay community debts, as those incurred in the conduct of his business, which business is presumably conducted for the benent of the community.

2. Husband and wife ⊂=272(1)—Acquisition of former community property by husband as separate property gives divorced wife no rights.

Where the husband mortgaged community property for more than its value to obtain funds to carry on his business, the fact that the identical property, after divorce, passed to him on distribution of the assets of a corporation handling the estate of his father, will not, the husband having obtained it as his separate property, give the divorced wife any rights therein.

3. Husband and wife ⊂=263(1)—Debts community debts.

Generally speaking, obligations incurred during marriage are community debts.

4. Husband and wife ⊂=268(2)—Husband controls community.

All community property is liable for the husband's debts, and subject to his disposal.

5. Divorce ⊂=252—Community property to be distributed on divorce, is residue after payment of debts.

The community property to be distributed on dissolution of marriage by divorce is the residue which remains after the discharge of the community obligations.

6. Husband and wife ⊂=278(1)—Representation that there was no community estate held to give wife no right of action.

Where, on dissolution of marriage, the debts exceeded the value of the community property, the most valuable property being mortgaged in excess of its value, the husband's representation that there was no community estate will not give the wife any right to rescind agreement for settlement, for there was no damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Farmers' Exchange National Bank against Helen E. Drew. From a judgment for defendant, for one-half the land, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Victor T. Watkins and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from that portion of the judgment awarding to defendant a one-half interest in certain real property in Los Angeles. The action was brought for the purpose of quieting title to this property. Defendant answered, claiming an interest in the property, as community property of herself and her former husband, Arthur L. Drew.

Defendant and Arthur L. Drew were married in 1895, and in 1903 the husband purchased the property in controversy, and built a residence thereon, which was occupied by the husband and wife as their home until about the time of their divorce. It appears that before October 28, 1910, defendant and her husband had been having domestic difficulties and were contemplating divorce. On that date, an agreement was executed by the defendant, Helen E. Drew, and her husband, by which he agreed to pay to her $150 per month for the support of herself and child, and in which she agreed that she would make no demand upon him other than for this amount. On December 19, 1910, a decree of divorce was obtained by the husband in Nevada. The record in this divorce action was introduced in evidence in the present case by Helen E. Drew, the defendant, and it appears therefrom that the complaint in that action, filed by the husband, contained an allegation that there was no community property; and the answer of Helen E. Drew specifically admitted this allegation, and the court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true. It is, however, defendant's contention in the present action that she was induced to sign the agreement of October 28, 1910, above referred to, by which she was to receive $150 each month, and was induced to sign the answer in the divorce action, admitting that there was no community property, because of the false representation of her husband that there was no community property. She alleged, in the present action, and the trial court found, that she relied upon such representation, and that such representation was false. The trial court proceeded, evidently, upon the theory that there had been no division of the community property by the decree of divorce, and that the parties to the divorce action, therefore, became tenants in common of the community property; that the agreement for $150 a month for maintenance of the wife in lieu of all other property rights was obtained by fraud on the part of the husband, and so could be set aside, and defendant, Helen E. Drew, restored to her one-half interest as tenant in common in this property, which the court found was community property.

Without deciding whether or not the judgment in the divorce action foreclosed all inquiry into the question of the community property rights of the parties, and assuming, for the purpose of this decision, that the trial court was correct in its theory upon this point, let us examine the situation to see whether even under such a theory, the defendant is entitled to any interest in the property in controversy.

The trial court was not deterred in reaching its conclusion by the fact that no offer to restore the consideration paid under the maintenance agreement had been made by Helen E. Drew when she sought to rescind the said agreement because of fraud, although it appears in the record uncontradicted that Drew paid under such agreement, $5,557.82 for the support of the divorced wife, and $545.30 to her account of the maintenance of her child, and that $2,602.52 was paid by him for the upkeep of the house, which they were permitted to occupy without the payment of rent. Added to this, the testimony is that Drew gave various amounts in cash at different times, over and above the amounts set out above, of which he kept no record, and that the house which Mrs. Drew occupied, rent free, was of the rental value of $100 a month during this period of years.

The fact that the suit was not between the parties to said agreement, but was between one of the parties thereto and a subsequent purchaser of the property, which purchaser would not have been entitled to a return of such consideration to it under any circumstances, and that the person entitled to a return of the consideration upon a rescission was not a party to the action, may possibly be of weight in connection with this point so ably urged by the appellant. We need not, however, discuss this question here, nor many of the other interesting questions of law and fact presented by the record, as a discussion of all of them would extend this opinion unduly and unnecessarily. The appellant discusses in its briefs the question of the alleged misrepresentations, whether of law or fact, the question of the defendant's laches in asserting her claim, the question of the estoppel to assert the existence of community property because of the admissions in the pleadings in the divorce action, and many others. We are of the opinion, however, that it is necessary to discuss only one question of law involved. That question goes to the merits, and is the one first logically to be considered, i. e., whether or not at the time of the divorce between the defendant Helen E. Drew and her husband, there was any community property in which, under any circumstances, defendant might have claimed an interest.

To ascertain this, it will be necessary to consider in detail the uncontroverted evidence regarding the financial affairs of Arthur L. Drew at the time of the divorce. Practically all of the testimony upon this subject was given by Arthur L. Drew himself, who was not a party to this action, and who appeared on behalf of the defendant, Helen E. Drew. The property in controversy was purchased by Drew in 1903. The purchase price was $4,500, $400 of which amount was paid by a check drawn upon his personal funds. There is no dispute that to the extent of the $400 the property was community property. The remaining $4,100 of the purchase money was borrowed by Arthur L. Drew from a bank, upon the note of said Drew, indorsed by his mother. There is a contention made by appellant that this $4,100 was separate property of Arthur L. Drew, because from other evidence in the case, it appears that the bank loaned the money upon the credit of Mr. Drew's separate property which he had inherited from his father, and which property was held by the Drew Company, and included stock in the creditor bank; and that the bank also made the loan upon the credit of Drew's mother, who also owned stock in the said bank. Appellant relies upon the authority of Flournoy v. Flournoy, 86 Cal. 292, 24 Pac. 1012, 21 Am. St. Rep. 39, and Dyment v. Nelson, 166 Cal. 40, 134 Pac. 988, from which it appears that it is not necessary for separate property to be actually pledged to secure a loan in order that the loan so obtained shall become separate property; but that it is sufficient if the loan be made upon the credit of the separate property. However, whether this $4,100 be considered as community or separate property of the husband would not affect the conclusion which we have reached, and so we may consider such money for the moment as community property, and thus meet the respondent's position upon this point. After the purchase of the ground, Drew constructed a house upon the property at a cost of about $15,000. This was in 1903. The cost of construction of the house was paid by Drew out of the profits of his business, and from money borrowed from the bank. At the time of the purchase of the property, Drew was engaged in the contracting and building business, and during the year 1908, after the house had been completed, he was engaged in building a large dam in the San Bernardino Mountains. This construction work extended over several years, and caused him to become heavily involved financially. In order to carry on this work, it became necessary for him to borrow money from time to time, and on August 24, 1908, he borrowed $5,000 from the Drew Company, and executed his note therefor, securing said note by a mortgage of the property in controversy then occupied by himself and wife as their home. This mortgage was executed to secure what money he already owed to the company, and also to secure all other sums that he might thereafter borrow, not to exceed in the aggregate $20,000, exclusive of the $5,000 note set forth in the mortgage. The Drew Company—the mortgagee—was the company holding the assets of the estate of Drew's father. Drew and his brothers and mother owned all the stock in said company, which stock represented their proportionate shares of said estate. Part of the money secured by this mortgage to the Drew Company was borrowed during the year 1908, prior to making the mortgage, and the balance was borrowed subsequently, but all of it was borrowed while the defendant, Helen E. Drew, and Arthur L. Drew were living together as husband and wife. All the money so borrowed was used in the contracting business of Drew, and notes were from time to time executed by him to the Drew Company to evidence the loans secured by the mortgage. These notes were as follows: $5,000, dated August 24, 1908; $5,000, dated September 21, 1908; $10,000, dated November 28, 1908, upon which $4,500 was paid, leaving a balance of $5,500, and $3,000, dated February 15, 1909. All of these facts appear clearly from the testimony of the defendant's own witness, Arthur L. Drew, and from the testimony of the officers of the Drew Company, and are nowhere contradicted.

[1] It would appear, therefore, as asserted by the appellant, that the finding of the trial court that the mortgage was executed "for the purpose of taking said place from (Helen E. Drew), and of hindering her in the assertion of her claims thereto" (which finding follows the allegations of the answer) is unsupported in any way by any evidence, or by any possible inference from the evidence. The husband had the right to mortgage the community property, even though we concede that no part of the money used for the house was his separate property. The money secured upon the mortgage was used to pay the community debts—that is, the debts incurred by the husband in the conduct of his business, which business was, presumably, conducted for the benefit of the community. For these debts, the community property, clearly, was liable. Oregon Imp. Co. v. Sagmeister, 4 Wash. 710, 30 Pac. 1058, 19 L. R. A. 233; Ballinger on Community Property, 161, 162; Schuyler v. Broughton, 70 Cal. 282, 11 Pac. 719; Tibbetts v. Fore, 70 Cal. 242, 245, 11 Pac. 648; Adams v. Knowlton, 22 Cal. 283. The husband had the right to mortgage the property. Civ. Code, § 172; Bay City Building Ass'n v. Broad, 136 Cal. 525, 69 Pac. 225. From the evidence it appears that the property was mortgaged for nearly $23,000 and interest, amounting in all to over $25,000, at the time of the execution of the contract of October 28, 1910, between the husband and wife, and at the time of the divorce. The defendant does not contend that the property was ever worth more than $25,000 (and the court found its value to be about $20,000). So it appears that at the time of the divorce it was mortgaged to the Drew Company for more than its full value. Therefore defendant had no substantial interest left in this property as community property or otherwise. If the Drew Company had foreclosed upon the mortgage, no question could possibly have arisen regarding Mrs. Drew's rights in connection with the property. However, after the divorce in 1910, Helen E. Drew requested of her former husband that she and her child might be permitted to live in the house. He told her that she might do so, provided that she would move out when there was an opportunity to rent or sell the same. She moved into the property under this arrangement, and has occupied it continuously ever since, refusing to vacate upon the repeated demands of Arthur L. Drew, and later, of the purchaser of the same. During all of this time, Drew, or the Drew Company, paid the taxes and repairs and insurance upon the property. In 1912, Drew being unable to pay the debt secured by the mortgage, the mortgagee, instead of foreclosing the equity, accepted from Drew and his second wife a deed to the property in payment of the mortgage, and had the mortgage released of record. In 1913, the mother of Arthur Drew having died, it became desirable to distribute the assets of the Drew Company to Drew and his brothers, the only stockholders. In this distribution the stock of other corporations held by the Drew Company and the real estate held by it were transferred to the stockholders in proportion to their respective holdings in said company. Arthur L. Drew accepted the property in controversy as a part of his share, at a valuation equal to the amount it had cost the company to acquire it—something over $25,000. After the distribution was agreed upon, deeds were issued by the company to the Drew brothers, transferring the properties allotted to each, and it was agreed that the properties allotted to Arthur L. Drew, as his proportionate share should remain in the Drew Company, and all of the stock of said company should then be transferred to said Arthur L. Drew by his said brothers, except one share each to qualify them as directors. In other words, Arthur L. Drew, from the time of the distribution of the assets of the Drew Company, used that company as a convenient business arrangement for holding title to his separate property inherited from his father and mother. Under this arrangement, the title of the property in controversy remained in the Drew Company until April 12, 1915.

At that time the Savings Bank of San Bernardino desired to have other security for a note of $5,000 signed by Arthur L. Drew, which it held, and which was at that time secured by a pledge of some of Drew's stock in the Drew Company. Accordingly, the Drew Company—which was in reality Arthur L. Drew—executed a deed of trust to the property in controversy to secure a new note signed by Arthur L. Drew for $5,000, which note was given by him in payment of his old note for a like amount, and the collateral securing the former note was returned to him. This deed of trust contained a provision for future advances, and under this provision the bank later (May 7, 1915) advanced to Arthur L. Drew the further sum of $1,500.

[2] It was upon the sale under this deed of trust that the plaintiff regularly purchased the property in October, 1917, for $7,120. Unless this defendant had some interest or equity in the property at the time it was conveyed to the Drew Company in payment of its mortgage, she can under no possible theory have any interest in the property now. As we have stated, the property was mortgaged to the Drew Company for an amount greater than the highest value placed upon it by defendant's witnesses; the mortgage was given to secure community debts, contracted to carry on the business of the husband of the defendant. The fact that long after the divorce the property again came into the hands of Arthur L. Drew clear of incumbrances under the distribution of the assets of the Drew Company, representing an asset of the estate left by his father, cannot give the defendant a right to a one-half interest in it free and clear of the incumbrance it carried at the time of the divorce. The property, when received by Arthur Drew from the Drew Company as his separate property, was distinctly different from the property owned at the time of the divorce, in so far as defendant's rights in it were concerned. The accident of physical identity has nothing to do with the legal questions involved. In other words, defendant's rights in the property, if any, are measured by the value of her equity in the property as it stood at the time such rights came into existence (which would be at the time of the divorce); and it appears that at that time the property was mortgaged in excess of its value. Any award to her under any circumstances would have to be in relation to these facts, and subject to her share of the burden of this mortgage.

[3-5] Lest it be supposed that any injustice was done to Helen E. Drew in any way by a failure to award to her any community property in the divorce action, and that the judgment of the trial court in the present action in a broad way corrects this injustice, we shall refer to the evidence further in order to demonstrate that the record shows that after subtracting the community debts from the community assets there was no community property left at the time of the divorce in which she could have been given an interest, and that her husband's representations to her that there was no community property were substantially true. The only property which could possibly have been considered to be community property under any of the testimony in the record was the following: The property in controversy, highest valuation, $25,125; 100 shares Nuevo Land Company stock, market value, $10,000; Phillips Contracting Company stock, worthless; contracting outfit, highest valuation, $3,000; an automobile and minor miscellaneous articles, value $500—making a total of $38,625.

On the other hand, Mr. Drew had borrowed $19,000 from the Drew Company; $8,500 interest was due upon this amount at the time of the divorce; he owed $5,000 to the bank, and $17,000, plus interest, to his mother's estate—making a total of nearly $50,000 in obligations. Generally speaking, all obligations contracted during marriage are community debts. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 339; 21 Cyc. 1676, 1681; Oregon Imp. Co. v. Sagmeister, 4 Wash. 710, 30 Pac. 1058, 19 L. R. A. 233; Calhoun v. Leary, 6 Wash. 17, 32 Pac. 1070. It is also well settled that all community property is liable for the husband's debts, and subject to his control and disposition. McDonald v. Badger, 23 Cal. 394, 399, 83 Am. Dec. 123; 21 Cyc. 1676; Schuyler v. Broughton, 70 Cal. 282, 11 Pac. 719. It is obvious, therefore, that all of this community property of the Drews was liable for the debts of the husband, and that not only did the mortgage indebtedness on the property in controversy then exceed its value, but the aggregate value of all of the community property did not equal the total indebtedness of the husband. Therefore, as a matter of practical mathematics, there was no community property, and Drew's representations to his wife were substantially correct. The community property to be distributed upon a dissolution of the community by divorce is the residue which remains after the discharge of the community obligations. Frankel v. Boyd, 106 Cal. 608, 614, 39 Pac. 939.

[6] Furthermore, although it be conceded that under a strict technical construction, the representation was false, because, accurately speaking, there was in existence some community property, albeit the same was of a value considerably less than the amount of the debts for which it was liable, nevertheless the defendant has not suffered any damage by reason of the contract induced by said technically false representations. And this is because, as stated in Frankel v. Boyd, supra, the community property to be distributed upon the dissolution of a marriage by divorce is the residue of such property after payment of the community debts. Under this rule the defendant could have been awarded nothing even though the contract had not been executed. Unless damage can be shown by reason of the alleged false representations, there is no right of rescission. Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 398, 20 Pac. 868; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386; Morrison v. Lods, 39 Cal. 381.

We do not consider it necessary, as stated before, to discuss at length the question of whether or not, even had there been a loss suffered by the defendant by reason of the false representation as to the existence of community property, this representation would have been such an one as to avoid the contract entered into between them, because we are of the opinion that under all the facts the representation was, in effect, true. However, in passing, we call attention to the case of Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 21 Pac. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126, where it was decided that such representations are generally representations of law, and a wife contemplating divorce has no right to rely thereon. However, as stated, we need not decide whether under the facts of this particular case such representation, if false, would have furnished ground for relief, for, we think, the evidence shows the representation to have been substantially true at the time. Mr. Drew testified that his representation was made in good faith, and that as the community debts exceeded the community assets, he believed he was stating the truth in telling his wife that there was no community property. There is nothing in the record to contradict this. On the contrary, we believe that the record clearly shows that the only property which the husband had at the time of the divorce, over and above the community debts, was his stock in the Drew Company, which, it is undisputed, came to him as an inheritance from his father and mother. This being true, the defendant Helen E. Drew had no right at the time of the divorce, under any circumstances, to any community property, and therefore has no interest now in the property in controversy.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

A petition for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act will be denied, where the petitioner neglects the privilege, under Supreme Court rule 26, subd. 4 (183 Pac. viii), of filing a reply to the commission's answer showing that the findings complained of are sufficiently supported by evidence.

Application by the Western Indemnity Company to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission of California, in which Will J. French, A. J. Pillsbury, and A. H. Naftzger were named as respondents. Application denied.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The Industrial Accident Commission has served and filed an answer, from which it appears that the findings of which petitioner complains are sufficiently supported by the evidence. MADISON v. WEYL-ZUCKERMAN & CO.

(Civ. 2801; Sac. 3130.)

1. Sales ⟸61—Transaction a sale and not agreement to sell.

A contract relating to a sale of potatoes, providing that the buyer might at its option restore title to seller and return part held a sale, and not an agreement to sell.

2. Sales ⟸175—Seller excused from delivery on refusal of buyer to accept.

Where a certain number of sacks of potatoes in the ground were sold and title passed, seller being made agent for the delivery of the same, buyer having option to return any not of the specified quality and restore title of such part to seller, and seller offered potatoes that were not of the specified quality, and on complaint of buyer offered to re-sort and deliver them within the time specified, and the buyer stated that, "If there was any bad potatoes, not to take any," there was a refusal of buyer to accept the performance tendered, and, under Civ. Code, §§ 1440, 1515, and since upon such notice of repudiation and refusal to accept performance the actual delivery thereof would have been futile, seller was excused from such performance.

3. Sales ⟸92—Seller by selling goods at private sale to third person thereby assented to rescission.

Where potatoes were sold and title passed to buyer, seller being made agent for delivery, sorting, etc., and buyer refused to accept delivery, the seller, by selling the property at private sale without notice to the buyer, thereby assented to a rescission of the contract, under Civ. Code, § 3310.

On Hearing in the Supreme Court.

4. Sales ⟸332—Vendor, after passage of title on refusal of buyer to accept, can sell property only in manner prescribed by statute.

The vendor of personal property to which title has passed, and which the vendee has wrongfully refused to accept and pay for, may, under Civ. Code, § 3049, sell the property and bind the vendee by the result of the sale only where the sale is made in the manner prescribed by section 3005 for the sale of property by a pledgee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Charles Madison against Weyl-Zuckerman & Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in the Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

Shelton & Levy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Murry & Knupp, of Porterville, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action, as shown by the complaint, was to recover damages for the defendant's alleged breach of a contract. In accordance with the verdict of the jury which tried the case, judgment was entered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

On June 19, 1917, at which time plaintiff had in the ground a crop of potatoes then ready for harvesting, he and defendant entered into a written contract as follows:

"Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., a corporation, purchases and Chas. Madison sells the following product, to be sound, merchantable, of quality as follows on arrival at Porterville, to wit: 600 sks. Early Rose Potatoes—free from scab and fork holes.

"If any thereof is not of specified quality, buyer may, at its option, restore title of such part to seller and return same, expense of sorting and returning to be borne by seller. Said product is located as follows: 4½ West of Porterville, owner and grower—Chas. Madison and is hereby identified as the subject-matter of this sale, and the title thereto is hereby transferred and delivery thereof is hereby made by seller to buyer. Said product shall henceforth be deemed, in the possession of buyer, and seller shall, at his expense, and as agent of buyer, transport and load it in cars at Porterville as follows: To be delivered on or before June 30, 1917."

[1] Analyzing this contract, it appears therefrom that plaintiff sold the potatoes so grown to defendant, and by express terms of the contract it was vested with complete title thereto, which plaintiff, as agent of such owner, was to haul and load upon cars at Porterville, at which time the balance of the purchase price was to be paid. In making the sale plaintiff warranted that the potatoes sold, consisting of 600 sacks and weighing approximately 65,000 pounds, should, upon delivery, be sound and merchantable, free from scab and fork holes; and, in addition to any rights accruing to defendant to recover damages for breach of the warranty, defendant in lieu thereof, at its option, was given the right, at plaintiff's expense for resorting and shipping, to transfer back to him the title to such part thereof as did not measure up to the warranty. In other words, the transaction was a sale, not an agreement to sell. Defendant was the owner of the potatoes purchased upon a warranty as to quality, and plaintiff had assumed the duty, as defendant's agent, to harvest and load them upon the cars at Porterville on or before June 30th. Until such delivery, and in the absence of a revesting of the title, plaintiff held the property in his possession as agent of defendant. Thus construing the contract, it was plaintiff's duty to deliver the potatoes as provided therein, unless prevented from so doing by some act of defendant.

[2] The potatoes were not delivered, the reason therefor being that, on June 28, 1917, after they were taken from the ground and assembled in sacks, defendant sent its inspector to examine them, who, after such examination, pronounced them unmerchantable, claiming that they had not been properly sorted and some of the sacks contained potatoes that were "sticky." Notwithstanding the fact that some of the sacks contained small potatoes, rendering them unmerchantable, the quantity thereof was sufficient from which to obtain the number of sacks purchased by defendant, and plaintiff then offered to re-sort and deliver them within the time specified in the contract. The inspector left plaintiff, saying that he would have to phone defendant, and later in the day said to him that defendant had instructed that, "if there was any bad potatoes, not to take any." Clearly this was a refusal of defendant to accept the performance tendered by plaintiff, and under sections 1440 and 1515, Civil Code, and since upon such notice of repudiation and refusal to accept performance the actual delivery thereof would have been futile, he was excused from such performance. Remy v. Olds, 88 Cal. 537, 26 Pac. 355.

[3] No further communication was had between the parties until July 2d, when plaintiff, recognizing that by the terms of the contract title to the potatoes had vested in defendant, wired it as follows:

"Under contract dated June 19th I now have in my possession sixty-five thousand pounds of potatoes belonging to you wire instructions as to delivery immediately or I will sell the potatoes for your account in order to prevent loss"

—to which defendant replied:

"You are not holding any potatoes for this company as potatoes purchased were rejected by Engelhardt account not up contract grade they contained small cut sunburned and unmerchantable stock therefore we rejected."

On July 5th plaintiff, by his attorney, wired defendant as follows:

"I am still holding your potatoes you did not reject potatoes on account of scab or fork holes demand balance of purchase price. Potatoes are all good merchantable potatoes and not sunburnt your only reason for rejecting is fall of purchase price will sell potatoes and hold you for all damages unless you want to come through."

Thereafter plaintiff, at private sale and without further notice to defendant sold the potatoes to other parties at a price much less than the balance of the purchase price which defendant had obligated itself to pay. The evidence received on the part of plaintiff and as found by the jury, showed that in quality the potatoes complied with his warranty, and, since by reason of defendant's notice that it would not accept them he was excused from making delivery thereof, the contract imposed upon defendant the obligation to pay the price in consideration of which title was vested in it. Plaintiff, however, did not stand upon the terms of the contract and insist upon payment of the balance of the purchase price of the goods, which was the detriment caused by defendant's breach of the agreement. Section 3310, Civ. Code. On the contrary, when defendant by its act in the nature of a rescission refused to accept performance of the contract on plaintiff's part, he by his act in exercising the rights of owner and selling the property, title to which admittedly was vested in defendant, at private sale and without notice to defendant, thereby assented to the rescission.

Assuming, however, there was no rescission, in which event title remained vested in defendant, then, since as vendor plaintiff had possession of the property when the price became due, his only interest therein, as provided in section 3049, Civil Code, was a special lien thereon for the amount due from defendant, and his right to enforce the same was like that of a pledgee of personal property as prescribed in section 3005, Civil Code, by a sale at public auction in the manner and upon notice given as in sales of such property upon execution, in which event, if the proceeds were insufficient to pay the debt, an action would lie to recover the deficiency. Plaintiff had no right to enforce his lien by selling the defendant's property at private sale without notice, and, as said by this court in Bennett v. Potter, 16 Cal. App. 183, 116 Pac. 681, wherein the facts were similar to those here involved:

"If the automobile belonged to defendant and title thereto had passed, as alleged by plaintiff and found by the court, then the act of the plaintiff in selling it amounted to a conversion of defendant's property, damages for which might be recovered."

Respondent cites a line of cases among which are Cuthill v. Peabody, 19 Cal. App. 304, 125 Pac. 926, Gay v. Dare, 103 Cal. 454, 37 Pac. 466, and Lillie v. Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., 188 Pac. 619, to the effect that in executory contracts for the purchase of personal property the vendor, where the purchaser refuses to take and pay for the property, may resort to one of three courses, namely: (1) He may store or retain the property for the vendee and sue him for the entire purchase price; (2) or keep the property as his own and recover the difference between the market price at the time and place of delivery and the contract price; (3) or sell the property, acting as the agent of the vendee for that purpose, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price obtainable on such sale. These cases, however, involved executory contracts in which the title to the property remained vested in the vendor, and the right last mentioned, which appears to have been that adopted by the plaintiff in this case, cannot be invoked in cases where the purchase is complete and the title to the property sold vested in the defendant. Hence the trial court erred in instructing the jury to the effect that it was optional with plaintiff as to the manner in which he sold the property, provided only that the sale was made in good faith and in a mode calculated to produce the best price obtainable therefor and within such time as would suffice with reasonable diligence to effect such sale, and that it was not necessary that the same should be made at public auction or any notice given of the time and place of the sale.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] In denying the petition of the respondent for a hearing before this court we did so upon the ground stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that the vendor of personal property which the vendee has wrongfully refused to accept and pay for may, under section 3049, Civil Code, sell the property and bind the vendee by the result of the sale only where the sale is made in the manner prescribed by section 3005, Civil Code, for the sale of property by a pledgee. We withhold, however, our approval of the portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal which states in effect that a sale in any other manner by a vendor under the circumstances stated works a rescission, meaning thereby apparently a rescission of the contract of sale itself. A decision of the question so presented is not necessary, and we express no opinion upon the point.

H. CRUMMEY, Inc., v. HOWE. (Civ. 3343.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District Division 1, California. July 15, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸289(2) — More than one work may be included in resolution of intention.

The fact that more than one work was included in a resolution of intention to improve streets under San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1913, and that a crossing work at the intersection of streets was not separated from work on one of the streets, did not make the proceedings void, nor deprive the landowner of the right or power to protest the work.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸321(3) — Landowner may appeal where resolution of intention, containing several works, increased cost.

Where a resolution of intention to improve streets included more than one work, and thus resulted in increased costs, the remedy of a landowner was by appeal to the supervisors, under San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1913.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸475—Assessment for street improvements could be divided into six installments.

San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1913 did not require that work be paid for in 10 installments, and there was no error in dividing an assessment into 6 installments.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸46 — Charter amendment did not affect street improvement proceedings commenced.

San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, as amended, prohibiting installments in excess of 25 per cent. of assessed value of property, was not applicable to an assessment for street improvements, where the street proceedings had not only commenced, but had continued up to the letting of the contract, before the amended section went into effect by approval by the Legislature and being filed with the secretary of state.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸571—Matter not in record not considered.

On appeal from a judgment foreclosing a lien on property for street work, a complaint against provisions of the ordinance, requiring property owners to sign a bond for installments, cannot be considered, where the provisions of the ordinance complained of are not in the record, and appellant cites no authority or reason against such provisions.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by H. Crummey, Incorporated, against W. S. Howe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Galvin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing the lien of plaintiff on defendant's property, for street work done under the provisions of the San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1913.

The appellant advances a great many points in support of his appeal. Many are without merit, and many have been previously passed upon. The points are poorly presented by E. M. Galvin, who styles himself as trustee, but we will pass upon such as we think may deserve mention, ignoring those which are unintelligible and without any merit whatever.

[1] The resolution of intention seems to be in the customary form. It covered work on Farallones street, between Capitol and Plymouth avenues, and on Newcomb avenue, between Keith and Lane streets, including the crossing of Newcomb avenue and Lane street. The fact that more than one work was included in the resolution of intention, and that the crossing work at Lane street and Newcomb avenue was not separated from the work on Newcomb avenue, does not make the proceedings void, nor deprive appellant of the right or power to protest the work. Los Angeles L. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 157, 162, 39 Pac. 535; Bates v. Twist, 138 Cal. 52, 53, 70 Pac. 1023.

[2] This method would be more likely to decrease than increase incidental costs, but if it resulted in increased costs the remedy of appellant was by appeal to the supervisors. Ahlman v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 181 Pac. 238; Hutchinson v. Coughlin, 184 Pac. 435.

[3, 4] The assessment was divided into six installments. Neither the charter nor the improvement ordinance requires 10 installments, but annual installments not exceeding 10 years. The amended section 33, chapter 2, article 6, of the city charter, prohibiting installments in excess of 25 per cent. of assessed value of the property, is not applicable to this assessment. The record shows that the street proceedings had not only commenced, but had continued up to the letting of the contract, before the amended section went into effect by approval by the Legislature and being filed with the secretary of state.

[5] Appellant complains against the provisions of the ordinance requiring the property owner to sign a bond for the installments. The provisions of the ordinance complained of are not in the record, and appellant cites no authority or reason against this alleged provision. We cannot, therefore, consider it.

The record does not show any defect in the proceedings with respect to the posting or publishing of the resolution of intention. The resolution of intention seems from the record to have been regularly passed, posted, and published, and we see nothing in the remaining points mentioned by appellant meriting comment.

No legal reason has been advanced for a reversal of the judgment, and the judgment is therefore affirmed, respondent to recover costs.

(Civ. 3380.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Sales ⊂=156—Seller must notify buyer under which of several contracts he is making delivery.

Seller, who had agreed to deliver beans grown on one tract of land at a certain price, and by other contracts had agreed to deliver beans grown on other tracts at a different price, if entitled to payment for each delivery of beans, was required to specify contract under which deliveries were made, and on refusal or inability to so do was not entitled to payment.

2. Sales ⊂=156—Contract to deliver beans grown on specified land not performed by delivering beans from other tracts.

Seller, who had contracted to deliver beans grown on one tract at specified price and by other contracts had agreed to deliver beans grown on other tracts at different price, could not deliver beans grown on one tract in performance of contract relating to other tract, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1479.

3. Sales ⊂=156—One selling crops grown on certain land cannot substitute other crops.

One who contracts to deliver entire crop grown at a specific place cannot substitute beans grown in other place, and recover under the contract, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1479.

4. Sales ⊂=150(1)—Seller must show performance or tender thereof.

Under Civ. Code, § 1439, seller could not recover for goods delivered under contracts without showing a performance or readiness to perform any of the contracts on his part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Hogue-Kellogg Company against W. J. Petit in which defendant interposed a counterclaim. Judgment for defendant on counterclaim and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Robert M. Clarke and Fred N. Arnoldy, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel Poorman, Jr., Hunsaker & Britt, and Leroy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff corporation appeals from a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury for $3,984.32, upon a counterclaim set up by the defendant in a suit for the breach of certain contracts, the counterclaim being for the reasonable value of certain beans delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff under the contracts upon which the suit was brought.

On October 23, 1916, the parties entered into a written contract under which the defendant agreed to grow 50 acres of Henderson bush beans, during the farming season of 1917, on land near Encino in this state, known as the Petit ranch, and "to deliver the entire crop product thereof." Broadly speaking the contract was in the ordinary form usually adopted in such cases. The price at which the beans were to be delivered as soon as possible after threshing properly recleaned and sacked, f. o. b. cars at Owensmouth, Cal., was $4.50 per hundred pounds. On February 23, 1917, the parties entered into two similar contracts for beans to be grown and delivered in that year, one being for the entire crop to be grown on 80 acres of land situated near Van Nuys, Cal., known as Encino ranch, and the other for the entire crop to be grown on 235 acres of land near Van Nuys, known as the Encino ranch, except seed and one-third rental. The price of the beans under the last two contracts was $7 per hundred pounds.

In its complaint the plaintiff set out three separate causes of action for breach of the contracts respectively, claiming as damages the difference between the contract prices and the market price at the time of the breach, alleging on information and belief the total quantity of beans grown and cleaned in each of the three crops. The defendant denied the breach of any of the contracts, alleged that all three had been broken by the plaintiff, and by counterclaim demanded judgment against the plaintiff for the reasonable value of some 84,000 pounds of beans delivered to the plaintiff. The reasonable value was fixed by the defendant's demand at a rate of something over 12½ cents a pound.

While the evidence was marked by sharp conflict in regard to some matters, there was no evidence in conflict with that given by the defendant himself upon certain controlling phases of the case. With much evasion on his part he was brought finally to testify that at the three places indicated he had or controlled land which was planted in beans of the type required by the contracts, and that at the three places respectively he had in such beans more than 50, 80, and 235 acres. The crops were weighed and cleaned on each of the three tracts, but the yield per acre was not the same on the three parcels of land. In other words, the entire crop under each contract could not be determined by any computation based on the total quantity of beans raised on the defendant's three tracts of land. So far as the evidence shows the entire crop on the 50 acres of land for which the plaintiff had contracted at 4½ cents per pound might have been in excess of the entire crop raised on the 235 acres for which the plaintiff had contracted to pay 7 cents a pound.

The defendant testified positively that he did not know and had never kept any account of the quantity of beans grown or cleaned upon any one of the tracts. This evidence was strengthened by that of the man in charge of the threshing machine. He stated that the defendant on the completion of the threshing gave him orders not to tell any one the amount of beans he had threshed. From uncontroverted evidence it appears that the defendant produced on the three tracts in all some 4,000 sacks of beans, and from the defendant's evidence that on the 50 acres he produced at least 300 sacks.

[1] The defendant made three deliveries of beans at the Owensmouth warehouse, respectively, on September 22, October 15, and October 16, 1917. Each of the contracts required that the beans be delivered as soon as threshed and cleaned. The defendant did not so deliver the beans but held a quantity back from delivery. The three deliveries aggregated 84,400 pounds, contained in 1,183 sacks. In reliance on the contracts the plaintiff sold beans and in fulfillment of its selling contracts accepted, and on October 18, 1917, shipped, the beans theretofore delivered by the defendant. About October 26th the defendant requested or demanded payment of $3,000. There is some conflict in regard to the exact language in which this demand or request was couched as there is in regard to the exact language used by the agents of the plaintiff in then refusing to make the payment. It is the theory of the defendant and respondent that the demand or request for $3,000 was simply a demand for payment for the beans already delivered, and it is the theory of the appellant that the request was for a payment on account of an amount to which the defendant would become entitled upon completion of the contracts respectively. The respondent claims that the refusal to make payment upon this demand was upon the sole ground that the contracts were entire and not severable, and that the appellant's agent in stating that payment would not be made until delivery was completed broke each of the three contracts. It is claimed by the appellant that the refusal to pay at that time was because the respondent refused then to give any information in regard to the probable quantities of beans which would be delivered under the three contracts, or to tell under which of them the 1,183 sacks of beans had been delivered. Lengthy argument is addressed to the court upon the question of whether each of the contracts was entire or severable. If the respondent's contention upon this matter be conceded for the purpose of the present case, and it be assumed he was entitled to payment for each delivery of beans at the contract price, before he was entitled to payment for any beans, it was incumbent upon him to specify under which contract deliveries had been made and under which contract he claimed payment. Upon his refusal or inability so to specify, he was not entitled to payment under any of the contracts, nor could he, while refusing to specify under which contract he demanded payment, lay the foundation for an anticipatory breach of all the contracts by a statement concerning the reason why he was not then paid what he was not then entitled to have.

The appellant's first specification of error is based upon an instruction given to the jury which reads as follows:

"If the plaintiff, Hogue-Kellogg Company, without excuse, refused to pay the defendant in whole or in part of the beans delivered to the plaintiff, amounting to 84,400 pounds, after request for such payment by the defendant, the plaintiff by such conduct first breached the contracts with the defendant, and was not thereafter entitled to claim the further delivery of beans from the defendant, and would not be entitled to recover damages for the failure of defendant, if he did fail, to make further deliveries. It is for you to determine under the evidence that you have heard whether there was any excuse for failing to pay for the beans that had actually been delivered."

This instruction was clearly erroneous. In the first place it is incumbent for one who seeks payment under any contract to show that he has performed that contract. There is no evidence in the record to show under which of the three contracts the three deliveries were made. Accepting the respondent's theory of the severability of each of the contracts, on the evidence before the court, it followed as a matter of law that the defendant had not proved the partial performance of any one of the three contracts which would have entitled him to payment. It was error to submit to the jury the question of whether the plaintiff was excused from payment, and it was error to instruct the jury that if they believed the plaintiff had refused to pay without an excuse that plaintiff "by such conduct first breached the contract." Argument based on the proposition that the respondent was entitled to $3,000 regardless of which of the contracts on which the claim was based is extremely specious. None of the contracts provided for advances or partial payments. When the refusal to pay was made, the appellant would have been unsafe in making the payment because if it had paid for the beans delivered at 4½ cents per pound, the respondent might thereafter have claimed that the appellant had broken the contract upon a showing that the beans delivered were grown as a part of the crop covered by one of the two 7-cent contracts. If, on the other hand, the appellant had paid at the rate of 7 cents per pound, the respondent might thereafter have shown that the beans were really 4½ cent beans.

[2, 3] The respondent contends that when he refused to specify under which contract his deliveries were being made, it was the right of the appellant to apply the beans delivered to the satisfaction of any of the contracts, and upon the failure of the latter to do so, deliveries would be considered as having been made under the 7-cent contracts, which required the earliest deliveries. The statement of this contention under the facts of this case show its fallacy, because the appellant did not contract to pay for beans generally, but it did undertake to pay for the specifically defined entire crop of beans raised respectively on each of the three tracts. Delivery of beans grown on the 235 acres did not fulfill any of the conditions binding upon the respondent under the contract relating to the 50 acres, neither did the delivery of beans grown on the 50 acres in any way satisfy his obligations to deliver the entire crop of beans grown on the 80-acre or the 235-acre tracts. The trial court apparently accepted the theory of the defendant in regard to the application of section 1479 of the Civil Code to the facts of this case. It provides, in substance, that where a debtor is bound by several obligations to make payment, and at the time of payment fails to designate upon which of the obligations it is to be applied, the creditor may elect, and if he does not do so that the law will apply the payment to the obligation first to be performed. This section in every case called to the attention of the court has been applied to payments of money generally. It certainly has no application to a case where a party to a contract is obligated to deliver merchandise under entirely distinct contracts, fixing a different price to be paid for the merchandise, and definitely requiring that the merchandise delivered under each contract should be the entire output of a particular producing unit. Upon this branch of the case the appellant specifies as error the giving of an instruction reading as follows:

"The defendant was under no obligation to specify which of the three contracts mentioned in the plaintiff's second complaint, whether one or more of them, was the agreement upon which the delivery of the 84,400 pounds of recleaned beans was made. If the defendant did not direct the application of the delivery made by him upon any one or more of said three contracts, then the plaintiff had the right to make such application within a reasonable time as it saw fit; and, if the plaintiff made no such application, then the law applied such delivery ratably to the extinction of the obligations to deliver beans under the two contracts of February 23, 1917, under both of which the price to be paid for beans was $7 per hundredweight, so that if the defendant gave no direction for the application of the delivery of beans made by him under any of the three contracts, and plaintiff made no such application within a reasonable time, then it is deemed by the law that the delivery of 84,400 pounds was to be paid for by the plaintiff at the rate of $7 per hundredweight, and the amount which became payable for such delivery was $5,908, less deductions for bags, seed, and interest."

The error of this instruction is so clear and so prejudicial that the judgment would have to be reversed upon it alone. It is not the law that where one contracts to deliver the entire crop of beans grown at a specific place, he may substitute beans grown in some other place and recover under the contract. In dealing with money generally under section 1479 of the Civil Code, the law can apply money which has no earmarks to the extinction of one or another obligation, but the law cannot apply to the performance of a contract to deliver specific merchandise any other merchandise.

[4] Upon the erroneous assumption of the trial court that, where no performance of any contract was shown by the defendant, the question of whether there was excuse for the plaintiff in refusing payment was one of fact and not of law, and the further assumption on the part of the trial court that section 1479 of the Civil Code was applicable to the facts of this case, the jury were instructed that if they should find for the plaintiff, the amount of its recovery would be $6,925.49, and in case the finding should be for the defendant the amount of the recovery would be $3,984.32. To reach these figures, the court not only assumed as a matter of law that deliveries of beans which may have been grown under the contract providing for a payment of 4½ cents a pound were applicable to one or both of the contracts for entirely different beans to be paid at the rate of 7 cents a pound, but entirely ignored plaintiff's cause of action based on the contract for delivery of the 4½-cent beans. If the entire delivery, as a matter of fact and not as a matter of law, was of 7-cent beans, and there is no evidence that such was the fact, it follows that there was no delivery under the 4½-cent contract. It has already been shown that the statements, made at the time the respondent was rightly called upon to designate under which of the contracts he was making deliveries, were not sufficient to constitute as a matter of law an anticipatory breach of any of the contracts. The respondent could not recover for beans delivered without showing a performance or readiness to perform any of the contracts on his part. Civ. Code, § 1439; Barron v. Frink, 30 Cal. 486; Karales v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 36 Cal. App. 171, 171 Pac. 821, and cases cited therein.

It is further contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify the implied finding that the plaintiff refused to pay for beans delivered, and that it was insufficient to sustain the implied finding that there is due and unpaid from the plaintiff to the defendant the sum of $3,984.32. In view of what has been said it is not necessary to make any further analysis of the evidence, but it is the opinion of this court that each of these specifications is well founded. Neither is it necessary to discuss other matters of law presented by the briefs. An examination of the entire record shows that the defendant contracted to sell beans in November, 1916, at 4½ cents. In February, 1917, the market price had increased to 7 cents a pound. In his counterclaim the defendant demanded payment for the beans delivered at what he asserted was their reasonable value at the time deliveries were due under these contracts, at a rate of a little over 12 cents a pound. A portion of the beans which he admitted grew on the three tracts of land were held back from delivery and were burned. He settled with the insurance company for the burned beans at the rate of 12½ cents per pound and after his refusal to make deliveries he sold his crop at 13 cents a pound or over. A statement made in the case of Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99, 51 Pac. 27, might well have been made in anticipation of this appeal. It was there said:

"The whole case tends to show that defendant was ready and willing, prompt and eager, not to perform the contract on his own part, but to take advantage of a slip of the plaintiff and avoid performance."

The judgment is reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO-OAKLAND TERMINAL RYS. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3492.)

1. Justices of the peace ⟸159(6)—Qualification of surety provable by any evidence, regardless of statute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1057a, enumerating what may be accepted by the court as conclusive evidence of the sufficiency of a surety on appeal from justice court, does not attempt to change the ordinary rules of evidence, and accordingly, if a surety does not elect to make proof of its sufficiency in the manner therein permitted, it may justify by any competent evidence proving that fact, the same as other sureties may do.

2. Justices of the peace ⟸159(6)—Superior court may not dismiss appeal for insufficiency of evidence of qualification of surety.

The superior court may dismiss an appeal from justice court, if the sureties do not justify before the justice or judge before the time prescribed, on notice to the adverse party, under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a; but where, after due notice and hearing within the time prescribed, the justice finds as a matter of fact that the sureties are sufficient, and accordingly approves the bond, the superior court is without power to dismiss the appeal on motion, based solely on the ground that the evidence heard by the justice was insufficient.

3. Mandamus ⟹31—Will issue to compel court to try case.

Where superior court dismisses an appeal from justice court without jurisdiction to do so, it may be compelled to do so by mandamus issued out of the District Court of Appeal.

Application by the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways and the Maryland Casualty Company for mandamus prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda, and Hon. Dudley Kinsell, Judge thereof. Writ granted.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Gilbert L. Jones and Nusbaumer & Bingaman, all of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandate to require the superior court to set aside its order dismissing petitioner's appeal from a judgment adverse to it rendered in the justice's court in an action entitled Rinke v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, etc., and to direct the lower court to proceed with the trial of the action. The petition as first filed was designated as one in certiorari. A demurrer was interposed, upon the ground that mandamus, and not certiorari, was the proper remedy. This demurrer was sustained, on the authority of Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 114 Pac. 978, and Widrin v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 93, 118 Pac. 550. An alternative writ of mandate was ordered issued, on the authority of the case first cited, and upon the return day respondent rested upon its general demurrer, which put in issue the question whether the superior court had properly dismissed the appeal, because the surety had not justified in the manner prescribed by law. The argument of respondent is that the provisions of section 1057a, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the justification of corporate surety upon a bond on appeal from a judgment rendered in a justice's court are mandatory and exclusive.

The admitted facts alleged in the petition are: When the appeal was taken from the judgment rendered in the justice's court, appellant within due time filed a cost and stay bond, giving a foreign surety company as surety thereon. Exception was taken to the sufficiency of the surety, and in due time and after proper notice a hearing was had thereon before the justice of the peace. At the hearing the agent and attorney in fact of the surety company appeared personally before the justice of the peace and gave such testimony as to the financial standing of the company as to satisfy the justice that it was sufficient. He accordingly indorsed his approval of the bond as given. It does not appear that the competency of the agent to so justify was ever questioned, and no objection was or is now made to the sufficiency of the surety; but the sole ground upon which the superior court granted the motion to dismiss the appeal was that the provisions of section 1057a, Code of Civil Procedure, were not strictly complied with.

[1] Briefly, this section enumerates what may be accepted by the court as conclusive evidence of the sufficiency of the surety. One of the matters mentioned in the section as evidence to prove that fact is a financial statement of the assets and liabilities of the corporation sworn to by the president and attested by the secretary. It is admitted that such a statement was not presented to the justice in this case, but in lieu thereof a financial statement was offered, sworn to by the attorney in fact of the corporation, who testified that he was thoroughly familiar with the facts contained therein. The section of the Code expressly provides that, when its provisions are complied with, the court must accept the surety as sufficient. Its effect, therefore, is merely to make certain evidence conclusive upon the court for that purpose. It does not attempt to change the ordinary rules of evidence, and accordingly, if the surety does not elect to make proof of its sufficiency in the manner therein permitted, it may justify by any competent evidence proving that fact the same as other sureties may do.

[2] Furthermore, the justice of the peace having, in the exercise of his jurisdiction, approved the sufficiency of the sureties, the objection that he did so upon improper or insufficient evidence raises a question of error, and not of jurisdiction. The order approving the bond was final until set aside by some appropriate procedure. The superior court may dismiss an appeal, if the sureties do not justify before the justice or judge within the time prescribed, upon notice to the adverse party. Section 978a, Code Civ. Proc. But where, after due notice and hearing within the time prescribed, the justice finds as a matter of fact that the sureties are sufficient, and accordingly approves the bond, the superior court is without power to dismiss the appeal on motion based solely on the ground that the evidence heard by the justice was insufficient.

[3] The conclusion follows that the respondent was without jurisdiction to dismiss the appeal, and for the reasons heretofore given it is hereby ordered that a writ of mandate issue out of this court, commanding him to set aside said order and proceed with the trial of the action.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; BRITTAIN, J.

ROBBINS v. LAW. (Civ. 3331.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. July 17, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 13, 1920.)

1. Limitation of actions ⟸13—Misrepresentations as to cause of action not estoppel to plead limitations.

Defendant's statements to plaintiff following his assault, that she had no cause of action against him, and that he had been so advised by his attorney, did not estop him in action for assault from pleading that action was barred by limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subdiv. 3; such statements being misrepresentations of law, and not of fact.

2. Estoppel ⟸84 — Misrepresentations of law not ground of estoppel.

Generally a misrepresentation of law will not work an estoppel.

3. Estoppel ⟸87—"Confidential relations," within exception to rule that misrepresentations of law will not work an estoppel, defined.

The term "confidential relations," within the exception to the rule that misrepresentations of law will not work an estoppel, is not confined to the strict fiduciary relationship existing between those having definite, well-recognized legal relations of trust and confidence, but extends to every possible case in which a fiduciary relation exists as a fact, though it may be a moral, social, domestic, or merely personal relation, and need not be a legal one.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Confidential Relation.]

4. Limitation of actions ⟸179(1)—Confidential relation as ground of estoppel must be pleaded.

Statement in complaint that plaintiff had unlimited confidence in and relied upon defendant held not sufficient to show confidential relationship so as to estop defendant on the ground of his misrepresentations of law to defendant from pleading the statute of limitations; it being necessary in such case to plead the facts from which the court can see that a confidential relation existed.

5. Pleading ⟸34(1)—Construed as a whole.

The complaint must be construed as a whole.

6. Limitation of actions ⟸179(1)—Complaint held insufficient to show confidential relationship.

In action for assault brought after expiration of period of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subdiv. 3, in which it was claimed that defendant, after having assaulted and raped plaintiff, told her that she had no cause of action against him, and that defendant was therefore estopped from pleading the statute of limitations, complaint held not to show confidential relationship between the parties so as to bring case within the exception to rule that a misrepresentation of law does not work an estoppel, in that it showed that prior to misrepresentation defendant had wronged plaintiff and aroused her hostility towards him; hostility and personal violence being inconsistent with confidential relationship.

7. Estoppel ⟸87—Reliance on misrepresentations and exercise of diligence must be shown.

Where no confidential relation exists, it is the duty of one setting up estoppel to show, not only reliance upon the fraudulent misrepresentation, but also diligence in using the means at command to ascertain the truth.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Margaret Robbins against Herbert E. Law. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal following an order of the superior court sustaining, without leave to amend, defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint. The cause of action alleged is assault or rape, alleged to have been committed by the defendant upon plaintiff on the 21st day of October, 1916.

The demurrer, which was sustained without leave to amend, pleaded the statute of limitations. The action was commenced April 2, 1919, and is barred by the provisions of section 340, subdivision 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, unless there are sufficient allegations in the complaint to estop the defendant from raising this plea. The sufficiency of these allegations for this purpose is the sole question on appeal. The following excerpts from the complaint are all the essential allegations involved in the consideration of this appeal:

"(2) That heretofore, to wit, on or about the 21st day of October, 1916, * * * the defendant administered to plaintiff certain intoxicating and narcotic and anæsthetic substances; * * * that the same immediately brought a drowsiness and sleep over plaintiff, and then and there prevented plaintiff from resisting * * * the acts of defendant, * * * and rendered plaintiff unconscious of the nature thereof; and that * * * the defendant * * * willfully and feloniously committed a rape upon the plaintiff, * * * whereby plaintiff became pregnant and sick with child, and so remained and continued for the space of two months * * *

"(3) That, in consequence of said rape committed by the defendant upon the plaintiff, she became sick and sore and disordered and suffered greatly in her health and endured great pain, and was prevented from transacting her necessary business and affairs for many months thereafter, and has also suffered great shame and humiliation, and has been and still is greatly worried and vexed and nervous, and has been otherwise injured, to her damage $100,000.

"(4) Plaintiff further alleges, in view of the demurrer filed by defendant to the amended complaint herein, pleading the statute of limitations thereto, that defendant * * * is estopped to plead the statute of limitations to this complaint * * *:

"(a) That, at the time of the acts of defendant hereinabove described and set forth in paragraph 2 of this complaint, and thereafter until the month of December, 1918, a relation of trust and confidence existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, and in that behalf plaintiff alleges: That prior to the said acts of defendant set forth in paragraph 2 hereof defendant declared his love to plaintiff, * * * and asked plaintiff to place her entire confidence in him and to trust him in everything, and promised that he would always advise her of what was best for her to do; that plaintiff then and there accepted the defendant's said protestations of love as genuine and sincere, and for that reason the plaintiff permitted the defendant to, and defendant did, embrace and kiss and caress her in a proper and decorous manner; and thereupon plaintiff replied to the defendant that she would place her trust and confidence in him as so requested by defendant, and accordingly plaintiff thereupon did repose her trust and confidence in the defendant, and defendant thereby gained a great influence and control over plaintiff and in many ways dominated the plaintiff's thoughts.

"(b) That * * * plaintiff was and is a divorcee.

"(c) That when plaintiff awoke from the sleep hereinabove mentioned, and to wit, on or about the 22d day of October, 1916, the defendant was fondly caressing plaintiff, and within a few minutes thereafter and as soon as plaintiff realized what had happened, * * * the defendant represented and stated to the plaintiff, in a very serious and impressive manner, that defendant was prompted to his said acts, set forth in paragraph 2 hereof, by the strong attraction the plaintiff had for the defendant and by the great affection defendant had for the plaintiff, and defendant further represented and stated to plaintiff that plaintiff could do nothing whatever about or concerning such acts, and that the same were no offense because of the fact that plaintiff then and there was a divorcee and over 21 years of age, * * * and that defendant previously had been so advised by his attorney. That plaintiff then knew, of course, that the said acts of defendant were morally wrong or improper, but plaintiff had never read or heard of a case where a man was held liable for acts performed under such circumstances as those described in paragraph 2 hereof, and particularly plaintiff had never read or heard of a case where a man was held liable for such improper relations with a divorcee, and plaintiff feared that perhaps she was to blame for having partaken of the drink offered by defendant, as aforesaid, and, while plaintiff felt insulted and humiliated and shamed by said acts and conduct of defendant, plaintiff did not know that the same constitute a public offense in this state, or that plaintiff had a cause of action against defendant by reason thereof.

"(d) That defendant, * * * also urgently requested and advised plaintiff to do nothing and to say nothing to any one about or concerning the said acts of defendant, because such course, so defendant represented and stated, would only bring reproach upon both said parties, with no possible benefit to plaintiff. * * *

"(e) That a few days subsequent to the 21st day of October, 1916, the defendant promised plaintiff that if plaintiff would keep quiet * * * defendant would do many things for plaintiff, * * * and particularly promised plaintiff that if, at any time, plaintiff should need any money, she could call upon defendant for the same, and defendant would give it to her.

"(f) That defendant thereafter from time to time repeated the representations and statements and the request and advice and promises * * * to and including the month of December, 1918.

"(g) That, subsequent to the acts of defendant set forth in paragraph 2 hereof, to wit, from on or about the 22d day of October, 1916, down to the month of December, 1918, defendant made certain small presents, * * * and plaintiff accepted the same by reason of the trust and confidence she reposed in defendant; * * * that the relations between plaintiff and defendant at all times subsequent to said 21st day of October, 1916, have been decorous and proper.

"(h) That at all the times hereinabove stated the plaintiff has not stood on an equal footing with the defendant, and particularly in this: That on the 22d day of October, 1916, plaintiff was of the age of 23 years, and defendant was then of the age of 55 years, or thereabouts, was then a man of large means and of wide business experience, and had had frequent occasion to consult with attorneys, * * * while plaintiff was in humble circumstances, and had had but little business or legal experience.

"(i) That plaintiff never questioned, but, on the contrary, implicitly believed and relied and acted on each and all of the aforesaid representations and statements of the defendant, * * * and continued so to believe and act and rely on them until the 4th day of March, 1919, and that on said 4th day of March, 1919, the plaintiff learned and discovered and knew for the first time that such representations and statements, and the whole thereof, were false and fraudulent."

The remaining allegations of the complaint are general averments respecting the falsity of the representations, the fraudulent intent with which they were made, and the efficiency of said representations, promises, and conduct to prevent plaintiff learning of her right to bring an action.

The allegations of the complaint fall naturally into two divisions: (1) the misrepresentations, and (2) the special relations existing between the plaintiff and defendant.

[1] Analyzing the foregoing allegations of misrepresentation which are relied upon as pleading matter sufficient to estop defendant from pleading the statute of limitations, it will be seen that the gist of the misrepresentation is that the defendant represented to plaintiff that she had no cause of action. He is not alleged to have concealed the facts constituting the cause of action, but with having positively declared that those facts, well known to both parties, did not give rise to an action at law. This is a misrepresentation of law, not of fact. The misrepresentation of defendant that he had been so advised by his attorney is not to be considered as a misrepresentation of fact, when distinguishing between representations of fact and law. It is the same as though he had fortified his misrepresentation by stating that he had read it in the Civil Code, which would only be restating the misrepresentation of law in another manner.

[2] The general rule is well established that misrepresentation of law is not actionable fraud, and will not work an estoppel. Bigelow on Estoppel, § 438, quoted in McKeen v. Naughton, 88 Cal. 467, 26 Pac. 354; Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 20, 21 Pac. 534, 12 Am. St. Rep. 126; Rheingans v. Smith, 161 Cal. 365, 119 Pac. 494, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1140; Haviland v. Southern California Edison Co., 172 Cal. 608, 158 Pac. 328.

The exceptions to this rule are stated in the case of Champion v. Woods, supra, as follows:

"Generally speaking, deception as to matters of law affords no ground of redress or relief. There are exceptions—the rule does not apply to transactions between parties holding fiduciary or confidential relations, and where one who has had superior means of information possesses a knowledge of the law, and thereby obtains an unconscionable advantage of another who is ignorant, and has not been in a situation to become informed, the injured party is entitled to relief, as well as if the matters represented were matters of fact."

[3] Appellant insists, however, that the allegations of the complaint describing the relations between the plaintiff and defendant bring this case within both of the exceptions; that is to say: First, that the complaint shows a confidential relation between the parties, and, second, that the misrepresentations of law were made by one skilled in the law to one ignorant and uninformed and not in a situation to become informed. The term "confidential relations" is ordinarily understood to apply to the relations established by law between attorney and client, husband and wife, guardian and ward, and other legal relations of this character, but courts of equity have been careful not to fetter their own jurisdiction by defining the limits of this relationship. It is not confined to the strict fiduciary relationship existing between those having certain definite, well-recognized legal relations of trust and confidence, but is often said to extend to every possible case in which a fiduciary relation exists as a fact. The relation need not be legal; it may be moral, social, domestic, or merely personal. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., §§ 956, 963; Story's Eq. Jur., § 370; Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 434, 126 Pac. 384.

The various terms used in the authorities to describe the several classes of this relationship are often used synonymously, but, so far as is germane to the subject of estoppel by fraudulent misrepresentations, it is clear that this relationship in its broadest extent can mean nothing less than that the one setting up the estoppel had the right to rely upon the representations.

[4] The direct general allegations of the complaint, paragraph 4, subds (a), (h), and (i), faithfully copy some of the usual descriptive definitions, of confidential or fiduciary relations, or relations of trust and confidence. But the mere statement in the complaint that the plaintiff had unlimited confidence in and relied upon the defendant is not a sufficient statement of the facts to show a confidential relation. The facts must be alleged, from which the court can see that a confidential relation does in fact exist. Robins v. Hope, 57 Cal. 493.

[5-6] Furthermore, we must read the complaint as a whole. Considering the complaint as a whole, we are of the opinion that no confidential relation is shown to exist at any time subsequent to the date of the assault. The parties must be held to have been hostile. The most liberal definition of confidential relations could not include the relation between known enemies. The plaintiff knew that defendant had wronged her, committed violence upon her person, and, according to the complaint, caused her to feel sick, sore, disordered, vexed, ashamed, worried, insulted, and humiliated. Hostility and personal violence are poor bedfellows to lie down with confidential relations. They do not harmonize in the same complaint. The hostility of defendant known to plaintiff, as shown by the complaint, speaks louder than the general allegations of trustful reliance upon the ravisher. There is no confidential relation between hostile parties.

As hostility, both known and shown, destroys confidential relations, it is equally fatal to other exceptions to the general rule that a misrepresentation of law is not actionable fraud, and will not work an estoppel.

[7] Where no confidential relation exists, it is the duty of one setting up the estoppel to show, not only reliance upon the fraudulent misrepresentation, but also diligence in using the means at command to ascertain the truth, or by inquiry. In this connection it must appear that in relying upon it he acted as a reasonably prudent person would act, and was not guilty of negligence or carelessness. Thus it is held in Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670, that where the statute of limitations runs from the date of the discovery of the fraud the statute will commence to run from the date that the fraud should have been discovered by a man of ordinary prudence under the circumstances and with the means of knowledge readily available to him. See, also, 25 Cyc. 1216, 1213, and cases cited; 16 Cyc. 738, and cases cited.

We quote again from Champion v. Woods, supra:

"It is not sufficient under any circumstances that the party complaining was ignorant of the truth of the matter concerning which the representation was made, and that he believed it to be true. His situation may be such that he will be deemed in law to have knowledge of the facts, and barred from making complaint, though actually ignorant of the true state of facts. It is a general principle that if the means of knowledge be at hand, and equally available to both parties, and the subject-matter be open to inspection of both alike, and there be no fiduciary or confidential relation, and no warranty of the facts, the injured party must show that he has availed himself of the means of information existing at the time of the transaction before he will be heard to say that he was deceived by the misrepresentations of the other party. The fraud must have been practiced under such circumstances as to leave a reasonable inference that the injured party was deceived, and if the circumstances attending the transaction are such as to put a reasonable person upon inquiry, there can be no presumption of deceit. It seems quite incredible that the plaintiff, while engaged in a hostile action against her husband, could cherish such unbounded love and confidence in him as is set forth in the complaint."

Known hostility destroys the right to rely upon the representations without using the means available to any one to make inquiry and ascertain the law on a simple question. Nothing is shown in the complaint to indicate that plaintiff had any different means of ascertaining the truth on March 4, 1919, than at any time since the assault on October 21, 1916. If different circumstances existed at that time the complaint should allege what they were, so that the court could see whether the plaintiff had acted as a reasonably prudent person and with diligence in ascertaining her rights. Denike v. Santa Clara, etc., 9 Cal. App. 228, 98 Pac. 687.

The complaint, moreover, shows on its face negligence on the part of plaintiff in taking no action of any kind to redress her known wrong for a period of 2½ years after the assault, nor to make inquiry concerning the truth of the strange representation of law alleged to have been made by the defendant. The plaintiff was not justified in relying upon these representations, without making inquiry on her own account. It is so natural and usual for a complaint to follow an assault of this kind that it is recognized in our law in criminal actions for this offense, where the complaint made by the prosecutrix immediately after the assault is admissible on behalf of the prosecution, and the failure to make such complaint is admissible on behalf of the defendant.

Appellant learnedly discusses the psychology of the instant case. But the rules of law which are controlling upon us are applicable to all persons. It is quite clear that plaintiff's conduct was not that of a reasonably prudent person. We must hold, therefore, that the defendant is not estopped from pleading the statute of limitations, and that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

THOS. D. CAMPBELL & CO. v. HOLEHAN et al. (Civ. 3432.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 19, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 16, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⟸461(1) — Clause apparently stricken from contract cannot be considered, in absence of evidence as to intention.

Where a written contract provided that an exclusive agency thereby given should not defeat the right to commission for services already rendered as provided by the contract, but the commissions earned thereunder should be applied in payment of the former commission, a clause of the contract, which had apparently been stricken therefrom before execution, cannot be considered, nor the contract construed in conformity therewith to make the exclusive agency full payment of the previous commission, in the absence of any evidence as to the intent of the parties in striking the clause.

2. Assignments ⟸131—Complaint on partial assignment need not allege consent of debtor.

Since a partial assignment was valid in equity without the consent of the debtor, though it was invalid at common law, a complaint under the Code, based on partial assignment, need not allege consent by the debtor to state a cause of action, as was required in a common-law declaration on such assignment.

3. Assignments ⟸129—Action by partial assignee not defective for want of parties when assignor was made defendant.

A complaint by the assignee of part of a debt is not demurrable for want of proper parties, where the assignor, who refused to join as plaintiff, was made a defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Thos. D. Campbell & Co. against V. E. Holehan and the Charles A. Turner Company, which filed cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff and cross-complainant, and defendant Holehan appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondent Campbell Co.

Mulford & Dryer, of Los Angeles, for respondent Turner Co.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover $5,000, alleged to be due (less a small credit) as commissions, from defendant Holehan, to Charles A. Turner Company, respondent, a 5/12 interest in which had been assigned to the plaintiff. Because of the declination of Charles A. Turner Company to join as plaintiff, it was made a defendant. It subsequently filed a cross-complaint, concurring in the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and joining in the prayer for relief against the defendant. Defendant denied the obligation and debt. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and the cross-complainant, for their respective shares of $4,500, from which defendant appeals.

The Charles A. Turner Company attached to its cross-complaint the agreement, out of which the alleged right to the commission arose. This contract, entered into between appellant Holehan and the respondent Charles A. Turner Company, recites that, in consideration of the consummation of an exchange of real estate, between Holehan and A. W. Longley, and confirming a verbal agreement theretofore made between the parties, it is agreed that the Charles A. Turner Company shall receive as commission for its services in connection with said exchange of properties between Holehan and A. W. Longley the sum of $5,000, payable as thereinafter specified. The contract then provides that as Holehan is the owner of an option to purchase from Longley certain real estate (fully describing it, and setting forth the option, which by its terms expired on the 14th day of April, 1917), it is agreed that the Turner Company shall be, and is appointed, and constituted exclusive sales agent of Holehan to sell, during the existence of the option, any and all of the real property covered thereby, and that Holehan will pay to the Turner Company a net commission of 5 per cent. on the selling price of all of the real estate so sold. Then follows a paragraph which appears to have been stricken out, and the contract concludes with the following provisions:

"It is further agreed that nothing herein contained shall be construed to cancel or invalidate the obligation of party of the first part hereto to pay to party of the second part the commission hereinbefore specified on the exchange of properties between party of the first part and A. W. Longley, and that the appointment of party of the second part as exclusive selling agent for the property herein described is provided as an alternative method of paying said commission to party of the second part; that should said option be found to be invalid, or be terminated for any cause, party of the first part immediately thereafter will pay to party of the second part in full of said commission on the said Longley-Holehan exchange the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) gold coin of the United States, after deducting from that amount such moneys as theretofore shall have been received by party of the second part on account of said commissions on the sale of said hereinbefore described real property as hereinbefore set forth."

The defendant did not deny the execution, or the existence of the contract, and in his answer merely denied that any commission was to be payable "except in accordance with" its terms. At the trial the fact that the exchange of properties between appellant and Longley had been consummated was admitted. It was alleged by the cross-complainant, Turner Company, that the option with Longley set out in the contract was never exercised by Holehan, and that it expired and terminated on the 14th day of April, 1917. This allegation was not denied. Upon this state of the record, and evidence as to nonpayment of the amount of the commission, except $500, the lower court awarded judgment against the defendant.

[1] In seeking a reversal of the judgment, appellant contends that the appointment by Holehan of the Charles A. Turner Company, as exclusive sales agent to sell the real property covered by the Longley option, and the agreement to pay a commission therefor, was in lieu of the payment of the commission of $5,000, agreed upon in connection with the consummation of the exchange of properties between Longley and himself, and that, as it is not shown that the commission was thus earned, the judgment should be set aside. In advancing his position he argues that the court should read into the contract the clause which appears to have been stricken out, and this without proof as to where, when or under what circumstances the apparent correction was made. Both in the court below, and here, the appellant has disclaimed any intent to seek to reform the agreement, being content "to urge a construction of the contract as it stood, which would express the true meaning of its terms." We are not at liberty to disregard what, so far as the record discloses, was the solemn act of the parties at the time of the execution of the agreement. Furthermore, if the rejected clause were restored, the agreement is open to attack upon the ground that its provisions are repugnant and apparently nullify one another. Appellant's object, in thus seeking a restoration of the clause, is disclosed when he advances the argument that the contract, as signed by the parties, should give way before, and that it should be construed as though containing, the discarded stipulation, an interpretation different from that followed by the lower court. He relies upon Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 348, 40 Pac. 534. In that case, however, parol evidence was admitted to clear ambiguity and uncertainty in the contract, and to enable the court to ascertain whether the provisions embodied in the sections of the Civil Code relating to interpretation of contracts were pertinent and applicable to the facts of the case. The weakness of appellant's position is that in the instant case no testimony was offered by him, or suggestion made, that there were any oral negotiations prior to the contract, or that the parties intended the contract to express anything else than was actually contained in the completed agreement. Appellant contends that the parties themselves placed a construction on the contract differing from that adopted by the court. There is no testimony to that effect.

[2] The final contention of appellant is that neither the complaint nor the cross-complaint contains a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. His theory is that when the Turner Company assigned an undivided 5/12 interest in the contract to the Campbell Company, it split the demand, imposing an obligation upon appellant without his consent. While an assignment of part only of an entire demand is void, at law, unless done with the consent of the debtor, it is valid in equity. Under the practice at common law, a recovery upon such partial assignment could not be had without averring and proving that it was made with the consent of the defendant. Such an averment was immaterial in equity, and hence, under the Code of this state, the complaint is not demurrable for lack of facts, if it fails to contain such an allegation.

[3] Neither the complaint nor the cross-complaint, in the instant case, was demurrable for want of parties, for the plaintiff made its assignor a party defendant, and it has responded by filing a cross-complaint. Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 520, 521, 99 Am. Dec. 423; Buckeye Refining Co. v. Kelly, 163 Cal. 9, 13, 124 Pac. 536, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 840.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRAHAM. (Cr. 716.)

Criminal law ⟸730(8)—Exception to argument held not sustainable, in view of court's instructions.

Argument by the prosecuting attorney, in a prosecution for larceny, that defendant was a member of a gang that was stealing hogs, which, he claimed, was an inference from the evidence, does not require reversal, on defendant's exceptions thereto, where the court instructed the jury to disregard the statement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Paul Graham was convicted of petit larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Perkins and Dickson F. Maddox, both of Visalia, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMAS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction for petit larceny, on the ground of misconduct of the prosecuting officers. The information charged defendant and another with the crime of grand larceny—the stealing of two sows and five pigs, of the value of $75. Graham demanded and was granted a separate trial. From the record before us it appears that 4 days were consumed and 55 witnesses examined during the trial—the transcript covering nearly 500 pages. It is claimed by appellant that—

"During the arguments of the case to the jury the following remarks of the counsel for the prosecution were excepted to by the defendant:

"Mr. Ham, Deputy District Attorney: It is our theory that these men are a band of hog thieves; that they make their living by stealing hogs.

"Mr. Machetanz: I want our objection to go to that; that these men are a band of hog thieves.

"Mr. Ham: The court can instruct the jury.

"The Court: Very well. The jury are instructed to disregard that statement of the district attorney.

"Mr. Ham: It is our theory that those men were engaged in stealing hogs; it is our theory that that defendant went around there stealing hogs throughout that country.

"Mr. Perkins: We object to that as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant.

"The Court: Go ahead with your argument.

"Mr. Scott, District Attorney: My theory is that there is a band of hog stealers down there, and that there is a combination in that country, down there in that neighborhood of Alpaugh, that has been stealing hogs. That is a proper inference to be drawn.

"Mr. Perkins: We except to the remarks of the district attorney that there is a band of hog stealers, and to the statement that there is a combination down there in the neighborhood of Alpaugh that has been stealing hogs.

"Mr. Scott: I say that is the inference which I draw.

"Mr. Perkins: I except to the inference, because it is not supported by any evidence in the case.

"The Court: It is just the statement of the district attorney; he is not contending that it is a fact, except as the evidence shows it.

"Mr. Perkins: We except to the remarks of the district attorney; that it is noticeable that that is a class of district down there where these acts prevail, as being unsupported by the evidence.

"The Court: Proceed; you have your exception."

The foregoing does not constitute ground for exception (People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124), and, according to the positive and unqualified statement of appellant, is "the sole basis" of his appeal. We think that the mere statement of this claimed assignment of error is to answer it. There is positively no merit therein. With the court's instruction and admonition to the jury before us, in the absence of showing to the contrary, we are bound to presume that the jury obeyed and heeded the same. We consider the case so clear that argument or citation of authorities become unnecessary to support the conclusion reached.

Judgment affirmed.

SHRIVER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SONOMA COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 2215.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 20, 1920. On Rehearing Aug. 19, 1920.)

1. Justices of the peace ⟸159(10)—Undertaking on appeal signed only as to affidavit of qualification, insufficient.

Where on appeal from a justice court the sureties have signed the affidavit of qualification attached to the form of undertaking, but have not signed the undertaking itself, the undertaking is insufficient to confer jurisdiction on the superior court.

2. Justices of the peace ⟸162(2)—Transmission of papers does not remove case where undertaking not signed.

Where an appeal is attempted to be taken from a justice of the peace, and the undertaking is unsigned, the appeal is a mere nullity, and does not remove the case from the justice's court, although the papers are improperly transmitted to the superior court.

3. Justices of the peace ⟸158(1, 2)—Fees paid on ineffectual appeal applied on second appeal.

Where an appeal was attempted to be taken from a justice's court, ineffectual because of a defective undertaking, and the fees were paid and the papers transmitted to the superior court, on a second appeal taken in time it was not necessary, under Code Civ. Proc. § 981, to pay the fees a second time, since it will be deemed that the fees paid to perfect the appeal remain in the hands of the justice until an appeal has been properly perfected.

4. Justices of the peace ⟸164(3)—Papers prematurely filed on imperfect appeal should be refiled.

Where on an attempted appeal from a justice court, the papers have been improperly transmitted to the superior court, because of a defective undertaking, and a second appeal has been taken in time, the papers transmitted on the first appeal should be refiled as accompanying the second appeal.

5. Prohibition ⟸10(2)—Writ lies to prevent trial of appeal where no judgment entered below.

A writ of prohibition will issue to prevent the superior court from trying a case appealed from a justice's court on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, where no judgment was ever entered in the justice's court from which an appeal could be taken.

6. Prohibition ⟸12—Where want of jurisdiction affirmatively appears, failure to direct court's attention thereto immaterial.

On an application for prohibition to prevent trial by the superior court, where no judgment had in fact been entered below, counsel's failure to call the court's attention thereto does not justify a refusal to enter the writ, where the record affirmatively shows want of jurisdiction.

On Rehearing.

7. Justices of the peace ⟸124(3)—Judgment not indicating in whose favor rendered, insufficient.

An entry on the docket of a justice of the peace after a finding of the jury, "Judgment entered for $74 and costs of suit," is insufficient to constitute a judgment as not indicating in whose favor it was rendered, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 891, 893.

Application by F. R. Shriver and another for a writ of prohibition, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Sonoma County and Thomas C. Denny, Judge, to prevent the trial of a certain action. Writ issued.

Vallandigham & Quackenbush, of Santa Rosa, for petitioners.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

GLENN, Presiding Judge pro tem. The petitioners seek to prohibit the trial in the superior court of Sonoma county of a certain action, entitled F. R. Shriver and G. Schoff (a copartnership), Plaintiffs, v. Floyd Colvin and A. Beeman, Defendants, and which, prior to the filing of the petition in this court, had been set for trial by respondents. To the petition so filed, respondents have interposed a demurrer and answer. The demurrer was submitted without argument, and in view of the conclusions we have come to in a discussion of the facts as disclosed by the petition and answer, upon which this proceeding has been submitted, we believe the demurrer should be overruled, and it is so ordered.

It appears from the pleadings herein that the action above referred to was commenced in the justice's court of Santa Rosa township, county of Sonoma, and subsequently (according to the averments of the petition, upon the stipulation of the parties) was transferred to the justice's court of Russian River township, in said county. The action was tried on December 30, 1919, in said latter court, before the court and a jury, and on the same day a verdict was rendered and entered in favor of plaintiffs. It appears from the justice's docket that no judgment on the verdict was entered; but this matter will be discussed hereafter. However, a notice of appeal was filed, apparently on the assumption that a judgment had been made and entered on December 30, 1919, and the fees required to be paid upon the filing of the notice of appeal under the provisions of section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure were duly paid and a purported undertaking filed. The sureties signed only the affidavit of qualification attached to the undertaking, but not the undertaking itself. The justice transmitted the papers on this notice of appeal to the clerk of the superior court, and they were there marked filed on January 10, 1920. On January 26, 1920, respondents therein, petitioners here, gave notice of motion to dismiss the appeal by reason of the insufficiency of the undertaking. The hearing was noticed for February 2, 1920. On January 28, 1920 (which was after the giving of the notice to dismiss, but before the hearing or the order granting the same, and which was within 30 days after the entry of judgment, assuming, for the present, that judgment was entered on December 30, 1919), the defendants and appellants in said action filed in the justice's court of Russian River township a new notice of appeal and also a new undertaking, but no fees accompanied the filing of these last-mentioned papers. They were nevertheless transmitted by the justice to the clerk of said superior court, and therein filed on January 28, 1920. These papers were filed in action No. 11532, and being the same action in which the papers under the first notice of appeal had been filed. (The date of the filing of the second notice of appeal and undertaking thereon appears from Exhibit D, attached to the petition.) The filing of these papers in the office of the clerk of the superior court was also prior to the hearing of the motion to dismiss the first appeal and the order granting the same. A copy of the second notice of appeal is attached to the petition, from which it appears that it was also taken from the purported judgment of December 30, 1919. Thereafter a motion was made by plaintiffs in said action, petitioners here, to dismiss the second appeal upon the grounds hereinafter discussed.

1. The first ground specified in the notice of motion is that the fees required by section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure must accompany the filing of said notice of appeal, as the same is to be treated as a separate and independent appeal.

It will be noted that the second notice of appeal and the undertaking thereon were not only filed with the justice before the expiration of 30 days from December 30, 1919, the date of the purported judgment from which the appeal was taken, but were also transmitted to the clerk of the superior court and filed by him within said time and before the order dismissing the first appeal.

[1] It is important at the outset to determine whether or not the appeal first taken was perfected by the giving of a proper and sufficient undertaking. If it was, then there was no authority to file the second notice of appeal or undertaking, for upon the perfecting of an appeal the jurisdiction of the superior court immediately attaches. Farrisee v. Superior Court, 181 Pac. 73. If not perfected, then jurisdiction remained in the justice's court. The document filed as an undertaking was not signed by any sureties. According to the answer filed herein, two persons did sign the affidavit of qualification attached to the form of undertaking. We think this is clearly insufficient to constitute an undertaking, for parties who merely sign such an affidavit are not bound, nor do they become liable for the payment of any sum for costs on appeal, or otherwise.

An undertaking fatally defective is insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon an appellate court. Coker v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 177; McCracken v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 74, 24 Pac. 845. Of course, the rule is different where the undertaking is not fatally defective. Werner v. Superior Court, 161 Cal. 209, 118 Pac. 709.

[2] The undertaking is not only fatally defective, but, not having been signed is, in legal effect, no undertaking. The appeal was a mere nullity; hence the record was improperly transmitted to the superior court. Under such circumstances the case is to be deemed as in the justice's court. In the case of Tompkins v. Superior Court, 24 Cal. App. 656, 142 Pac. 96, notice of appeal from a judgment was given, but no undertaking was filed thereon. The papers were, however, transmitted to the superior court. Subsequently, and within the time allowed by law, a second notice of appeal and an undertaking were filed. The court say:

"Clearly the first appeal was, and is conceded to be, a nullity by reason of the fact that no sufficient undertaking was filed as required by section 978 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Hence the transmission of the record to the clerk, made at this time by the justice, was unwarranted, as the same is deemed to be in the office of the justice."

In the case of Johnson v. Superior Court, 28 Cal. App. 618, 153 Pac. 404, an appeal had been taken from a judgment of the justice's court, but the requisite fees under section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure had not been paid. The appeal was ordered dismissed, and the court, after quoting the language above set forth from the Tompkins Case, says:

"So here, the transmission by the justice of the record on appeal to the clerk of the superior court was without legal warrant by reason of the fact that the fees referred to in section 981 were not paid to the justice at the time of the filing of the notice of appeal, and the papers and record are, as a matter of law, still in the office of the justice, or the same in legal effect as though the physical act of transmitting them to the county clerk had not been performed."

[3] The transferring of the papers under the first notice of appeal being unwarranted, it follows that the fees paid for the purpose of perfecting the appeal must be deemed to have remained in the hands of the justice until an appeal had been properly perfected. The sum so paid, under the provisions of sections 977 and 981 of said Code, is to be transmitted with the papers.

Petitioners cite Farrisee v. Superior Court, 181 Pac. 73, but that case is distinguishable from this, as an undertaking had been duly filed, but the sureties, upon exception being taken to their sufficiency, had failed to qualify. The court held upon notice of appeal being filed, together with a sufficient undertaking, the appeal became effectual and the jurisdiction of the superior court attached; that the failure of the sureties to justify did not ipso facto affect the appeal, but should be construed "as giving to the respondent the right, if he shall choose to avail himself thereof, to move for its dismissal upon the ground that since it was taken it has become ineffectual." Farrisee v. Superior Court, supra.

That an undertaking to pay costs on appeal must be first filed before jurisdiction is conferred, and if not so filed the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, has been held in many cases, but particular attention is called to the cases of Stimpson, etc., Scale Co. v. Superior Court, 12 Cal. App. 536, 107 Pac. 1013; Thomas v. Hawkins, 12 Cal. App. 327, 107 Pac. 578; McCracken v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 74, 24 Pac. 845.

The question as to the time of the payment of the fees under section 981 of the Code of Civil Procedure was involved in the case of Simmons v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 252, 157 Pac. 817, and therein it is held that if the fees are paid within the 30 days allowed for taking an appeal, so as to enable the same to be transmitted with the record on appeal, although not paid at the time of filing the notice of appeal, it is sufficient. The court is careful to note that it does not intend to hold that the justice would be required to accept for filing any notice of appeal not accompanied with the payment of the fees. To the same effect is the case of Simmons v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 676, 174 Pac. 670. The Simmons Case, 30 Cal. App. 252, 157 Pac. 817, is distinguished by the court therein from the case of Johnson v. Superior Court, supra, for the reason that in the Johnson Case the fees were not paid until after the expiration of 30 days, and hence the appeal had not been perfected within that time. Austin v. Strang, 30 Cal. App. 265, 157 Pac. 1002, cited by petitioner, is not in point, as that was mandate to compel the justice to enter a default without paying his fees therefor.

As no appeal had been perfected under the first notice of appeal by reason of the failure to file an undertaking thereon as required by law, jurisdiction of the action remained in the justice's court, and hence the papers and fees were prematurely transmitted. The second notice of appeal was taken within the time allowed by law (and after the time allowed by law for the filing of a new undertaking under the first notice) and a valid undertaking was filed. Hence this appeal became effectual (the fees for the transmission of the papers on appeal having been previously paid to the justice), and jurisdiction passed to the superior court. The record and fees having been previously (although prematurely) transmitted to the clerk of the superior court, all that remained for the justice to do was to transmit the additional papers, together with a complete copy of his docket, and it would be the duty of the clerk of the superior court to refile the papers received on the first appeal as accompanying the second appeal. Tompkins v. Superior Court, supra.

[4] 2. The second ground stated is that the papers were irregularly and improperly filed in said appeal. Apparently, from the points and authorities of petitioners, the irregularity consisted in the clerk of the superior court having filed the papers on the second appeal among the papers on the first appeal. The answer to this is as stated above: The transmission of the record on the first appeal having been unwarranted, the papers thus transmitted should be refiled as accompanying the second appeal. Tompkins v. Superior Court, 24 Cal. App. 656, 658, 142 Pac. 96.

As the above points were the only ones argued by counsel, we have discussed the same at some length, for under the circumstances we did not desire to disregard them; however, in view of the conclusion to which we have come as to the third ground stated in the notice of motion, a discussion of those points might have been properly eliminated.

[5] 3. The third ground is that the court is without jurisdiction of said appeal. This is well taken, for no judgment has ever been made or entered by the justice's court in said action. It is true that counsel have not discussed this particular point, and doubtless did not call the same to the attention of respondents at the hearing of the notice of motion to dismiss. It has apparently been assumed by counsel that a judgment was entered on December 30, 1919, but that such is not the fact is disclosed by the record.

[6] While the notice of appeal (a copy of which is attached to the petition) recites that it is taken from the judgment made and entered on December 30, 1919, as a matter of fact, no such judgment was entered. The failure of counsel to call the court's attention to this matter would not, of course, justify a refusal to issue the writ, where the record, as it does here, affirmatively shows want of jurisdiction on the part of respondents to proceed further with the action.

The case was tried on December 30, 1919, before the court and a jury and the docket, a copy of which is attached to the petition, contains the following entry:

"December 30, 1919. All parties in court. Jury sworn to try the case. The jury, after hearing all evidence, returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs.

"Verdict as follows:

Seven lambs at eight dollars..$50.00*
One ewe at ten dollars..... 10.00
Two ewes at four dollars.... 8.00

Total$74.00 and costs."

*The error in this item appears in the copy of the docket from which we have quoted.

At the end of the transcript of docket is the following:

"I hereby certify above is true copy of the docket kept by me. J. D. Cooper."

Nowhere in the docket is there mention of any judgment entered on the verdict of the jury. As no judgment has ever been entered, it follows that both attempted appeals were prematurely taken, and the superior court acquired no jurisdiction thereby. In the case of June v. Superior Court of Sonoma County, 16 Cal. App. 126, 116 Pac. 293, an appeal had been taken from the justice's court to the superior court after the entry of the verdict of the jury in the docket, but no judgment had been entered. The superior court made its order dismissing the appeal. It was sought by proceeding in mandate to compel the court to set aside its order dismissing the appeal. After reviewing the various decisions and sections of the Code applicable thereto, it was held that the appeal was prematurely taken, and that the superior court did not acquire jurisdiction thereby. The court say:

"We do not think that the justice must formulate a judgment with that particularity required of judgments required to be entered in the superior court, but that he should make some entry in his docket showing that he has rendered judgment on the verdict we do think is essential to a substantial compliance with the statute. His duty to enter judgment is in a sense ministerial, and its performance could probably be enforced by mandate, but, nevertheless, the statute requires this of him. Until such entry is made there is no judgment from which an appeal may be taken and, if the appeal is taken before the justice enters judgment on the verdict, it confers no jurisdiction on the superior court."

To the same effect also is the case of Thomson v. Superior Court, 161 Cal. 329, 119 Pac. 98, in which the court, in referring to the June Case, say:

"We see no escape from the conclusions reached in the above case."

From the foregoing it follows that a peremptory writ of prohibition should issue out of this court, directed to respondents, commanding them to refrain from all further proceedings in the action of F. R. Shriver and G. Schoof, a copartnership, v. Floyd Colvin and A. Beeman, except to enter an order dismissing the appeal attempted to be taken therein. Let the writ issue accordingly.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] Respondents' petition for a rehearing. The writ was ordered issued by reason of the fact that the copy of the docket of the justice presented to this court showed that no judgment had ever been entered by the justice, and hence it was held that the attempted appeal was prematurely taken. Respondents assert, however, that the following entry was in fact made in the docket, but that they deemed it unnecessary to question its sufficiency, hence its omission, "Judgment entered for $74 and costs of suit."

In deciding the case, this court assumed, of course, that the record presented was correct. However, such an entry does not constitute a judgment. Section 891 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when a trial by jury has been had judgment must be entered by the justice at once "in conformity with the verdict." This means that it must be entered in favor of the party securing the verdict; otherwise the judgment is meaningless. The entry does not refer to the verdict, nor can it be ascertained therefrom in whose favor the justice intended to enter judgment. Section 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the judgment of the justice must be entered substantially in the form required by section 667, * * * "No judgment shall have effect for any purpose until so entered."

Respondents have referred us to no decision upholding a judgment which fails to indicate in whose favor it was rendered or entered; on the other hand, the authorities, which we have examined, hold that such a judgment is void for uncertainty. In 15 R. C. L. § 29, it is said:

"It is a fundamental rule that the form of a judgment should be such as will indicate with reasonable clearness the decision which the court has rendered, and a failure to comply with this requirement will render the judgment void for uncertainty. Thus a judgment which does not show for and against whom it is entered will be void for uncertainty, and if it does not show in what case it was rendered, it will in like manner be void"—citing the case of Ferrell v. Simmons, 63 W. Va. 45, 59 S. E. 752, 129 Am. St. Rep. 962.

"A judgment not designating in whose favor it is rendered is void for uncertainty." "The judgment must designate with certainty the party against whom it is rendered." 11 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 949, 951.

In 1 Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) § 3, under the heading of "Essentials of a judgment," it is said:

"And the judgment must, of course, appear to be in favor of one party and against the other."

While it is doubtless true that a judgment of the justice's court need not be entered with all the formalities of one of the superior court, yet those things essential to constitute a judgment can no more be omitted from the one than from the other.

Section 900a of the Code of Civil Procedure seems to cover a situation such as presented by the entry referred to by providing:

"Said justice shall have power to set aside any void judgment upon motion of either party to the action after notice to the adverse party, and thereupon said action shall be treated as if no judgment had been entered."

Rehearing denied.

LAUMAN et al. v. CONCORDIA FIRE INS. CO. OF MILWAUKEE, WIS. (Civ. 3208.)*

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 15, 1920.)

1. Insurance ⟸229(3)—Brokers held without authority to accept notice of cancellation.

Persons engaged by the insured to place insurance on his property, whose custom it was to give notice of any cancellation and to procure other insurance if possible, should be treated as mere brokers, and not authorized to accept notice of cancellation.

2. Insurance ⟸665(1)—Persons placing insurance held not agents to receive notice of cancellation.

In an action on a fire policy, where the insurer relied on notice of cancellation given to brokers employed by the insured to effect the insurance, evidence held wholly insufficient to show that they were ostensible agents within Civ. Code, § 2300, and as such entitled to accept notice of cancellation.

3. Insurance ⟸229(3)—Agents to procure insurance have no power to consent to cancellation.

An agent employed to procure insurance has no power to consent to a cancellation, or accept notice thereof; his authority terminating on delivery of the policy.

4. Insurance ⟸665(7) — Evidence, coupled with schedules, insufficient to show amount of loss.

In an action on a fire policy insuring a dry-cleaning establishment and garments therein, schedules, containing names of persons, lists of garments, and sums of money, in three columns, unsupported by any other testimony as to value, are insufficient to establish the value of the garments lost.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1122(2) — Appellate court must reverse erroneous judgment in lump sum, as it cannot make findings of fact.

Where the evidence as a whole did not show that the value of the property destroyed equaled the amount of the judgment, although there was evidence as to the value of some of the articles of a particular kind destroyed, a judgment for the insured in a lump sum for such articles must be reversed by the appellate court, as it has no authority to make findings.

6. Insurance ⟸662(1) — Preliminary proofs not admissible to prove loss.

Preliminary proofs of loss are never admissible at the trial as evidence of the fact of loss or the amount thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Roy R. Lauman and another against the Concordia Fire Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wis. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

*Superseded by opinion on rehearing. See 195 Pac. 951.

W. W. Hindman, of Santa Monica, for appellant.

Paul H. McPherrin and Chandler P. Ward, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to recover on a fire insurance policy. Plaintiff Lauman was at all times referred to in this action engaged in the cleaning and dyeing business in the city of Los Angeles. His "customers" were the owners of "routes," having their own wagons, etc., with which they solicited the patronage of their own patrons throughout various parts of the city. The articles so gathered such "customers" would take to Lauman's place of business for cleaning or dyeing, after which they would, by the latter's "customers," be delivered to their own patrons, the owners thereof. In other words, Lauman had no dealings with the individual owners of the clothing and other articles so delivered to him for cleaning or dyeing; all his business was with the owners of the various "routes." The court found in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The policy upon which the action is based was issued to plaintiff by the defendant corporation through one C. P. Spinning, its duly and legally authorized agent. The policy covered three separate items, as follows:

(1) "One thousand dollars on office and other furniture and fixtures, machinery and equipment;" (2) "one thousand dollars on merchandise of every description, specifically including property left with plaintiff in trust or for repairs, or storage, or for which he should have assumed liability"; and (3) "five hundred dollars on one-story brick building, where the business was located, and as described in the policy of insurance."

As to the last item, there is attached to the policy a "mortgage clause," making the loss, if any, payable to the plaintiff H. R. Dodd.

The policy was issued on May 16, 1917. On the 5th of June following the property was damaged by fire. Thereafter, and within the time and in the manner required by such policy, Lauman notified the defendant company of the fire, and furnished and submitted to defendant company proof of loss in writing, later, at the request of defendant, submitting amendments thereto. In addition to this, and as late as September, 1917, in response to defendant's demand, Lauman personally submitted to an examination under oath in compliance with the terms of the policy.

Under date of July 11, 1917, the defendant corporation, through its special agent and adjuster, R. L. McCulloch, wrote Lauman a letter, which, omitting the formal parts, is in words and figures as follows:

"I am in receipt of a preliminary proof of loss under policy No. 30804 of the Concordia Fire Insurance Company of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, wherein you claim loss and damage by reason of a fire that occurred on the fifth day of June, 1917, at the premises No. 2190 East Eleventh street, Los Angeles, California. The Concordia Fire Insurance Company herewith disagrees with you as to the amount of loss claimed by you by reason of said fire under its policy No. 30804. The aforesaid Concordia Fire Insurance Company admits that the loss to the various articles covered under the first item of the form as attached to the policy is as set forth in the aforesaid proof of loss; and also that the loss to the building covered under the third item of the form as attached to the policy is as set forth in the aforesaid proof of loss. The aforesaid Concordia Fire Insurance Company disagrees with you as to the amount of the loss and damage claimed by you on any and all articles covered under the second item of the form as attached to the policy and described as 'merchandise,' and does not admit that you sustained any loss or damage under this item by reason of said fire, as you have failed to show that the goods destroyed or damaged were your property, or that you were liable by law for any loss or damage to said goods, or that at any time prior to the date of the fire you had specifically assumed liability therefor, nor do you furnish any evidence as to your liability to others in event said goods were held by you in trust at the time of the fire."

Accompanying the proof of loss filed by Lauman and constituting a part thereof, relating to item 2, was a schedule of garments lost, together with the owners' names and the amounts claimed by each. We do not consider it necessary to set out this schedule here. Further reference thereto will be made when we come to consider appellant's second point.

It appears that this class of insurance is exceedingly hazardous, and for that reason plaintiff had experienced considerable trouble in keeping his property insured, having had several policies issued to him by Horton & Son, an insurance firm with offices in Pasadena, as agent of various insurance companies. In our opinion no other reference to these "other" policies is necessary.

The policy under consideration contained the following provision:

"This policy may be canceled at any time, without tender of unearned portion of premium, by the company by giving five (5) days' written notice of cancellation to the insured and to any mortgagee or other party to whom, with the written consent of the company, this policy is made payable, in which case the company shall, upon surrender of the policy or relinquishment of liability thereunder, refund the excess of paid premium above the pro rata premium for the expired term." (Italics ours.)

On June 1, 1917, Horton & Son—not Spinning, the issuing agent—wrote Lauman as follows:

"Kindly return us Security policy No. 2064319 and the Concordia policy No. 30804, because both of these companies have ordered their policies canceled. Kindly give this matter prompt attention, as we wish to return these two policies back to the companies at once. * * * In our letter of the 29th we mentioned the National as one of the companies which had canceled off, but this was an error. We should have stated the Security and the Concordia."

This letter was mailed in Pasadena at 6:30 p. m., June 1, 1917, and delivered to Lauman the next day. As we have already seen, the fire occurred on June 5, 1917.

On this appeal appellant contends: (1) That at the time of the fire the policy here involved had been canceled; and (2) that there was no proof of value as to the articles embraced in item 2 covered by the policy. To support the first contention, appellant argues that the firm of Horton & Son was the agent of plaintiff Lauman, "with power to receive notice of cancellation." If this be so, and such purported notice of cancellation was given within time, then on this phase of the case our decision must be for appellant. The question, therefore, resolves itself into two divisions: (1) Was Horton & Son the agent of plaintiff Lauman with power to receive notice of cancellation and to cancel the policy which is the basis of this suit; and (2) if so, was the purported notice given in time?

[1-3] It will be borne in mind that the agent issuing this particular policy of insurance was not Horton & Son, but C. P. Spinning. The record here shows that under date of May 25, 1917, a special agent of the defendant company—R. L. McCulloch—wrote to Spinning as follows:

"Kindly cancel Concordia policy No. 30804, Roy A. Lauman, assured, covering on cleaning and dyeing establishment at No. 2190 East Eleventh street, Los Angeles, California, and relieve the company of all liability thereunder within the time specified in the policy contract. I have already declined this risk four different times, and in order not to do the assured or your office an injustice I have made a reinspection to-day and find no change. I am sorry to disturb this line, and trust that it will cause you no inconvenience."

Upon receiving this letter, Spinning showed it to Mr. A. T. Horton, of the firm of Horton & Son. Thereupon Horton stamped across the page of the "daily" containing entries with respect to the policy in question, the word "Canceled." The "daily" referred to in this case is an abbreviation of the phrase "Daily Report," as used in the parlance of insurance agents. The "Daily Report" is a blank upon which the transactions, if any, that may have been had in connection with a given policy are entered. When a policy is written it is usually delivered to the assured, and a record thereof, together with all "riders" attached thereto, is kept by the agent in a book known as the "policy register." The "Daily Report" is a record of the same transaction, and theoretically, at least, is supposed to be mailed on the same day to the home office of the company. Such "daily" contains the report of that day for the one policy only, as issued, modified, or canceled, as the case may be. The "daily" in the transaction in question was not that of any company for which Horton's firm was acting as agent. Under these circumstances, by what authority did Horton perform this act? Other than the showing of the letter of May 25, 1917, to Horton, nothing was done by Spinning to bring notice of the cancellation of said policy to the plaintiff Lauman. The letter of June 1, 1917, was written and mailed by Horton & Son to, and received by, Lauman, as hereinbefore set forth. If we thought that Horton & Son had authority to receive notice of cancellation, and to cancel the policy, then we doubtless should hold that the letter of the special agent to Spinning, of date May 25, 1917, and by Spinning shown to Horton, was a sufficient notice of cancellation, regardless of Horton & Son's letter of June 1, 1917, to plaintiff, just referred to.

Appellant attempted to prove by the witness Spinning that, at the time Horton placed the word "Canceled" on the "daily," he (Spinning) "believed that Horton or Horton & Son, had the right to receive notices of cancellation," by asking him if "he thought and was of the opinion or belief that Horton & Son had the right to cancel the policy of insurance," and also if he "believed that Horton & Son, or the Mr. Horton that 'put that cancellation there,' had authority to cancel that policy"—to all of which questions objections were interposed and by the court sustained. Error is predicated upon each of such rulings.

The record shows that Spinning was employed as a bookkeeper by Horton & Son, and that he was conversant with the practice and custom of the firm in the matter of the cancellation of insurance policies—which was that in every case the assured was given notice of cancellation. Indeed, Mr. Horton himself corroborated Spinning in this regard, and goes somewhat further when he testifies:

"Our custom was first to protect the assured in some other company, and to notify him by either sending him a new policy or advising him that we could not replace it, and request the return of the other policy; and when the other policy came back, or when the notice was duly given to him of the cancellation, then was the time that we stamped that 'Canceled.'" (Italics ours.)

Horton further testified that he maintained the foregoing practice in every instance. Under these circumstances Horton & Son were mere brokers, and, being such, were without authority to accept notice of cancellation. Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 83 Cal.

246, 23 Pac. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233. This record contains nothing which brings Horton & Son within the purview of section 2300 of the Civil Code. "The fact that an agent was employed to place insurance does not make him an agent to cancel the policy on behalf of the owner of the property." Cronenwett v. Iowa Underwriters, etc., 186 Pac. 824.

It is contended by appellant that—

"The facts proven conclusively show that Horton was the agent of plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining policies of insurance and to receive notices of and agree to cancellation of policies."

But with this we are not able to agree. When the plaintiff Lauman was being cross-examined by defendant's counsel he was asked the following questions, and made the following answers:

"Q. Did you tell him [Horton] to what amount to keep the insurance up? A. I asked him to place $1,000 in garment insurance. Q. You told him to keep it insured to the extent of $2,500, didn't you? A. $1,500 on building and equipment and $1,000 garment insurance. Q. And you told him to keep you insured to that extent? A. Most assuredly, if he could; they cannot always keep it. They do it to the best of their ability, I presume, but policies are sometimes canceled, and it is hard to place insurance."

Standing alone, this might support the broad assertion of appellant; but, viewed in the light of the whole testimony, we do not feel at liberty to disturb the finding of the learned trial court that—

"It is not true that on the 25th day of May, 1917, the defendant duly or regularly, or at all, notified the plaintiffs, or either of them, in writing, or at all, that all liability under said policy of insurance on behalf of the defendant to said plaintiffs would cease and determine within five days after the receipt of such notice," and "that it is not true that said, or any such, notice, was received by the plaintiffs, or either of them, on May 27, 1917, or at all."

The facts in the case of Ferrar v. Western Assurance Co., 30 Cal. App. 489, 159 Pac. 609, 611, to which our attention is called, were very different from those in the case at bar, in that in the case cited there was nothing to cause a conflict of ideas or opinion on the question of authority of the insurance agent to keep up the insurance, etc., and the court there found that both the evidence and the "course of dealing" supported the conclusion there reached. In the instant case the evidence, taken as a whole, amply supports the finding of the trial court, and there is no "course of dealing" established, except that which is in direct conflict to the position taken by defendant, as we shall presently see.

Under these conditions we fail to see any basis for the questions objected to. There is absolutely nothing upon which Spinning could base an opinion which would justify a conclusion on his part that Horton, or Horton & Son, had authority to receive notice of cancellation for plaintiff Lauman of any policy, except as provided by the terms of the policy and in accordance with the custom and practice of the office. Indeed, Horton's act in reference to the policy here involved was a departure from that custom; and certainly there is nothing in this record which can be construed as a "course of dealing" to authorize such. The letter of June 1, 1917, referred to above, we think speaks in stentorian tones in support of plaintiff's contention, and is a mute witness which, in our opinion, corroborates the evidence of both Horton and Spinning on this point. Especially does it point to the fact that on that date Horton & Son did not themselves believe that they had any authority to receive notice of cancellation or to cancel the policy, except by following the usual custom of the office and according to the terms of the policy. It must be obvious that had Horton & Son believed that the firm, or any member thereof, possessed such authority, there was no occasion whatever for the writing of that letter.

Another significant fact in this case is that defendant nowhere in this record makes any attempt to show an express or direct statement or action by plaintiff authorizing Horton, or Horton & Son, to accept notice of or to agree to a cancellation; and, as we have already seen, there is a complete absence of any evidence which would authorize the departure from the regular custom and practice of the office which was proven in this case. We think the court was correct on the rulings in question.

The record further shows that Spinning, as regards the Concordia agency, was an independent operator, and that the firm of Horton & Son was acting as broker for him. As such brokers, Horton & Son had no authority, as we have seen, to issue or cancel any Concordia policy. Under such conditions, the mere act of placing the impression of a rubber stamp "Canceled" upon Spinning's "daily" by Horton, as already referred to, was unavailing. As to both the Concordia company and plaintiff Lauman, Horton, in a legal sense, was a mere meddler or interloper. We have looked in vain for any evidence to prove the authority, ostensible or otherwise, of Horton & Son to receive notice of cancellation or to cancel any policy of insurance, particularly with respect to the policy in question. Admittedly, the only thing Spinning did was to show Horton the letter of May 25, 1917, to which we have already adverted.

If we assume that Horton & Son was in fact Lauman's agent, then we are confronted with the query: Was this letter which they mailed June 1, 1917, to Lauman a compliance with the terms of the policy as a notice of cancellation? Manifestly not. As we understand it, the rule is:

"That an agency to procure insurance is ended when the policy is procured and delivered to the principal, and the agent has no power after the policy is so delivered to consent to a cancellation, or to accept notice of an intended cancellation by the insurer, and evidence of a usage to give notice to a broker is inadmissible where the policy requires notice to the insured." 14 R. C. L. § 189; Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., supra.

For these reasons it follows, we think, that Horton, or Horton & Son, were not the agents, or agents with authority, to receive notice of cancellation, and, no such notice having ever been given to plaintiff, that the policy was in full force and effect at the time of the fire.

It further occurs to us that the defense in this action—the claim that the policy was canceled, and hence void at the time of the fire—is clearly the result of an afterthought. In view of the recognition by the special agent of the company of the existence and vitality of the policy in question, admitting, as he did, the company's liability as to items 1 and 3 thereof, we cannot escape this conclusion. Had the company considered the policy canceled, then it doubtless would have taken the position that there was nothing to negotiate, and denied all liability. This it did not do.

[4] Appellant next urges that there was no testimony introduced as to the value, at the time of the fire, of the goods destroyed, and, as to a number of the claims presented to and paid or assumed by plaintiff, we think this is true. As to this the policy provides that—

"The company will not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the interest of the insured in the property at the time of the loss or damage; nor exceeding what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with material of like kind and character."

Some of the claims are so supported by the evidence of witnesses as to the articles lost, and the value, etc., of such articles at the time of the fire, but others are not in evidence at all, unless it be conceded that the schedule to which we have already referred be evidence of that fact. It is not so conceded by us. We quote the evidence which was offered by plaintiff in support of his contention in one case, and which is fairly illustrative of a number of cases of claims allowed, paid or assumed by him:

"Q. I show you receipt for $85.00 signed R. L. Brown. Was he a customer of yours? A. Yes. Q. Did he make a claim on you? A. Yes. Q. Did you pay him $85? A. Yes."

It occurs to us that no discussion is necessary to convince any one that upon such showing the value of the articles referred to in the claims in question was not proven as of the time of the fire, or any other time. It is true the policy contains the following provision:

"* * * And (provided the insured shall be liable by law for loss or damage thereto or shall have specifically assumed liability therefor) this insurance shall also cover merchandise held in trust or on commission, or left for storage or repairs"

—but we do not think that by virtue of this alone, without any showing of value, and notwithstanding the good faith of the insured in paying certain of the claims so presented, and in assuming liability for the payment of others, the insured is entitled to recover under his policy in the absence of such proof. In our opinion, if it be conceded that, at the time the claims were presented by the various claimants to Lauman, the value of the various articles so claimed to have been destroyed in the fire was fixed, so far as plaintiffs are concerned, still such condition would not obviate the necessity of proving such value at the trial, otherwise the court would have no legal evidence to support its findings in that respect.

Respondent insists that—

"With very few exceptions Lauman did not pay any claim for the full amount thereof; the testimony shows that as a result of his investigations, negotiations, and dealings the several claims were settled for less than their original amounts. This necessarily implies and imports negotiations and inquiries and investigations as to the value of the articles lost, and consequently is evidence of value, if it does not absolutely establish the value of the several articles."

It is also contended by respondent that—

"In addition to the testimony which has been set out in the foregoing pages, proofs of loss were received in evidence, sworn to and verified by Lauman, as to the correctness of the values set opposite the various items. In addition, also, we have the uncontradicted testimony of Lauman that the data, and particularly the schedules of goods lost in the fire, were true and correct, and correctly showed the sound value and loss."

Upon examination of the transcript we find the schedule referred to offered by defendant and received in evidence over plaintiffs' objection. In the absence of evidence indicating otherwise, these "proofs" were offered by the defendant, and received by the court in support of defendant's defense, and not to support plaintiffs' case; defendants having stated that it was cross-examination as to the fact whether or not proof of loss was made. The schedule in question is "Defendant's Exhibit A." For illustrative purposes, we set forth the first line thereof only:

"1 Suit White Williams $15.00"

There are 28 other items designated in the same way. At the top of this sheet appears the following:

"The following amounts were paid by the Imperial Dye House—Roy R. Lauman, Prop., for clothing destroyed by fire on June 5, 1917."

As a part of the same exhibit was another schedule, at the top of which appeared the following:

"The following amounts were claimed from the Imperial Dye House, Roy R. Lauman, Prop., for clothing destroyed by fire June 5, 1917."

Below this are 27 items, the first of which is as follows:

"1 3 piece tailored suit
1 overcoat
1 lady's blue pleated dress—Mr. & Mrs. John H. Walsh.....$72.50"

On each of these schedules nothing appears to designate what the columns stand for, except as we may conjecture. Each of the schedules is sworn to by Lauman, but nothing is said in either of them as to value of any or all of the items referred to, at the time of the fire or at any other time. This we consider essential. Lion Fire Ins. Co. v. Starr, 71 Tex. 733, 12 S. W. 45; Home Ins. Co. v. Bank, 88 Tenn. 369, 12 S. W. 915. While the witness Lauman was on the stand he testified on the matter now under consideration as follows:

"Q. You have heretofore, and in response to the demands and requirements of the defendant company, furnished them certain data and information in the way of schedules, have you not? A. Yes. Q. In connection with your proofs of loss? A. Yes. Q. I will ask you if that information, that data, and those schedules and proofs of loss, were true at the time you furnished them, according to your best knowledge, information, and belief. A. At the time they were furnished to the best of my knowledge and belief as correct."

So far as we have been able to discover—and we have read practically all of the testimony, and not only alone that to which our attention has been called—there is not one word of evidence showing the value of any item to which we now refer. It is true there is evidence of value by the owners of some of the articles destroyed; but there is no evidence which will support the findings as to the full amount found by the court in favor of plaintiffs. Appellant cites, and correctly, too, we think, many items claimed which may have been included in the findings and judgment, in reference to which there was no legal evidence as to the value thereof, either at or about the time of the loss, or at any time. On the other hand, respondents, in answer to this contention, cited many items where the proof was sufficient with respect thereto. This latter condition, however, does not overcome the want of such proof as to the items referred to by appellant.

[5] The finding, in the case of item 2 of the policy is for a lump sum of $1,000, and we have no way of ascertaining what items went into its making, etc. The total amount of claims paid and assumed by Lauman is, as we have seen, $1,326.59; and items, the evidence in reference to which we have examined and fail to find any value proven, bring that total considerably below the amount found by the trial court to be due plaintiffs. This court, having no authority to make findings, can only reverse the judgment. Our attention is called by respondents to the following cases as supporting their contention that the proofs and schedules so introduced by defendant were proper evidence of value, viz.: Moore v. Protection Ins. Co., 29 Me. 97, 48 Am. Dec. 514; Cheever v. Scottish, etc. Ins. Co., 86 App. Div. 328, 83 N. Y. Supp. 730; Wooldridge v. Ins. Co., 69 Mo. App. 413; Bini v. Smith, 36 App. Div. 463, 55 N. Y. Supp. 842—but we consider none of these in point.

The case of Moore v. Protection Ins. Co., it is contended, holds that proofs and schedules there offered and received were offered to show the cost and value of the articles therein set forth, and, having been received, that they constituted legal evidence of such value. We do not understand this to be the holding of that case. There the question at issue was, not the value of the goods, etc., destroyed by fire, but whether the plaintiff was guilty of fraudulent conduct and false swearing. All books of account, invoices, etc., as well as the goods for which payment was sought under the policy, were destroyed by the fire. In his preliminary proofs the plaintiff there had estimated the value of the goods so destroyed at $2,800. After trial the jury found for plaintiff in the sum of $1,853. The defendant company in that case relied upon such verdict as proof of its contention of false swearing on the part of plaintiff therein. The court held, contrary to defendant's contention, that the estimate of the value of the goods in the store at the time of their destruction was only a matter of judgment on the part of plaintiff, and that his judgment of the value of the property lost—which, to all intents and purposes, was what the preliminary proofs and schedules amounted to—might properly be considered with all the other evidence upon the same question. It is true that this defense was urged by defendant here; but that is not the question which we are now considering.

In the case of Cheever v. Scottish, etc., Ins. Co. the lists referred to showed, among other things, the place of purchase, the purchase price and a statement of the time the articles had been used, as a basis for discounting the figures, and the witness in that case testified that she believed that 25 per cent. discount, on an average, would give the cash value of the articles at the time of the fire. Not even one of these elements is to be found in many of the items found in the proofs and schedules or the testimony of any of the witnesses who testified with regard to the claims now under discussion. According to the case under consideration, the holding was that the lists referred to "were not evidence that the things were in fact there, but when she testified that the lists were correct at the time she made them, and that the articles were actually in the hotel at the time, it was not error to admit the lists as having been testified to by her, and the facts given in connection with these lists formed the basis for the jury in estimating the value of the property destroyed."

In the case of Wooldridge v. Ins. Co., Mrs. Wooldridge was the only witness who testified as to the value of the property consumed by the fire. The court there says:

"She was unable to call to memory all of the articles or their value that were burned, but she constantly referred to the formal proofs of loss as containing a correct list and the true value of the articles lost by the fire. Those proofs were before the court and jury, and the defendant, under the circumstances, had the opportunity and the right to cross-examine her on these values, as shown by the proofs of loss, if it had so desired. We are not able to say that there was a lack of proof on this point."

In the case of Bini v. Smith, the court did not hold that the introduction of proofs of loss without other evidence was sufficient to prove value, but, on the contrary, said:

"They are not evidence for that purpose, and we do not understand that the appellant makes any such claim, or that the proofs of loss were introduced for that purpose."

There was in that case evidence that the building had cost more than $7,000, and that the household furniture had cost $639. What the court did hold there was that the cost of the property is some evidence of its value. The defense at the trial in that case was that the policy was issued without authority of the defendant, and without consideration—that is, payment of premium—and that about four months after its issue it was duly canceled in accordance with its terms. The policy required the assured, in case of fire, to furnish the underwriters, as part of the proofs of loss, a statement of the "quantity and cost of each article" and the "cash value of each item"; and there was evidence that the proofs of loss had been duly furnished, but were returned by the company solely upon the ground that the premium had not been paid, and that the policy had been canceled for that reason. Under these conditions the court held that "such specific objection waived all other objections to the proofs of loss." The recitals contained in the proofs of loss being supported by the testimony of the witness above referred to, as to the value of the building and household furniture, and in view of the further fact that the proofs of loss were received in evidence without objection, the court held that the proofs were competent, "not to afford proof of cost or value, but to refresh the memory of the witness, and the receipt in evidence of the proofs of loss was practically equivalent to an answer that the cost was the amount stated in them." (Italics ours.) There is nothing like this in the reference to the items now under consideration in the case at bar.

This being true, we are unable to agree with respondents in their said contention. These proofs of loss were therefore properly received as evidence, for the reason and purpose already stated, but for nothing else. They do not purport to show the value of any of the items now under consideration.

[6] We may also add that—

"The preliminary proofs of loss are never admissible at the trial as evidence of the fact of loss, or the amount thereof." Home Ins. Co. v. Bank, supra; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Stibbe, 46 Md. 302; Breckinridge v. Ins. Co., 87 Mo. 62; Hiles v. Ins. Co., 65 Wis. 585, 27 N. W. 348, 56 Am. Rep. 637.

What we have said, of course, does not apply to items 1 and 3 of the policy, for the reason, as we have already seen, that these were admitted by the company. Only for the insufficiency of the evidence to support the second item of the policy, the judgment would be sustained.

No other point urged need be considered.

Judgment reversed.

WALL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR RIVERSIDE COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 3367.)

1. Appearance ⟸19(4)—Nonresident submits himself to jurisdiction by filing demurrer.

Nonresident defendant, by filing demurrer to complaint on ground that court had no jurisdiction of his person, submitted his person to the jurisdiction of the court.

2. Certiorari ⟸5(1)—Will not lie to review order quashing service of summons and sustaining demurrer.

Certiorari will not lie to review order quashing service of summons and sustaining demurrer, in view of adequate remedy by appeal, since appealable judgment might have been entered upon demurrer.

Application for certiorari by Sarah J. Wall against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for Riverside County and Hon. J. W. Curtis, Acting Judge of said Court, to review an order of the court quashing demurrer. Writ discharged.

D. B. Chapin, of Riverside, and W. W. Little, of Salt Lake City, Utah, for petitioner.

A. Aird Adair, of Riverside, for respondents.

WELLER, J. By this proceeding petitioner seeks to review the action of the superior court of Riverside county. On August 19, 1919, a complaint was filed in that court, naming John J. Wall as a defendant. Summons was served on defendant Wall personally in Riverside county on April 28, 1920. On May 5, 1920, defendant Wall gave notice of his special appearance for the sole purpose of moving to quash the service of summons, and filed therewith notice of motion to set aside the service of summons on the ground that he was a nonresident of the state of California, and, at the time of the service of summons on him, was but temporarily in this state for the purpose of attending the trial of a civil action to which he was a party. The notice of motion was accompanied by an affidavit setting forth the circumstances of his visit to California, as above indicated. At the same time Wall served and filed a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of his person, in that it appeared upon the face of the complaint that he was a resident of the state of Nevada. On May 18th the court, after argument, granted the motion to quash the service of summons and sustained the demurrer to the complaint.

[1, 2] That by filing the demurrer to the complaint defendant Wall submitted his person to the jurisdiction of the court there can be no doubt, and the court erred in its action. McDonald v. Agnew, 122 Cal. 448, 55 Pac. 125; Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317; American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, 164 Cal. 327, 128 Pac. 921. But petitioner cannot take advantage of this error by certiorari, for an adequate remedy exists aside from this proceeding. Judgment might have been entered on the demurrer, and an appeal would lie from such judgment.

Writ discharged.

DE LA CUESTA v. ARMSTRONG HOLDINGS CO. (Civ. 3417.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 12, 1920.)

1. Brokers ⟸40—Contract in form of option held agreement to pay commission for procuring purchaser.

Contract giving plaintiff option to purchase defendant's ranch within specified period for a fixed cash price or on terms acceptable to defendant, and providing for payment to plaintiff of commission on purchase of ranch by plaintiff or plaintiff's assignee, held to entitle plaintiff to commission on sale of ranch to purchaser procured by plaintiff, the contract being not merely an option, but an agreement to pay plaintiff a commission for making a sale of the property, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1860, 1864, and Civ. Code, § 1654.

2. Contracts ⟸162—Intent determined from contract as a whole, where provisions inconsistent.

Where two provisions of a contract standing alone are inconsistent, the contract will be construed by determining the general intent of the parties from the contract as a whole.

3. Contracts ⟸170(1)—Admission considered in ascertaining whether contract imposed liability.

That party to contract admitted liability thereunder is a strong circumstance to be considered in determining whether contract imposed such liability.

4. Brokers ⟸57(2)—Entitled to commission, though owner thereafter negotiated with purchaser for more favorable terms.

Broker, who procured purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase, by exchange, the principal's property on terms satisfactory to principal, was entitled to his commission, though principal, after acknowledging broker's services and recognizing his right to agreed compensation, negotiated with purchaser for more agreeable terms.

5. Brokers ⟸50—Entitled to commission for procuring purchaser within required period, though deal consummated thereafter.

Broker who, within required period, procured purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase on terms satisfactory to owner, was entitled to commission, though deal was not fully consummated until after expiration of such period because of owner's negotiations for more favorable terms.

6. Brokers ⟸41—Owner dealing with purchaser procured liable for commission.

Owner, having made deal with purchaser procured by broker, and having assured broker that he would pay broker his commission, cannot refuse to pay commission on ground that his contract with broker was an option to broker providing for payment of commission only in the event of sale to broker himself or his assignee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Edward De La Cuesta against the Armstrong Holdings Company. From judgment on order sustaining general demurrer to amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, and J. F. Frick, of Lompoc, for appellant.

Kuster & Salisbury and S. A. McNeil, all of Los Angeles, and Richards, Heaney & Price, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment entered upon an order sustaining a general demurrer to the amended complaint, without leave to amend, plaintiff conceding that no amendment could be made.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that the defendant, a corporation, was the owner of a 3,200-acre ranch in the county of Santa Barbara, together with the improvements, stock, and necessary equipment. Being desirous of securing the services of plaintiff to negotiate an exchange or sale of said property with a party known to plaintiff, but unknown to defendant, it employed plaintiff to negotiate the sale or exchange of the ranch property, at a valuation of $178,000, to be consummated upon terms acceptable to the defendant, promising to pay plaintiff a commission of 5 per cent. upon such valuation for procuring a person or party ready, willing, and able to take over the property. It promised, and did send to plaintiff from its office in Los Angeles, a memorandum of the terms of this employment, subscribed by it. By the terms of the writing the defendant purports to give to the plaintiff the exclusive right and option to purchase the property, together with all farm and ranch equipment, including stock on said premises, for the price of $178,000 cash, or upon terms acceptable to the board of directors of said company. Other terms of the sale were set out. It is further specified in the instrument that, in case plaintiff, or any one to whom he may assign the option, purchase the property within the period granted, the defendant will pay to plaintiff or to his order a commission of 5 per cent. of the aforesaid cash valuation of $178,000. No consideration was received by defendant for the option, except plaintiff's agreement to sell or exchange the property.

Within the time specified, plaintiff produced the party willing and able to purchase the ranch, who offered to transfer and convey to defendant real and personal property of the agreed value of $178,000, in exchange for the property of the defendant. This offer was satisfactory and acceptable to the defendant, and it so informed the plaintiff, at the same time stating to him that he had complied with the terms of the memorandum agreement, and had earned, and was entitled, upon the consummation of said exchange, to the compensation provided to be paid to plaintiff by the defendant, according to its terms. Defendant informed the plaintiff, however, that it desired to further negotiate with the intending purchaser for the purpose, if possible, of securing from him the transfer of additional personal property in the place and stead of certain portions of the real property offered in exchange for its property. The defendant delayed the closing of the transaction until after the time specified in the agreement, through no fault or neglect of plaintiff, and continued to negotiate with the party produced by plaintiff, and the exchange was finally consummated. The value of the real and personal property conveyed, and transferred, to the defendant was the sum of $178,000.

On these facts plaintiff claims to have earned and to be entitled to his commission, he having produced the person ready, willing, and able to, and who did, take the property on terms satisfactory, and agreed to, by the defendant. The respondent's theory is that the memorandum or agreement amounted only to an option granted to the plaintiff, and, being an instrument in writing, superseded any prior oral negotiations had between the parties, and that consequently the allegations of the complaint as to what preceded the execution of the writing must be disregarded; no fraud being claimed. It relies upon the well-known principle of law that parol evidence cannot be admitted to vary, or add to, the terms of a contract plain and unambiguous on its face. Its argument, in effect, is that the agreement is one merely for the sale of the property upon terms acceptable to the defendant, with a provision for a discount of 5 per cent. in the event of a sale to plaintiff or his assignee. Appellant's theory is that the agreement was both an option and an authorization to sell upon commission. His theory is supported by the authorities. Mitchel v. Gray, 8 Cal. App. 423, 429, 97 Pac. 160; Burt v. Stringfellow, 45 Utah, 207, 216, 143 Pac. 234.

[1] We are of the opinion that the plaintiff has stated a cause of action, and that the demurrer was improperly sustained. The memorandum of the agreement, entered into between the parties, is not so clear and unambiguous as to be readily understood without some explanation of the situation of the parties at the time it was entered into. The writing prepared and executed by the defendant (omitting descriptive matter and portions immaterial to this discussion) is as follows:

"For value received and for the time hereinafter stated, the Armstrong Holdings Company hereby gives to Edward de la Questa the exclusive right and option to purchase the property of said company located in the county of Santa Barbara * * * together with all farm and ranch equipment, including stock now on said premises, comprising approximately 3,200 acres, for the price of one hundred seventy-eight thousand dollars ($178,000) cash, or upon terms acceptable to the board of directors of said company. * * *

"In case Edward de la Questa, or any one to whom he may assign this option purchase said property within the time hereinafter specified, said Armstrong Holdings Company agrees to pay said Edward de la Questa, or to his order, a commission of five per cent. (5%) of the aforesaid cash consideration of one hundred seventy-eight thousand dollars ($178,000). This option to remain in full force and effect for the period of twenty (20) days from date and after that time to be void and of no force or effect."

The contract in this case was executed by the defendant in favor of the plaintiff. When different constructions of the provisions of an agreement are otherwise equally proper, that is to be taken which is most favorable to the party in whose favor the provision was made. Code Civ. Proc. § 1864. In cases of uncertainty the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, § 1654. In the instant case the defendant prepared the agreement. We do not need to rely solely upon these technical rules of interpretation, however, in arriving at a conclusion in this matter. Other controlling principles applicable to the construction of contracts afforded a more satisfactory determination of the question.

[2] In the first instance, the agreement purports to give the plaintiff an option to purchase the ranch property of the defendant, within a definite period, for a fixed cash price, or upon terms the subject of future treaty, but acceptable to the defendant. By the following provisions, it is stipulated that upon the purchase by the plaintiff, or an assignee, the defendant will pay plaintiff a commission upon the cash valuation. A sale of property outright, at a fixed price, to one having an option to purchase is one thing. A payment of a commission to one authorized to make a sale is another proposition. Standing alone, the two provisions of the agreement are inconsistent. It remains, therefore, to determine the general intent of the parties, from the contract as a whole. Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Pacific Surety Co. (Sup.) 189 Pac. 273. Read together, and in the light of the circumstances under which it is alleged the contract was made, and the situation of the parties to it (Code Civ. Proc. § 1860), they harmonize. To quote from the Utah decision, a case strongly in point:

"It seems to us that it was the intention the parties to the contract in question to grant the appellant a fixed time within which he had the * * * right either to purchase or sell the property at the price stipulated in the contract, and if he did either he was to receive 5 per cent. of the selling price as a commission." Burt v. Stringfellow, supra.

This construction, we are satisfied, coincides with the intention of the parties in the instant case.

[3] Respondent's present contention, that the appellant was merely granted an option to purchase the property, is destroyed by the averments of the amended complaint, admittedly true for the purpose of considering the demurrer, to the effect that when the plaintiff, within the time specified, produced the party, then and there ready, willing, and able to purchase the property, the defendant informed plaintiff that the property offered in exchange for its holdings was satisfactory and acceptable to it, at the same time informing plaintiff that he had complied with the terms of the agreement, and had earned and was entitled, upon the consummation of the exchange, to the compensation provided for in the agreement. Its own construction of its liability in the matter is a strong circumstance to be considered in arriving at a proper interpretation of the agreement. Union Oil Co. v. Stewart, 158 Cal. 149, 155, 110 Pac. 313, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 567; Dollar v. International Banking Co., 10 Cal. App. 83, 87, 101 Pac. 34.

[4, 5] The plaintiff, having, within the time limited, and under the terms of his employment, produced to the defendant a person ready, willing, and able to purchase, by exchange, the property of the defendant upon satisfactory terms, was entitled to his commission. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 521, 137 Pac. 254; Levy v. Dusenbery, 32 Cal. App. 411, 417, 163 Pac. 231. The fact that the defendant, after duly acknowledging the plaintiff's services in the matter, and recognizing his right to be paid the agreed compensation therefor, negotiated with the purchaser for more agreeable terms of the exchange, does not, in our opinion, change the situation of the parties. It still remains that the plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale. Briggs v. Hall, 24 Cal. App. 586, 588, 141 Pac. 1067; Daniel v. Calkins, 31 Cal. App. 514, 518, 160 Pac. 1082. The delay in closing the sale, until after the time limited by the contract, was caused by the desire of the defendant to procure more satisfactory terms, and does not destroy plaintiff's right to his commission. Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 159, 99 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328. The purchaser was found, and negotiations were begun within the time limit. It is immaterial that they were not fully consummated until afterwards. Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 678, 79 Pac. 354.

[6] Respondent urges, in support of the judgment, that the plaintiff has not exercised his option either by purchasing, or offering to purchase, the property for himself, or assigning the option to another. As we have pointed out, the agreement is more than an option. It is also, and was intended by the parties to be, an agreement to pay the plaintiff a commission for making a sale of the property. He assumed that he had performed the agreement. The defendant acknowledged that he had done so, and gave him the assurance that he would be paid the agreed compensation. It gave countenance to the construction placed upon the contract by the plaintiff, acquiesced in its fulfillment accordingly, received and retained the benefits to be derived therefrom. Under such circumstances it must be held to have waived and abandoned its right to impeach the transaction for some technical omission, after the plaintiff's position has so materially changed. Scott v. Jackson, 89 Cal. 258, 262, 26 Pac. 898.

The judgment is reversed. The action is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to overrule defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint, permitting it to answer thereto within such time as may be proper.

JOSEPH MUSTO SONS-KEENAN CO. v. PACIFIC STATES CORPORATION et al. (Civ. 3295.)

1. Contracts ⟸295(1)—Substantial performance of building contract is sufficient.

Where a building contractor has substantially performed all the essential parts of the contract in good faith, he can recover the contract price, less compensation to the owner for damage resulting from trivial defects and imperfections, due to inadvertence, especially when the owner has received the benefit of the work done.

2. Trial ⟸396(3)—Finding of substantial performance not inconsistent with allegation of performance.

A finding by the trial court that plaintiff had substantially performed in good faith the requirements of a building contract, but allowing defendant damages for trivial defects, is not inconsistent with the allegation of the complaint that plaintiff had fully performed the contract.

3. Trial ⟸398—Finding of full performance controls finding of unimportant defects in work.

If the probative findings that there were trivial defects in the performance of a building contract, for which damages were allowed to the owner, were inconsistent with the ultimate finding of completion of the contract, the latter finding would control.

4. Contracts ⟸322(4)—Evidence held to show substantial performance of marble work contract.

In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, evidence showing performance of a contract for the installation of marble work in a building in conformity with the contract, except as to trivial defects unavoidable in such work, and showing that all work objected to by the architect during its progress was replaced, held to support a finding of substantial performance of the contract.

5. Trial ⟸396(5)—Party not entitled to finding based on evidence later stricken by court.

Defendant cannot object to the refusal to allow damages sustained by uncontradicted testimony of its superintendent, where such testimony was later stricken by the trial court as hearsay.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1056(5)—Allowance of damages for trivial defects held to cure exclusion of evidence.

If it was error to exclude evidence of increased cost of maintaining a marble floor, because of the wide cracks therein, and of the difference in cost between a cement and marble tile floor, the allowance by the court of damages against the contractor for defects must be assumed to cover that item, so as to render the exclusion of the evidence immaterial.

7. Appeal and error ⟸1048(5)—Error held not prejudicial, in view of answers of witness.

Errors in permitting defendant's superintendent of construction to be asked whether he would have issued a certificate at the end of a job, where he permitted marble to be installed without objection at the time, and in permitting a question to be asked as to how many square feet of marble tile were sorted out, was harmless, where the answers to the questions could not have prejudiced defendant.

8. Damages ⟸123—Measure for immaterial defects in building contract is not cost of replacing work.

Where a building contractor substantially performed his contract to install the marble work in a building, the measure of damages for immaterial defects in the work is not the cost of removing and replacing all of the marble work in the building.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Joseph Musto Sons-Keenan Company against the Pacific States Corporation and others, in which the Pacific States Corporation filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and Pacific States Corporation appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Pendleton, of Los Angeles (Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Glen Behymer and Behymer & Craig, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought a decree foreclosing a mechanic's lien for material furnished and labor performed under and pursuant to a contract made with defendant Pacific States Corporation as owner of a structure known and designated as the Merritt Building. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which the defendant Pacific States Corporation appeals.

As appears from the contract attached to and made a part of the complaint, and upon which the claim of lien is based, plaintiff, for the consideration therein specified, undertook and agreed to furnish the material, fabricate, and install in accordance with the specifications therefor the marble work required in the construction of the building, including such extra material and work, which the owner, as provided, might demand, and for all of which said defendant agreed to pay in part as the work progressed, and the balance, 25 per cent. of the agreed price, at the expiration of 35 days after the final completion and acceptance of the work. The work performed under the contract comprised various kinds, some of which was to be paid for upon a basis of cost of material and work of installation, plus a percentage, while other parts thereof were to be done at a fixed price specified in the contract. As alleged by plaintiff and in express terms found by the court, it furnished and installed all the materials called for under the terms of the contract, and performed all labor necessary in the installation thereof, all in accordance with and as required by said contract. As alleged, the total price of the work described in the first count of the complaint was the sum of $46,146.40, upon which said defendant paid the sum of $28,123.36, leaving a balance, after allowing defendant certain discounts of $24.77, of $17,998.27 unpaid, and for which judgment was asked.

While in its answer defendant denied that the work was done in conformity with the terms of the contract, and raised issues as to the amount of the work done in each of the several classes of work specified therein, defendant's chief contention, which is really the only one seriously urged on appeal, is that each of three classes of the work admittedly done, and which comprised nearly the whole of the work called for by the contract, namely: The installation of Colorado yule wainscoting, the tile floors, and verde antique bases were not only imperfect and defective as to material used, in that it was cracked, chipped, broken, and discolored, but also the work of installing the same was not in conformity to the contract, in that for various reasons it was done in an unworkmanlike manner. As to all of such issues the court found adversely to defendant, and, in addition to the finding that plaintiff, as required by the terms of said contract and in conformity therewith, furnished the materials for and performed the necessary labor in installing the same, further found specially upon said several issues as follows:

(1) "That said floor tile and border was installed in such a manner as to substantially conform to each and every of the requirements of the contract, plans, and specifications agreed upon between the Pacific States Corporation and the plaintiff, and the orders and modifications supplementary thereto; that there were some minor or trivial defects in the labor of installing the same, whereby a small portion of said floor tile and border was either chipped, cracked, slightly broken, or otherwise installed in an imperfect manner; that said defects were not pervasive, and did not occur through any bad faith on the part of the contractor, and said defects do not defeat or materially change the object of the contract between said parties, and that said contractor exercised good faith in the execution of said work, and endeavored at all times to comply with the requirements of his contract in that regard; that there was no willful departure by said contractor from the provisions of the contract, plans, and specifications agreed upon between the said contractor and the said Pacific States Corporation, and the said orders and modifications supplementary thereto, and that there was no omission of any of the essential or material parts required to be done and performed by said contract in regard to said floor and border, and that the said contractor has in good faith performed all of the substantive terms of the agreement existing between the said Pacific States Corporation and said contractor in reference to said floor tile and border; that, in discharging its contract relative to the same, plaintiff used exactly the kind and character of materials which were required by the specifications and employed the best labor, and that the imperfections in the said work performed are trivial and can be compensated for by a recoupment for damages, and that the defects in the workmanship of the installation of said floor tile and border arose through accident and inadvertence, and are not such as to defeat or materially change the design embodied in the agreement between the said parties in reference to the said floor tile and border; that the damage sustained by the defendant Pacific States Corporation by reason of the aforementioned defects is the sum of $231.33."

(2) "That said verde antique marble base and all thereof was installed in such a manner as to substantially conform to each and every requirement of the contract, plans, and specifications agreed upon between the Pacific States Corporation and the plaintiff herein, and the orders and modifications supplementary thereto; that there were some minor defects in the fabrication and installation thereof, whereby a portion of the verde antique marble base did not possess as high a polish as required by the agreements aforementioned or was scratched or otherwise imperfect; that said defects were not pervasive and did not occur through any bad faith on the part of the contractor, but that said contractor exercised good faith and endeavored at all times to comply with the requirements of its contract in this regard; that there was no willful departure by said contractor from the provisions of the contract, plans and specifications relative to said verde antique marble base as agreed upon between the said contractor and the said Pacific States Corporation and the orders and modifications supplementary thereto, and no omission of any of the material or essential parts required to be done and performed by said contract in regard to said verde antique marble base, and the said contractor has in good faith performed all the substantive terms of the agreement existing between said Pacific States Corporation and the said contractor in reference to the said verde antique marble base; that in discharging its contract relative to the same plaintiff used exactly the kind and character of materials which were required by the specifications and employed the best labor, and that the imperfections in the work performed are trivial and can be compensated for by recoupment for damages, the defects in the workmanship and fabrication of said verde antique marble base arising through accident or inadvertence and not being such as to defeat or materially change the design embodied in the agreement between the said parties;" and that the damages sustained by defendant due to said defects is the sum of $102.

(3) "That said Colorado yule marble wainscoting was installed in such a manner as to substantially conform to each and every of the requirements of the contract, plans, and specifications agreed upon between the Pacific States Corporation and the plaintiff and the orders and modifications supplementary thereto; that there were some minor or trivial defects in the labor of installing the same, whereby a small portion of said Colorado yule wainscoting was either chipped, cracked, slightly broken, or otherwise installed in an imperfect manner that said defects were not pervasive, and did not occur through any bad faith on the part of the contractor, and said defects do not defeat or materially change the object of the contract between said contractor and said owner relative to said marble wainscoting, but the said contractor exercised good faith in the execution of said work and endeavored at all times to comply with the requirements of his contract in that regard; that there was no willful departure by said contractor from the provisions of the contract, plans, and specifications agreed upon between the said contractor and the said Pacific States Corporation, and the orders and modifications aforementioned supplementary thereto, and that there was no omission of any of the material or essential parts required to be done and performed by said contract in regard to said marble wainscoting, and that the said contractor has in good faith performed all of the substantive terms of the agreement existing between said Pacific States Corporation and said contractor in reference to said marble wainscoting; that in discharging its contract relative to the same, plaintiff used exactly the kind and character of materials which were required by the specifications and employed the best labor, and that the imperfections in the work performed and imperfections in workmanship are of a minor character and can be compensated for by recoupment for damages, the defects in the workmanship of the installation of said marble wainscoting arising through accident or inadvertence and not being such as to defeat or materially change the design embodied in the agreement between the said parties"; and that the damages sustained by defendant as a result of such defects is the sum of $226.28.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the findings which we have numbered 1, 2, and 3, since they show a substantial performance of the contract only, are inconsistent, not alone with full performance, as alleged in the contract, but likewise inconsistent with the ultimate finding that the work was done in accordance with the terms of the contract, and hence it contends the judgment should be reversed. There is no merit in this point. As to such character of contracts the law is well settled that a substantial performance of all the essential parts thereof, had in good faith, will entitle the contractor to recover the contract price, less compensation to the owner by way of recoupment for any damage resulting from trivial defects and imperfections due to inadvertence and not affecting substantive parts of the contract. This is especially true where, as in this case, the owner has received the benefit of what has been done and is enjoying the fruits of the work. Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 556, 150 Pac. 769; Rischard v. Miller (Sup.) 188 Pac. 50; Collins v. Ramish (Sup.) 188 Pac. 550; Morris v. Hokosona, 26 Colo. App. 251, 143 Pac. 826; Omaha Water Co. v. City of Omaha, 156 Fed. 922, 85 C. C. A. 54.

[2, 3] Since a substantial performance is performance (Rowe v. Gerry, 112 App. Div. 358, 98 N. Y. Supp. 380), and all that is required to sustain an allegation of performance, and since the probative findings referred to show such performance, it follows that, instead of being inconsistent with the allegation of full performance, the findings to that effect are in full accord with and support the same. Even though the probative findings were inconsistent with the ultimate finding of completion in accordance with the contract, the latter would control. Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740.

[4] Appellant's chief contention is that the finding to the effect that plaintiff furnished the materials and performed all labor necessary in the installation thereof in accordance with and as required by the contract is not supported by the evidence. The question as to what constitutes substantial performance is one to be determined in each case, having regard to the circumstances and facts thereof. Collins v. Ramish, supra. In the instant case the building comprises several stories, each of which required tile flooring, marble base, and marble wainscoting. The aggregate of floor tiling was some 35,563 square feet, the contract price of which was $15,422; the marble base installed consisted of 7,312 linear feet, the contract price of which was $7,308; the marble wainscoting comprised 10,935 square feet, the contract price of which was $7,442—making a total for the work installed if done in strict accordance with the specifications, of upwards of $30,000. The installation of the work required the handling, setting, and joining of many thousands of pieces of material, and, as appears from the evidence, it would be impracticable, in view of the fact that the quality of the material was soft, spongy, and easily nicked, to secure a completed job of work where every piece would be absolutely perfect and as laid the width of every joint would be uniform when measured by a hair's breadth. That the arris or edge of some of the pieces where joined was snipped or nicked; that an uncleaned oil spot appeared on some pieces, or another was soiled; that the work was not all properly cleaned and washed down; that one piece did not take as high a polish as another, or did not exactly match it; and other alleged like defects, for all of which the court found that defendant was damaged in the total sum of $469, did not, in our opinion, affect plaintiff's right to recover.

Not only, as found by the court, were such imperfections not pervasive, but where such defects existed in the tiling, pieces of wainscoting, or base, and were so defective as to warrant so doing, they could be removed and new pieces substituted therefor, and where a piece was oil-stained or soiled it could be cleaned, and the allowance made by the court presumably covered the cost of such work. The performance of the work covered many months, during which time a representative of the architect was on the ground, and a superintendent was employed by defendant, whose duty it was to supervise the work as it progressed, and call plaintiff's attention to work which was not done to their satisfaction. Notwithstanding this fact, few complaints were made by either the architect or superintendent, and, where made, the pieces were taken out and others substituted therefor. Not only this, but during the progress of the work the president of defendant repeatedly expressed himself as being well satisfied therewith, and commended plaintiff for the character of work being done.

In our opinion, the question as to whether the contract was substantially performed should be determined upon a view of each class of work considered as a whole; and, so considered, it appears each class of work was done in strict accordance with the design therefor, and the material used was that called for in the specifications, and, save and except imperfections existing, but not pervasive, for which recoupment was allowed to defendant, it, as completed, constituted a substantial performance of the contract. In such a controversy witnesses will differ in taste as to whether one piece of marble matches another, or whether the joints between the pieces are too wide or too narrow, according to their respective tastes and opinions. However this may be, and conceding a conflict of testimony upon the question, it appears from evidence produced on the part of plaintiff that the work as completed was first-class in every particular. As one witness said:

"It is not possible, consistent with first-class workmanhsip in every respect, to avoid on occasion having a slight nick or broken edge in some of the slabs. We polished the slabs of wainscoting * * * to the point where the slabs had as high a polish as it is possible for them to receive, and we polished the verde antique base to the highest degree that that kind of marble could be polished. * * * There are no more flaws or defects in the job on the Merritt Building than there are in any first-class job."

Another witness testified:

"The workmanship and material throughout the Merritt Building, in so far as it related to the marble installed by the plaintiff, was without exception absolutely first-class. * * * I found it to be absolutely in a first-class condition in every respect of material and workmanship."

Other witnesses testified that at numerous times Mr. Merritt, president of defendant, expressed himself as well satisfied with the quality of material and workmanship, in the installation of the marble. Other witnesses, called as experts, gave like testimony to the effect that the installation of the work as completed, both as to material and workmanship, was first class, and could not be better. This testimony, and a great deal more to like effect, which fills the voluminous record, and which might be quoted, is sufficient, notwithstanding evidence to the contrary, to show that the work as completed and taken as a whole, was a first-class job of work, and done in substantial conformity to the specifications, even though it be conceded that some of the pieces of marble might not be in accordance with individual tastes, that some of the pieces of tiling were not so closely joined as to accord with individual ideas as to workmanship, or that, in some cases, small snips and nicks appeared in the edges of pieces of tile or marble.

Appellant cites the case of Oakes v. Barbre, 127 Ill. App. 208, where the work done was the construction of a monument to perpetuate the memory and mark the resting place of the dead, and, claiming that the Merritt Building was intended to be a work of art, insists that the rule applied to the construction of such monuments should be applied in this instance. In the case referred to, however, the court draws a distinction when it says:

"Unlike contracts for the construction of buildings, we are of the opinion the rule of substantial performance is not applicable" to such monuments.

We perceive no reason why a different rule should apply to contracts for work upon the Merritt Building than that applicable to other buildings of like character.

Appellant also cites the case of Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740, where it is said:

"The court cannot say that anything is immaterial which the parties have made material by their contract."

What was there said had reference to the facts of that case, from a reading of which it appears that the contractor willfully deviated from the specifications, in that he used material entirely different from that called for, and, as constructed, the building did not purport to even represent an effort on the part of the contractor, either in material or workmanship, to comply with the contract. In our opinion, the evidence is ample to sustain the findings of probative facts hereinbefore quoted, and, since the facts so found show a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, it follows that no just ground of complaint exists as to the ultimate fact found that plaintiff furnished materials and installed the marble in accordance with the contract.

[5] Appellant directs our attention to a number of alleged minor errors the nature of which is such as to merit little notice. Among these are the following: Defendant alleged that it was damaged by reason of the fact that plaintiff poured grinding compound into the urinals and slop hoppers, which caused a stoppage of the plumbing, necessitating repairs which cost $250, as to which the court found adversely to the defendant. Appellant's contention that the court should have found in its favor upon this issue is based upon the testimony of defendant's superintendent, which it quotes in its brief, and which it claims was not contradicted by any evidence offered by plaintiff. The testimony of this witness, however, appearing later to be hearsay, was, as such, ordered stricken out by the court. The fact that one of plaintiff's employés was charged with the act constituted no evidence in support of the allegation.

[6] Defendant also complains of a ruling of the court in sustaining an objection to the question as to whether or not the condition of the tile floors, due to the joints being of varying width, would affect the expense of the upkeep of the building. Conceding such fact, if it existed, to be an element of damage, it must be deemed to have been covered by the allowance of damage made therefor by the court; and this answer is likewise a sufficient response to the contention that defendant should have been permitted to prove the difference in the cost of a cement floor and a Colorado yule tile floor, since, even conceding that a cement floor would be as serviceable as a tile floor, the less cost of the former could not affect plaintiff's right to recover for the character of floor contracted for by defendant, and which, as found by the court, was substantially performed.

[7] Nor did the court err in overruling defendant's objection to a question put to the witness Austin, where he was asked if he, as superintendent or architect, would have issued a certificate at the end of the job, where he had permitted marble to go in without objection made at the time, to which he replied: "I can't imagine such a condition." Even if this were error, the answer could not have prejudiced the defendant, for the reason that the contract provided that—

"The architects shall have the right to reject any defective material or workmanship, or, should they deem it advisable (owing to lack of time to replace, or other reasons) to accept such defective workmanship or material, a proper deduction is to be made therefor from the contract price."

Nor, conceding the question as to "how many square feet of such tile were sorted out" was immaterial, as it no doubt was, the answer was not prejudicial.

[8] Complaint also is made that the court erred in applying the proper rule for the measure of damages, in support of which it quotes the testimony of its witness John C. Austin, to the effect that, in order to make the work comply strictly with the specifications, it would be necessary to remove and reconstruct the whole work, which would cost $50,000. Not only was this evidence contradicted by testimony offered on the part of plaintiff, but, as will be seen from the authorities cited upon the subject of what constitutes substantial compliance with a contract, the law does not contemplate that the owner shall be compensated in damages for the removal and reconstruction of the work, where the work as completed constitutes a substantial compliance with the contract. As we have seen, the court upon sufficient evidence found that the contractor, in doing the work, acted in good faith and performed it substantially in conformity to the plans and specifications; that while there were some defects and imperfections, by reason of which the value of the work was diminished, they were not pervasive, and defendant could be recouped therefor by an allowance of damages.

An examination of the record discloses no other errors which we deem it necessary to consider.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FOSTER. (Cr. 506.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 17, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1129(3)—Assignments not specifying particular rulings complained of not reviewable.

Assignments, complaining of court's rulings as to certain evidence without specifying particular rulings or pointing out wherein any rulings were erroneous, cannot be reviewed.

2. Criminal law ⟸1129(3)—Court will not search record for errors.

It is not the duty of a reviewing court, upon its own initiative, to search the record to ascertain whether errors had been committed by the trial court.

3. Criminal law ⟸1163(1)—Appellant must show error to have been prejudicial.

It is appellant's duty, not only to point out the errors, but also to show that errors were of such magnitude as to have prejudiced his rights or prevented him from obtaining a fair and impartial trial.

4. Criminal law ⟸1129(3)—Assignments, not specifying misconduct complained of, not reviewable.

Assignment, complaining of misconduct of prosecuting attorney without specifying any particular misconduct, cannot be considered.

5. Criminal law ⇐665(2)—Exception of witness from order excluding other witnesses from courtroom held not error.

In prosecution for attempting to escape from state prison, refusal to exclude from the courtroom the captain of the guard at the prison at the time of the attempted escape, notwithstanding order excluding other witnesses during the trial pending their being called to testify, was not error, being proper for such captain of the guard, who had gathered the facts relating to attempted escape, to remain with district attorney in order to advise him as to the testimony.

6. Criminal law ⇐1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting testimony supported by evidence not disturbed.

Verdict on conflicting testimony supported by the evidence will not be disturbed.

7. Escape ⇐10—Evidence held to sustain conviction for attempting to escape from state prison.

In prosecution of prisoner confined in state prison under Pen. Code, § 106, for attempting to escape in which defendant denied having been one of the convicts who had made the attempt, evidence held to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Jack Foster was convicted of attempting to escape from state prison and from judgment of conviction, and from order denying new trial he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

C. B. Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Sacramento county for the crime of attempting to escape from the state prison at Folsom, in said county, he then being a prisoner confined in said prison for a term less than for life. Pen. Code, § 106. His trial upon said indictment resulted in a verdict of guilty, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order refusing to grant a motion made by him for a new trial.

It appears from the evidence that the locomotive engine which is used in hauling freight cars from the prison to the town of Folsom and there connecting with the Southern Pacific Company's road was, on the 29th day of June, 1919, in charge of a guard named Lucas, whose particular duties then were those of a locomotive engineer on said engine. The fireman of the engine at the time mentioned was a convict named Cody. On the afternoon of said day, while the engine was being used in the prison yard in switching freight cars, the defendant, together with two other convicts, St. Clair and Heath by name, jumped upon the engine and into the cab thereof, and St. Clair, holding a knife over and up against the body of Lucas in a threatening manner, said, "We are going to take a little ride with you, boys," at the same time ordering Lucas to "open up" the engine and start it towards the gate leading into the prison yards. The defendant also had a knife in his hand, and stood on the cab near St. Clair. Lucas opened the throttle and started the engine, but said to the prisoners that it could go no further than the gate because it (the gate) was locked. St. Clair replied: "Go on, anyway," and Lucas permitted the engine to move on, and it struck the gate, breaking it down, and the engine passed through it and about four car lengths beyond the gate, when the engine was stopped. Cody, the fireman, was taken off the engine by the defendant and his companions, and Lucas was ordered by them to alight, which he did, and thereupon with much haste started back to the prison yards in the direction of the gate through which the engine was forced. The prisoners, including the defendants, were promptly halted by the prison guards and confined in the prison.

The foregoing facts are taken from the testimony of the witness, Lucas, the engineer in charge of the engine at the time of the attempted escape. There was other evidence, circumstantial in character, introduced by the people, which was corroborative of the testimony given by Lucas. The cause was not orally argued before this court, but the defendant has filed a brief, which was evidently prepared by himself, although it seems to have the sanction of two lawyers, who immediately following the subscription of the defendant's signature to the document, appear to have subscribed theirs as "His Late Attorneys." The defendant, in his brief, complains in a general way of certain rulings of the court upon the evidence, and charges that errors prejudicial to his rights were thus committed, and also that the district attorney, in his presentation of the case to the jury, was guilty of misconduct which must necessarily have seriously prejudiced him and his case in the minds of the jury. It is further charged that, an order having been made by the court excluding all witnesses from the courtroom during the progress of the trial pending their being called to testify, the court erred in overruling his objection to the order exempting the witness, Capt. Cochrane, an officer of the prison, from the operation of the rule of exclusion.

[1-4] As stated the assignments charging alleged errors in the court's rulings respecting certain evidence are in general language. It is not specifically pointed out what particular rulings are thus objected to or wherein any rulings were erroneous. It is obvious that points so made on appeal cannot be reviewed. It is not the duty of a reviewing court upon its own initiative to search the record of a case to ascertain whether errors had been committed by the trial court in the trial of a case. If there were errors committed in the trial of this case it was the duty of the defendant not only to point out such errors but also to show that the errors so pointed out were of such magnitude as to have prejudiced his rights or prevented him from obtaining a fair and impartial trial. Nor does the defendant in his brief show wherein the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his trial of the case. He merely states generally that the prosecuting officer was guilty of misconduct which resulted in injury to him and his case. If such was the fact the alleged misconduct should have been specifically referred to or brought to the attention of this court by the defendant. As above stated as to the complaint against the court's rulings an assignment of misconduct in such a form cannot be reviewed or, at least, will not be reviewed. In this connection, however, it may be well to state that, notwithstanding that the defendant has failed to specify the particular errors and misconduct of which he has attempted to complain, we have nevertheless given the record careful examination, and that from such examination we have been persuaded to the conviction that his objections as to those matters are groundless.

[5] There is no merit in the complaint that the court abused its discretion in allowing over objection by defendant, Capt. Cochrane to remain in the courtroom during the progress of the trial. The record shows that Cochrane held the position of captain of the guard at the prison at the time of the attempted escape, and the court in overruling defendant's objection to the presence of the captain in the courtroom properly observed that the district attorney was entitled to have by his side for the purpose of consulting about the case as it progressed, any officer of the prison or other person who might be of aid to him in the matter of the marshaling of the proofs. Presumably from his position the duty of a captain of the prison guard on occasions such as the one responsible for this prosecution is to gather the facts and circumstances characterizing the episode, and it was not only proper, but perhaps necessary, that the captain should remain with the district attorney and advise with that official as to what testimony was available to the people.

[6, 7] Following the points above adverted to, the defendant, in his brief, enters upon an extended analysis of the testimony in an effort to show that the verdict was not justified. The argument thus advanced by the defendant would be appropriate before the jury but can have no force before a reviewing court, where the evidence is, upon its face, in sharp conflict, and that produced by the people clearly appears to be sufficient to support the conclusion reached by the jury. There is no inherent weakness or improbability in the testimony presented by the people in support of the charge alleged in the indictment, and if accepted by the jury, as obviously it was, it is fully sufficient, not only to uphold the verdict but to have justified it, notwithstanding the asseveration of the accused under oath and the testimony of other witnesses he presented in purported corroboration thereof, that he was not one of the convicts who jumped into the cab of the engine, and that he did not attempt to make his escape on the occasion referred to in the indictment, but that he only, with a large number of other convicts, upon hearing the commotion in the lower yard of the prison where the engine is used, ran down to the point where the disturbance was going on to gratify his curiosity as to what the cause of the trouble or commotion was.

We conclude that the defendant has failed to shake or disturb the foundation upon which the judgment and the order are planted, and that therefore both the judgment and the order should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 14, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court In Bank Denying Hearing, Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Evidence ⟸324(3)—Statute held not to modify common-law rule that title cannot be shown by common repute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12, does not modify the common-law rule that evidence of common reputation is inadmissible to establish title to real estate, where private rights only are affected, and such subdivision is to be read together with section 1870, subd. 11, which declares when and in what cases evidence of common reputation is admissible.

2. Evidence ⟸324(3) — Common reputation held admissible to prove right to take water from spring.

A claim made to any part of the public domain, or a claim to a right to take water from a stream or a spring that is situated wholly on the public domain, necessarily affects the public and the public interest, and common reputation of ownership is admissible in an action between private parties claiming ownership, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 11, and section 1963, subd. 12.

3. Evidence ⊂324(3)—Common reputation as to ownership must be of past generation or 30 years old.

Whenever common reputation of ownership is admissible on the ground that it establishes a claim that tends to disparage a public right, the only reputation that is admissible under the common law is that of a past generation; and under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 11, and section 1963, subd. 12, the reputation must respect facts of a public or general interest more than 30 years old.

4. Waters and water courses ⊂2—No private right to corpus of stream or spring on public land.

There can no more be private ownership in springs located on public lands of the United States than there can be private ownership in the corpus of a stream of running water; there being but a usufructuary right, to be acquired by an appropriation made in the manner provided by law.

5. Waters and water courses ⊂12—There must be appropriation as well as discovery of springs on public lands to give right to divert water.

Mere discovery of springs on public lands could not give a right to divert or use any of the water, nor could mere development of the water, unaccompanied by any actual diversion for beneficial use, give any right; it being necessary that there be an intent to apply it to some existing or contemplated beneficial use, an actual diversion from the natural channel by some mode sufficient for the purpose, and an application of the water within a reasonable time to some beneficial use, under Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2339, 2340, 14 Stat. 253, 16 Stat. 216 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4647, 4648).

6. Waters and water courses ⊂14—Manner of diversion of waters to beneficial use immaterial.

Diversion as an element of a valid appropriation of waters on public lands must be an actual diversion, but the mode of diversion is immaterial, and in appropriating waters of a spring only such acts are necessary, and such indications and evidences of appropriation required, as the nature of the case and the face of the country will admit, and which under the existing conditions and circumstances are practicable to accomplish the appropriator's purpose in making a beneficial use of the water.

7. Waters and water courses ⊂19—Appropriation completed as against later appropriators prior to actual application to beneficial use, where reasonable diligence is exercised.

If diversion of waters on public land is actually made with intent to use the water for beneficial purposes, the appropriation is then complete, in the sense that the rights of the appropriator cannot be defeated by acts done or appropriation attempted to be made by others after such diversion, and while he is proceeding with reasonable diligence to apply the water appropriated to the purpose contemplated.

8. Waters and water courses ⊂24—Appropriation without notice provided by Code could not exceed water actually taken.

Where appropriation of water from springs on public lands was not by the statutory mode provided in the Civil Code, in that no notice of appropriation was posted, the appropriator's right could not exceed the greatest amount of water ever actually taken by him and applied to a beneficial use or uses prior to the time when others appropriated waters from the springs.

9. Evidence ⊂324(3)—Question as to common reputation as to ownership of water rights misleading.

Where evidence as to ancient common reputation as to the ownership of water rights was admissible, the most that could be shown by a witness was that there was an ancient common reputation in the community relative to the diversion and use of water for some beneficial purpose, stating what that reputation was, and to ask the witness to state who was reputed to be the owner of "springs" could only mislead, since there can only be ownership of a right to take and use water, and not of the corpus of the water.

10. Evidence ⊂324(3)—Common reputation as to ownership of right of little probative force.

Evidence of a common reputation as to the ownership of a right to take water from a spring on public land can have little, if any, probative force, since the nature and extent of a right to divert water depends on a nice application of facts to legal principles with which the average layman has no acquaintance.

11. Evidence ⊂472(6)—Questions as to ancient common reputation objectionable, as leaving it to witness to interpret reputation.

In an action involving water rights, where ownership was sought to be shown by common reputation, the question, "According to that common reputation, who was the owner of those springs?" was objectionable, in that it left it to the witness, instead of the jury, to interpret the reputation that existed in the community, thus requiring the witness to usurp the functions of the jury.

12. Mines and minerals ⊂104—General manager of mining company must be shown to have had authority to dispose of real property.

A claim of title to real property under an agreement with the general manager of a mining company must be supported by evidence that he had authority to dispose of the same.

13. Waters and water courses ⊂26—One constructing pipe line on public lands entitled to protection.

One who enters on public land and constructs a pipe line thereon under claim of ownership of a water right is entitled to the protection afforded by Rev. St. U. S. § 2339 (14 Stat. 253, § 9 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4647]); a right of way for such pipe line being given by the government.

14. Frauds, statute of ⊂72(1)—Right of way on public land to convey water is real property, and sale must be evidenced by writing.

A right of way given for a pipe line by the government under Rev. St. U. S. § 2339 (14 Stat. 253, § 9 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4647]), to one having ownership of a water right upon public lands, is real property, and a sale thereof must be evidenced by a written instrument.

15. Waters and water courses ⊂27—Owner of water rights not entitled to pumps and diversion system constructed by trespasser.

An appropriator of water flowing from springs on public lands is not entitled to pipe lines, pumps, etc., constructed by another to take water from such springs, even though the latter was a trespasser as against the federal government.

16. Waters and water courses ⊂19—Surplus not appropriated subject to appropriation.

Where a certain amount of water is appropriated from a spring on public lands, any surplus which would run to waste, if not put to some beneficial use, is subject to appropriation by other persons availing themselves of the privilege granted by Act Cong. July 26, 1866, by appropriating such surplus in a manner recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

17. Waters and water courses ⊂109—Owner of land owns water of spring having no natural outlet.

A spring may have no natural outlet, in which case the owner of the land in which it lies, under ordinary circumstances, owns the water as completely as he does the soil.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by S. C. Simons against the Inyo Cerro Gordo Mining & Power Company, the Cerro Gordo Mines Company, and Louis D. Gordon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

A. H. Swallow, of Bishop, F. J. Hambly, of San Jose, and S. E. Vermilyea and S. L. Carpenter, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Richard S. Miner and P. W. Forbes, both of Independence (Louis Oneal and J. P. Sex, both of San Jose, and W. A. Lamar, of Independence, of counsel), for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendants appeal from a decree adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of three springs of flowing and living waters, situated on vacant public lands of the United States in Inyo county, known collectively as the "Chris Crohn Springs," and located about 4 miles northeasterly from the town of Cerro Gordo—formerly a prosperous mining camp. The decree adjudges that plaintiff is the owner of each of the three springs, and of the right to divert all the waters thereof for domestic, culinary, household, drinking, mining, and milling purposes, and all other useful and beneficial purposes; that she is the owner of all the pipes, flumes, tanks, pumps, and other apparatus used to divert and conduct the waters of the springs to the town of Cerro Gordo; that none of the defendants has any right to any of the waters of any of the springs, or to the pipes, flumes, tanks, or pumps; that defendants be enjoined from hindering plaintiff from taking the waters of the springs at the outlets thereof, or from the pipes; and that plaintiff recover of and from defendants the sum of $4,000, found by the court to be the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff by reason of the fact that, since October 17, 1916, defendants have prevented her from taking or using any water from the springs through or by means of the pipe line that, by the decree, is declared to be her property. It is alleged in the answer that the defendant Cerro Gordo Mines Company is the owner of the right to divert and use all of the waters of the springs, and that it is the owner of the entire diversion system—the pipe lines, pumps, tanks, etc.

Plaintiff claims title to the springs, and the right to divert and use all the waters thereof, as the successor in interest of one Chris Crohn, an old miner and prospector, who died about a year and a half before the trial. It appears from the evidence that in the early '70's Chris Crohn, upon whose acts plaintiff's asserted rights depend, conveyed water in kegs on muleback from one of the three springs, the middle spring, to the mining camp at Cerro Gordo, and there sold it by the gallon. There is no evidence that Crohn ever posted any notice of appropriation. There is no satisfactory evidence that he ever took any water from the most southerly of the three springs. At rare intervals, once in every 30 of 60 days, during a certain period of time, he took some water from the most northerly spring, the waters of which were not well adapted to domestic uses. This business of packing and selling water was continued by Crohn until the year 1882, when he and his wife left the district and moved to Mendocino county, in the nothern part of the state, where they remained for about 8 years. During this period Crohn left a person in charge of his properties and business at the Cerro Gordo camp, and he himself made occasional trips to the camp for the purpose of looking after his interests there. There is some evidence that prior to 1878 a small pipe was laid from the middle spring to a mine that subsequently was located by Crohn as the Augusta mine. It is not clear whether this old pipe was laid by Crohn to divert water from the middle spring, or whether it was installed by some one else. In fact, the evidence of the existence of this old pipe is not of the most satisfactory character.

In 1889 the Union Company, under whom defendant Cerro Gordo Mines Company claims, purchased the Cerro Gordo mine, and shortly thereafter purchased from three or four persons the rights which they claimed to have initiated by reason of certain appropriation notices theretofore posted by them at or near the springs. The Union Company never purchased from Crohn any right which he asserted in or to the springs. Immediately after purchasing the claims of these three or four persons, the Union Company, at a cost of about $8,000, built and installed a diversion system—pipe lines, pumps, tanks, etc.—whereby it diverted water from the springs to Cerro Gordo. This is the diversion system that the lower court, in its decree, adjudged to be plaintiff's property. From its installation, in the fall of 1889, to the date of the trial, the diversion system so installed by the Union Company was used by it, and later by its successor, the Cerro Gordo Mines Company, to divert water from the springs to the town of Cerro Gordo. To sustain her claim to these pipes, pumps, tanks, etc., plaintiff relied upon the evidence of Chris Crohn's widow to the effect that in 1890, and shortly after the installation of these pipes, pumps, tanks, etc., by the Union Company, she overheard a conversation between that company's general manager and her husband, in the course of which the former told her husband that his company would pay her husband rent for such water as the company might divert from the springs, and, if it did not and the company should quit working, Crohn could have the pipe lines, pumps, tanks, etc., for the rent of the water. Needless to say, it was only over the vigorous objections of defendants' counsel that this evidence was admitted.

At all times subsequent to the installation of the system constructed by the Union Company, until enjoined by the lower court, that company, and its successor, the Cerro Gordo Mines Company, diverted and used water from these springs and devoted it to beneficial purposes. Defendants rely upon this diversion and use to establish the right of the Cerro Gordo Mines Company to take and use all the waters of the springs. Plaintiff, on the other hand, maintains that such diversion and use were with the consent of, and in subordination to, the title of herself and her predecessor, Chris Crohn.

To sustain her contention that her predecessor and grantor, Chris Crohn, was the owner of a right to take and use all the waters of these springs, plaintiff, over defendants' objection, was permitted by the court below to introduce the testimony of numerous witnesses that Crohn was the reputed owner of the springs. The questions propounded to each of these witnesses were all very much alike. Those propounded to the witness Pearl Castle will suffice for an example. After testifying that she first heard of the springs in June, 1908, when, for the first time, she visited the Cerro Gordo mining camp, the following questions and answers were propounded and given:

"Q. Did there exist in that community at that time a common reputation as to the ownership of those springs? A. Yes, sir. Q. According to that common reputation, who was the owner of those springs? A. Chris Crohn."

It will be noticed that this witness, who testified that when she first visited the springs there was a common reputation as to the ownership, was not asked what that common reputation was, but, instead, was asked who, according to that common reputation, was the owner of the springs—thus permitting the witness, instead of the jury, to place her interpretation upon the common reputation existing in the community regarding the ownership. We agree with appellants that these questions clearly were improper, and that in overruling defendants' objections thereto the lower court committed prejudicial error.

Under the common-law rules of evidence—rules founded on reason and the experience of ages—evidence of common reputation was confined to cases of pedigree, prescription, custom, boundary, and matters of general and public interest. Evidence of common reputation respecting private ownership or possession was inadmissible at common law, save where such ownership or possession favored or disparaged the existence of some public property right in which the whole community was interested, such as the public right in bridges, ferries, highways, public lands, profits à pendre, free warrens, and the like, and not even then unless the reputation was that of a past generation. See, also, Berniaud v. Beecher, 76 Cal. 394, 18 Pac. 598. In Sexton v. Hollis, supra, the general rule and its exceptions are thus stated:

"Common repute is nothing more than the prevailing belief in a certain community, and to allow that to be adduced as evidence upon an issue of title would be to substitute the belief or opinion of the community for that of the jury called on to pass upon such issue. The question is, What do the jury believe? and not,

What is the generally received opinion in the neighborhood? and the belief of the jury must be formed from the legal and competent testimony adduced in the case. This class of testimony falls under the head of hearsay evidence, which, as a general rule, is clearly incompetent. It is true that there are certain well-recognized exceptions to this rule, which in several of the cases are said to be as old as the rule itself; but we do not think that this case comes within any of these exceptions, which are confined to cases of pedigree, of prescription, of custom, and in some cases of boundary, and also matters of general and public history."

For reasons presently to be stated, we think that the instant case falls within one of the uniformly recognized exceptions to the general rule; that is, we think that Crohn's reputed ownership presented a matter of general and public interest.

[1] We do not agree with respondent's claim that subdivision 12 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure has modified the common-law rule that evidence of common reputation is inadmissible to establish title to real estate where private rights only are affected. By that Code section it is expressly declared that, among the prima facie or disputable presumptions enumerated therein, is this:

"That a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it, or from common reputation of his ownership."

The only provisions of our Code of Procedure that have any bearing upon the question of proving title by common reputation are the Code provision already quoted (subdivision 12 of section 1963), and subdivision 11 of section 1870, which reads:

"In conformity with the preceding provisions, evidence may be given upon a trial of the following facts: * * * 11. Common reputation existing previous to the controversy, respecting facts of a public or general interest more than thirty years old, and in cases of pedigree or boundary."

These two Code provisions should be read together. What was said in Estate of Heaton, 135 Cal. 386, 67 Pac. 321, and Estate of Mills, 137 Cal. 302, 70 Pac. 91, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175, about reading together subdivision 11 of section 1870 and section 1852, is equally applicable here. When subdivision 12 of section 1963 and subdivision 11 of section 1870 are read together, as they should be, it is clear, we think, that the former contemplates but a restatement of the common-law rule. One of these two Code provisions (subdivision 11, section 1870) declares when and in what cases evidence of common reputation is admissible; the other (subdivision 12, section 1963) declares what is the effect of such evidence when properly admitted. By subdivision 12 of section 1963 the Legislature did not intend to declare that evidence of common reputation of ownership is admissible as prima facie evidence of title in any and every case where title to property is an issue. It does not pretend to say when evidence of common reputation may be admitted. It only declares the effect of its admission. All it does, in effect, is to declare that when, under other Code provisions, common reputation is admissible, the effect of its admission is to raise a prima facie presumption of ownership.

To illustrate: It always has been the rule that, when title to real estate is only collaterally involved, parol evidence, such, for instance, as common reputation of ownership, is admissible (Shanks v. Robertson, 101 Kan. 463, 168 Pac. 316, 1 A. L. R. 1140, and notes on page 1143); and of course, if, in such a case, such evidence of common reputation is received, its effect is as declared in subdivision 12 of section 1963—i. e., it raises a prima facie presumption of ownership. But to hold that, where title is a direct issue, and is of such a character that a claim thereto can in no wise affect the public or its interests, evidence of common reputation of ownership is admissible, would countenance a rule that easily could be turned to the accomplishment of great wrong and injustice, and titles would be won and lost as neighborhood gossip veered with the ever-changing feelings of friendliness or hostility toward the rightful claimant. Berniaud v. Beecher, supra, seems to be the only case in this state that touches the question. Though the question did not receive much discussion there, it clearly appears from the briefs filed on the petition for a rehearing that the point was directly raised, and was decided in accordance with the foregoing views.

But, though the general rule is that evidence of common reputation of ownership is inadmissible, under the Code, as at common law, where private property rights only are affected and matters of general or public interest are not involved, nevertheless such evidence may properly be received where the title sought to be established affects public property rights in such a way as to be a matter of public or general interest, and the reputation is ancient. A distinction has long been recognized between public and private rights, and the admissibility of hearsay evidence with respect thereto. The interest which the members of a community possess in their common rights is so great that judicial administration has assumed that it is sufficient to insure such general discussion and mutual correction as to give some probative value to a common reputation that affects such rights. 4 Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 2741. Accordingly, where a foundation is laid, by acts of ownership, reputation becomes admissible where the claim tends to abridge the public right, and the reputation is ancient; i. e., is that of a past generation, or, as said by our Code (subdivision 11, section 1870), respects facts of a public or general interest "more than 30 years old." Russell v. Stocking, supra; Dawson v. Town of Orange, supra; Morse v. Whitcomb, 54 Or. 412, 102 Pac. 788, 103 Pac. 775, 135 Am. St. Rep. 832; Chamberlayne on Evidence, § 2743; Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 1582, 1586. Speaking of proof of title by common reputation in cases where the public interest necessarily is affected by the claim of private ownership, the Connecticut court, in Russell v. Stocking, supra, said:

"A foundation being laid, by acts of ownership, reputation becomes admissible, particularly where the claim tends to abridge a public right. 'For all mankind,' says Lord Kenyon, 'being interested, it is natural to suppose that they would be conversant with the subject, and discourse about it, having all the same means of information.'"

[2] A claim made to any part of the public domain, or a claim to a right to take water from a stream or other source of water supply that is situated wholly on the public domain, necessarily affects the public and the public interest. For that reason we are inclined to the view that the rule that common reputation of ownership is admissible where the claim tends to abridge a public right is applicable to private claims to public lands and to private water rights in or to waters that are situated wholly on or flow wholly over public lands. One of the chief concerns of those early adventurers who sought to exploit the wealth of our wild lands was to make themselves acquainted with the rights and claims of those around them. Frequently such claims were not only the familiar topic of their conversations, but the all-absorbing topic. We are inclined to the view, therefore, that the reason for the admission of evidence as to the common reputation of ownership of bridges, highways, and the like applies with equal force to claims to public lands and to water on such lands. This view seems to have received the sanction of our Supreme Court in Vernon I. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, on page 254, 39 Pac. 762, on page 768, where the court said that it was proper to show that it was a matter of common reputation, more than 30 years old, that the city of Los Angeles claimed the water and had control over it. In this connection the court said:

"It was proposed to show that the city had used the water under a claim of right. It was proper to show this, and as it was a matter of general interest, and as to a portion of the time of ancient date, and the declarants dead, it could be established by proof of the prevailing current of assertion. Greenleaf on Evidence, § 128."

It would also seem that this view of the law meets with the approval of Mr. Chamberlayne, who, in a paragraph devoted to the admissibility of evidence of common reputation when the public interest is affected, says:

"Whether certain lands are public or owned by private individuals may properly be a subject of general concern to the members of a community." 4 Chamberlayne on the Modern Law of Evidence, § 2803, citing Dawson v. Town of Orange, supra.

What is said in Harriman v. Brown, 8 Leigh (Va.) 708, and McKinnon v. Bliss, 21 N. Y. 218, also lends support to this view, though those cases presented questions of boundary only.

We have deemed it our duty to give this question this somewhat exhaustive consideration, not only because of its intrinsic importance, but also because of the admissibility of common reputation respecting the ownership of a right in and to waters of these springs will, without doubt, arise on the retrial, and it is our duty to determine all questions of law necessary to a final determination. Though we believe and hold that, for the reasons we have stated, it is proper to admit evidence of common reputation, respecting the existence of a right to divert and use waters that are wholly situated on the government's vacant public lands, still, for reasons about to be stated, we are constrained to hold that the questions as propounded by respondent's counsel to establish Crohn's title by common reputation were fatally defective in form. The questions, in the form in which they were cast by plaintiff's counsel, were objectionable in at least three particulars:

[3] 1. In the first place, whenever common reputation of ownership is admissible upon the ground that it establishes a claim that tends to disparage a public right, the only reputation that is admissible under the common law rule is that of a past generation (Dawson v. Town of Orange, supra; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1582); or, as our Code provides, the reputation must respect facts of a public or general interest "more than thirty years old." Not only was the reputation as testified to by many of the witnesses in the court below a recent reputation—a reputation based upon the statements of living, not deceased, persons—but the reputed ownership itself was of recent date; that is, it was not shown to have been a reputed ownership existing more than 30 years before the trial. The questions, as framed, called neither for an ancient reputation nor for a reputed ownership more than 30 years old. Thus, for example, the witness Pearl Castle, who visited the Cerro Gordo mining camp and first heard of the springs about 9 years prior to the trial, was asked, over appellants' objection, whether there did not exist in the community "at that time"—9 years before the trial—a common reputation as to the ownership of the springs.

[4] 2. By many of the questions the witnesses were asked, not what was the common reputation as to the ownership of a right to take and use water from the springs, but what was the common reputation as to the ownership of the springs themselves. And many, if not all of the witnesses, in reply to such questions, said that Chris Crohn was commonly reputed to be the owner of the springs—not that he was commonly reputed to be the owner of a right, viz. the right to take water from the springs. Such evidence could not possibly throw any light upon the real question presented by the case, which was this: Is this plaintiff, as successor of Chris Crohn, the owner of a water right; i. e., a right to take and use water from the springs? And, if she is, then what is its extent? Has she the right to take all, or only part, of the waters of the springs? There no more could be private ownership in the springs themselves than there could be private ownership in the corpus of a stream of running water. There could be but a usufructuary right. And that right could be acquired only by an "appropriation" made in the manner provided by law; that is, by reducing the water to actual possession for a beneficial use.

[5-8] The vice of the questions, in the form in which they were cast by examining counsel, will clearly appear if we pause to consider some of the elementary rules governing the acquisition of water rights on the public domain. Counsel for respondent seem to think that Chris Crohn could and did acquire title to the springs by right of discovery, and, also by developing the water of the springs. It seems that Crohn, or some one, ran a short tunnel into the hillside, where the waters from one or more of the springs bubble up from the earth, and also constructed a sump near one of the springs, into which the waters collected. Mere discovery of the springs could not give a right to divert or use any of the water. Nor could mere development of the water, unaccompanied by any actual diversion for beneficial use, give any right. It is only by some species of "appropriation"—i. e., reducing the water to actual possession, made as provided by the act of 1866 (Rev. Stat. § 2339 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4647])—that one can acquire title to a right in or to waters situated or flowing wholly on public lands. The federal government, as proprietor of the public domain, early recognized the necessity of permitting persons in these arid regions to acquire an interest in water sources on public lands distinct from the lands themselves; and in 1866 (14 Stat. 253; Rev. Stat. § 2339) Congress passed an act which provides, among other things, as follows:

"Whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same."

By the act of July 9, 1870 (16 Stat. 218; Rev. Stat. § 2340 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4648]), it was further provided:

"All patents granted, or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section."

It will be noticed that the language of the act of 1866 is:

"Whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water * * * have vested," etc.

The right is the right to the "use," and it can be acquired only by "priority of possession"; i. e., by actual diversion with a bona fide intent to use the water for a beneficial purpose. In Kelly v. Natoma Water Co., 6 Cal. 105, it was said that—

"Possession or actual appropriation, must be the test of priority in all claims to the use of water, whenever such claims are not dependent upon the ownership of the land through which the water flows."

To constitute a valid appropriation of water, three elements must always exist: (1) An intent to apply it to some existing or contemplated beneficial use; (2) an actual diversion from the natural channel by some mode sufficient for the purpose; and (3) an application of the water within a reasonable time to some beneficial use. Low v. Rizor, 25 Or. 551, 37 Pac. 82; Nevada Ditch Co. v. Bennett, 30 Or. 59, 45 Pac. 472, 60 Am. St. Rep. 777, and notes on page 799 et seq.

As to the second element of a valid appropriation, namely, that there must be an actual diversion, it is the fact of diversion, and not its mode, that is material. Ordinarily a diversion is accomplished by a ditch, canal, pipe line, and the like; but any mode may be resorted to which, under the circumstances, proves effective. 60 Am. St. Rep. 806. In appropriating the waters of a spring located on public lands, only such acts are necessary, and such indications and evidences of appropriation required, as the nature of the case and the face of the country will admit, and which, under the existing conditions and circumstances, are practicable to accomplish the appropriator's purpose in making a beneficial use of the water.

The third, and perhaps the most essential, element to the legal appropriation of water is its application within a reasonable time to some useful purpose or industry. It is, perhaps, not strictly true that this application is essential to the appropriation; for, if diversion is actually made with intent to use the water for such purposes, the appropriation is then complete in the sense that the rights of the appropriator cannot be defeated by acts done or appropriations attempted to be made by others after such diversion and while he is proceeding with reasonable diligence to apply the water appropriated by him to the purpose contemplated. Water in excess of such amount as is reasonably necessary for the contemplated use, though actually diverted and carried away, is not, in the legal sense, "appropriated," and still remains subject to appropriation and use by others. Crohn's appropriation was not by the statutory mode provided in the Civil Code; that is, he did not post any notice of appropriation. His water right, therefore, if any he ever had, could not exceed the greatest amount of water ever actually taken by him and applied to a beneficial use or uses prior to the time when others appropriated waters from the springs. Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 371; Southside Imp. Co. v. Burson, 147 Cal. 401, 81 Pac. 1107; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198. Actual diversion (the taking of possession) creates the right; actual use (the amount in possession) measures the right. As said by Judge Hawley in Union Min. Co. v. Dangberg (C. C.) 81 Fed. 73:

"In the appropriation of water there cannot be any 'dog in manger' business by either party."

[9, 10] If, now, we apply to this case the foregoing elementary principles relative to the acquisition of water rights by "appropriation," it will readily appear why it was improper to permit respondent to ask her witnesses if, according to common reputation, her predecessor in interest, Chris Crohn, was the owner of the springs themselves. It appears from the evidence that at no time did any of the uses to which Crohn put the waters reasonably require all the water flowing from the three springs. Years ago, when the camp had its greatest population, 1,500 to 2,000 inhabitants—it since has dwindled almost to the proportions of a deserted camp—Crohn used no more than about 300 gallons a day, packed on muleback into the town of Cerro Gordo. The total flow from the springs is about 3 miner's inches, or considerably more than ever was reasonably necessary to satisfy the beneficial uses to which Crohn at any time devoted the water that flows from the springs. If, therefore, he ever acquired a water right, it was the right to use an amount much less than the total flow from the three springs. It follows, therefore, that if, as we hold, common reputation is admissible to establish title to a water right, such reputation should be confined to the right itself, whatever it may be, and not be extended to the corpus of the water to which the incorporeal right may attach; that is, the most that can be shown by the witnesses is, in substance, that there is an ancient common reputation in the community relative to the diversion and use of the water for some beneficial purpose, stating what that reputation is. To ask the witnesses to state who was reputed to be the owner of the springs, as was done by counsel for the plaintiff in this case, could only mislead. There can be no ownership of the springs; there can only be ownership of a right to take and use water from the springs. In taking leave of this particular aspect of the general subject of proof of title by common reputation, we cannot refrain from expressing the belief that, in the very nature of things, the establishment of a water right by evidence of common reputation never can prove satisfactory. At best, evidence of a common reputation as to the ownership of such a right can have little, if any, probative force. This is so because the exact nature and extent of a right to divert and use water from a source of supply on public land frequently depends, not only upon a multiplicity of facts, but upon a nice application of those facts to legal principles with which the average layman has no acquaintance.

[11] 3. The questions propounded to respondent's witnesses were objectionable upon the further ground that they left it to the witnesses, instead of the jury, to interpret the reputation that existed in the community. The questions were not confined to asking the witnesses to tell what was the common reputation about which they were called to testify. They, or some of them at least, were asked who, according to the reputation as to ownership, was the owner. As framed by the examining counsel, the questions in effect, required the witnesses to usurp the functions of the jury. As said in Wilson v. Maddock, 5 Or. 482:

"The proper fact to be proven was merely the common reputation. Of this alone the witness was competent to testify. The inference or presumption to be drawn from that fact was matter for the jury."

For these reasons we are satisfied that the lower court erred in overruling appellants' objections to the questions whereby respondent sought to prove ownership of the springs by common reputation, and that such error was clearly prejudicial.

[12] The lower court erred, also, in finding and adjudging that respondent is the owner of the pumps, pipe lines, tanks, etc., installed in the fall of 1889 by the Union Company, the predecessor of the Cerro Gordo Mines Company. Not only does the complaint fail to allege that plaintiff owns the pumps, pipe lines, tanks, etc., but there is no competent evidence to sustain the finding that they are owned by plaintiff. As already stated, Chris Crohn, in 1882, left the mining camp for Mendocino county, where he resided, until his return to Cerro Gordo in 1889, or about the time when the Union Company installed its diversion system. It was not until 1890 that Mrs. Crohn returned to Cerro Gordo from their home in Mendocino county. The lower court, over the objection of defendants, permitted Crohn's widow to testify that, on her return to Cerro Gordo in 1890, she overheard a conversation between her husband and the general manager of the Union Company to the effect that the company would pay Crohn 1¼ cents per gallon for all water it might take from the springs through its diversion system, and that, if the company should quit working without thus paying for the water, Crohn might have the pipe lines, pumps and tanks. This, conceded by respondent to be the sole evidence upon which to base a finding that plaintiff is the owner of the pumps, pipe lines and tanks, was wholly insufficient for that purpose. In the first place, there is no evidence that the Union Company's general manager had any authority thus to dispose of his company's real property. In the next place, the pipe lines and the right of way therefor were realty, title to which could not pass by parol. There is no allegation or evidence of any equitable estoppel; and if plaintiff, as Crohn's successor, is entitled to the pipe lines, etc., installed by the Union Company in 1889, and the right of way therefor, it is only by reason of what, according to Crohn's widow, was said to her husband by the general manager of that company in 1890 in the course of the conversation to which we have just adverted. But title cannot be so established.

[13-16] One who enters on public land and constructs a pipe line thereon, under a claim of ownership of a water right, is entitled to the protection afforded by the act of 1866 to the constructors of ditches and canals; that is, a right of way for such pipe line is given by the government. San Jose L. & W. Co. v. San Jose Ranch Co., 189 U. S. 177, 23 Sup. Ct. 487, 47 L. Ed. 765. Such right of way is real property; and one who enters into possession thereof under a verbal sale does not succeed to the legal title. The sale must be evidenced by a written instrument. Smith v. O'Hara, supra. To this the only reply vouchsafed by respondent is that the Cerro Gordo Mines Company is, and its predecessor, the Union Company, was, a trespasser. In the first place, even if the Union Company never acquired any water right, and even if, as against the federal government, the laying of the pipe lines through, and the construction of the tanks and pumps upon, the vacant public lands was a trespass, still, as between plaintiff and defendants, the former would not, for that reason, be entitled to the pipe lines, pumps, etc. But, as a matter of fact, neither the Union Company nor the Cerro Gordo Mines Company was a trespasser, either at the springs or in those parts of the vacant government lands wherein and whereon its diversion system was installed. This is so for the reason that, even if Crohn did acquire a water right, it was not a right to take all the waters of the springs. According to plaintiff's own showing, Crohn never used more than a part of all the spring waters. The surplus, therefore, which would run to waste, if not put to some beneficial use, was subject to appropriation by the Union Company, or by any one who chose to initiate a right thereto by availing himself of the privilege granted by the act of Congress of July 26, 1886, namely, by appropriating such surplus in a manner "recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of the courts."

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for retrial. As it is unlikely that the many other assignments of error pressed upon our attention by appellants will arise at the second trial, they do not require detailed consideration.

Judgment reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied.

We withhold our approval from the statement in the opinion of the District Court to the effect that evidence of common reputation is admissible to prove ownership of a private claim to take water flowing upon public lands. We consider it extremely doubtful if the rule stated in subdivision 11, section 1870, Code of Civil Procedure, allowing such evidence "respecting facts of a public or general interest more than thirty years old," extends to such private claims to a part of the lands of the United States, and we prefer to leave the question open for further consideration.

[17] We also refuse to approve the broad statement that there cannot be a private ownership in springs of water. The case is not parallel to the question of the ownership of the water of a stream. A spring may have no natural outlet, in which case the owner of the land in which it lies, under ordinary circumstances, owns the water as completely as he does the soil.

EMPIRE SECURITIES CO. v. LEVY.
(Civ. 3340.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied Aug. 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊂=459—Installment assessments may exceed 50 per cent. of assessed value.

San Francisco street improvement ordinance of September 4, 1913, and San Francisco charter, pursuant to which the ordinance was passed (article 6, c. 2, § 33, as amended by St. 1913, p. 1602), in expressly removing from installment assessments the limitation of assessments to 50 per cent. of the assessed value of property provided for in subdivision 3 of section 8, did not forbid any one assessment in excess of the 50 per cent. limit, in absence of an express provision to this effect, and so does not prevent an installment assessment from exceeding such limit.

2. Statutes ⊂=190 — Unambiguous statute needs no interpretation.

A statute free from ambiguity and uncertainty will not be interpreted; the statute itself being conclusive, notwithstanding contention that the result is unjust or against policy.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=445—Inclusion in street contractor's bid of sums for printing, engineering, and inspection did not render assessment void.

That street contractor's bid for street improvement work under San Francisco Street Improvement Act of 1913 included sums for printing, engineering, and inspection did not render assessment void.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=488, 489(7)—Objection to contractor's bid should be made before board of supervisors.

Objection to street contractor's bid for contract, under San Francisco Street Improvement Act of 1913 should have been made before the board of supervisors, and not in a suit to foreclose a lien for an assessment.

5. Pleading ⊂=403(2) — Complaint cured by statement of necessary facts in answer.

Any defect in complaint for failure to state fact is cured by the statement of such facts in defendant's answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Empire Securities Company against Louis Levy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff foreclosing a lien against defendant's lot for a street work assessment. The street work was done and the assessment was levied under authority of the San Francisco Street Improvement Act of 1913, enacted pursuant to the provisions of the city charter. The lot involved was assessed for general taxation purposes for the fiscal year 1915–16 at $160. The street assessment foreclosed against it amounted to $571.48. The lot has a frontage upon the street improved of 78 feet 5 inches, and a depth of only 25 feet ¾ inch, and appears to have had an assessed value proportionately lower than neighboring lots. The assessment was made payable in 6 annual installments, so it results that not only the assessment, but also each annual installment, amounts to more than 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the lot. It is this fact upon which appellant bases his contentions for a reversal of the judgment. The Improvement Act and the charter expressly forbid an assessment of over 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the lot, and provide that, in case it does exceed this limit, the assessment shall be divided into annual installments, not exceeding 10 in number.

[1] It is the contention of appellant that the act in question should be given an interpretation forbidding any one installment in excess of the 50 per cent. limit, even though there is no express provision to this effect. The charter of the city and county of San Francisco (subdivision 3, section 8, article 6, chapter 2, Stats. 1899, p. 297), contains the following provision:

"No assessment shall be levied upon any property, which, together with all assessments for street improvements that may have been levied upon the same property during the year next preceding, will amount to a sum greater than fifty per cent. of the value at which said property was assessed upon the last preceding assessment book of the city and county."

In 1913, article 6, chapter 2, section 33, of the charter was amended (December 10, 1912, approved by Legislature March 28, 1913—Stats. 1913, p. 1602), providing for the passage of an improvement ordinance, for the payment of installments, and also provided:

"In any proceeding for the improvement of streets wherein provision is made for the payment of any assessment in annual installments, the amount of such assessment shall not be limited by the provisions contained in subdivision 3 of section 8 of this chapter."

Under the authority of the above amendment to the charter, the street improvement ordinance of 1913 (approved September 4, 1913) was passed by the board of supervisors. The street work in controversy was done under this ordinance, which provided:

"No assessment shall be levied upon any property, which together with all assessments for street improvement that may have been levied upon the same property during the next year preceding, will amount to a sum greater than fifty per centum of the value at which said property was assessed, exclusive of improvements thereon, upon the assessment book of the city and county current at the date of the passage of the resolution of intention, except, however, as in this ordinance hereinafter provided."

The exception referred to in the improvement ordinance is set forth in section 28, part 2, of the act:

"Any assessment imposed under the provisions of this ordinance may be paid in annual installments, not exceeding ten in number, whenever the board of public works shall so determine and declare in the resolution of intention or whenever the board of supervisors shall so determine and declare in the ordinance ordering the work, and it shall be mandatory for the board of public works to so determine and declare in every case when the amount of the assessment imposed will exceed one-half of the assessed value of the lot or parcel of land against which such assessment is imposed."

[2] Appellant contends for the application of the rule of statutory interpretation that a statute must be given a reasonable interpretation; that it is unreasonable to forbid an assessment exceeding the 50 per cent. limit and nevertheless allow each of the several installments of an installment assessment to exceed the same limit. He contends that the only common-sense reason of removing the 50 per cent. limitation in the case of an installment assessment is to make each installment less than 50 per cent. His argument is quite persuasive, but would be more properly addressed to the law-making power than to the judicial branch of government. We think the rule of statutory interpretation which is applicable here is as stated in Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 384, 387, 55 Pac. 1060, 1061, as follows:

"A cardinal rule of interpretation is that a statute free from ambiguity and uncertainty needs no interpretation. This must be so, for all interpretation and construction is for the purpose of ascertaining the legislative will. When this is clear, interpretation is not allowable. In such case, it cannot be argued that the result is unjust or against policy. The statute is itself conclusive upon these subjects."

To the same effect see Merkley v. Williams, 3 Cal. App. 268, 84 Pac. 1015.

The charter and the Improvement Act both expressly remove the 50 per cent. limitation in the case of an installment assessment. There is no ambiguity or uncertainty about the language. The most that can be said about these provisions is that they do not give the property owner as complete protection as he is led to expect by the first and original limitation. But as was said in Warren v. Postel, 99 Cal. 294, 33 Pac. 930:

"Absolute protection against the city council is not obtainable under any such scheme. The Legislature is the proper place to go for improvement in this matter."

The case last cited holds that the provisions of the Street Law of 1885, placing a limitation of one-half of the assessed value of the property on any one work, did not prohibit two public works under two separate street proceedings being done during the same year, even though the aggregate of the assessments exceeded the one-half limit. We think that decision is analogous to the facts of this case.

Appellant probably does not realize the lengths he would have this court go in "reading into the statute." In the first place, the limitation in the statute is, not that the assessment must not exceed 50 per cent. of the assessed value, but that the assessment "together with all assessments for street improvements that may have been levied upon the same property during the year next preceding" shall not exceed 50 per cent. If we should hold installments to be the same as "assessments levied," and therefore make the provision applicable to installments, the installments would automatically be cut down to 25 per cent., because we should have to take account of the installment assessment of the "year next preceding." Also, with regard to the first installment, we should have to take into account any other assessment levied during the year next preceding the year of the first installment, which in many cases would make the first installment different in amount from subsequent ones. Again, the installments are limited to 10 in number, and if these are each limited in amount the total assessment would be limited in amount. Perhaps appellant would welcome all this, but these things are not in the statute. These considerations only serve to demonstrate the maze we fall into when we try to read a meaning into a statute which is not ambiguous nor uncertain.

[3, 4] Appellant briefly states that the assessment is void because the contractor's bid includes certain sums for printing, engineering, and inspection; that the only proper items are for labor and material. He does not cite any authority, and appears not to have raised the point in the court below. His special demurrer called attention to the items, but the demurrer was not well taken, and it was properly overruled. The place to make on objection of this kind is, moreover, before the board of supervisors. Ahlman v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 181 Pac. 238; Hutchinson Co. v. Coughlin, 184 Pac. 435.

[5] The complaint does not show on its face that the assessment was divided into installments, neither does it show that the assessment exceeded the 50 per cent. limitation. We do no think the complaint is defective on this account. But at any rate the full facts on this point are set out at length in defendant's answer, which cures the defect, if any, in the complaint. Girvin v. Simon, 116 Cal. 604, 48 Pac. 720; Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370; Nolan v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 2 Cal. App. 1, 82 Pac. 1119; Merryman v. Kirkby, 13 Cal. App. 344, 109 Pac. 635; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568; Savings Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914.

This disposes of all the points raised by appellant.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MORAN et al. v. FREEMAN. (Civ. 2130.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 14, 1920.)

1. Animals ⊜49—Fence laws held repealed and common-law rule restored.

The Estray Act (St. 1915, p. 636) held to repeal all fence laws, except in six specified counties, and to restore the rule of the common law, allowing owner of land, though not inclosed, to recover damages for trespassing by stock.

2. Animals ⊜100(1)—Remedy against owners for trespass not taken away by statute stock law.

Remedy by action for damages against owners of trespassing stock held not taken away by St. 1876, p. 210, merely providing a special remedy by proceeding against trespassing stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by T. W. Moran and others against William Freeman. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages caused by trespassing sheep, and the judgment was for plaintiffs in the sum of $408. Appellant states that the only point raised by him is that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint, and his contention is:

"That the complaint does not state a cause of action, because nowhere in said complaint is it alleged that the land upon which crops of the respondents were growing was, at the time of the alleged trespass, inclosed by a fence."

In that respect the averment of the complaint is:

"On or about the 12th day of February, 1919, plaintiffs were the owners of a growing crop of peas; * * * and on or about said date aforesaid, and while plaintiffs were such owners of said pea crop aforesaid, defendant did willfully and wrongfully suffer and permit his band of sheep, consisting of many hundreds in number, to trespass and feed upon said crop of peas, and did thereby tramp down, eat, and otherwise destroy said crop, to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $600."

[1] It is the claim of appellant that the rule of the common law, allowing the owner of real property to recover damages for trespassing of stock, although said real property may not be inclosed, was abrogated by the Legislature of this state in 1850, and has never been re-enacted, at least as far as Yuba county is concerned. He claims, further, that the only statute in reference to the matter which applies to said county is found in the Statutes of 1876, page 210. He proceeds to argue that this statute does not restore the common law, but provides only a special remedy, giving the owner of the land a right to take up and impound the trespassing stock, and in such case only has he the right to commence an action against the stock or the owner for damages. Appellant is in error in the claim that the rule of the common law is not applicable to said county. Whatever may have been the situation prior to that date, since August 8, 1915, the said rule of the common law has been in force in this state in all the counties except 6 thereof, not including Yuba county. This is by virtue of the statute passed by the Legislature May 20, 1915, and taking effect on said August 8, 1915, and found in the Statutes of 1915, page 636. That this statute is operative to restore the common-law rule has been distinctly decided by the Supreme Court in Montezuma Improvement Co. v. Simmerly, 189 Pac. 100. Therein the Supreme Court said:

"In answer to both of these arguments we are constrained to hold that the statute of 1915 which we have been considering does, by the very force of its terms, in view of the cited authorities, repeal all 'fence laws' in the counties of this state, * * * except in the 6 counties specified."

[2] Moreover, if we concede that said statute of 1876 is still in force in Yuba county, appellant is equally at fault in his claim that this action will not lie. It is to be observed that the right vouchsafed by said statute to the owner or occupant of any land finding stock doing or having done damage to such land applies, "whether said land be inclosed by a lawful fence or not so inclosed." It is to be observed, further, that it provides a special remedy by action against property in rem, and it does not purport to exclude the right of the owner of the land to proceed by personal action against the owner of the stock. In other words, in such cases the stock may be distrained damage feasant, or the ordinary action for the actual damage suffered by the owner of the land may be brought. The very point was decided in Triscony v. Bandenstein, 66 Cal. 514, 6 Pac. 384. Therein the court had under consideration a special trespass law applicable to Monterey county. Stats. 1873–74, p. 50. In that case, as in this, it was contended that the plaintiff had the right "to take up" cattle trespassing upon his land and hold them subject to the provisions of that law, and that his only remedy was to institute proceedings under that law against the cattle themselves and their owners. The Supreme Court said:

"But the fact of taking the cattle damage feasant was not alleged in the complaint, nor did it otherwise appear there. The complaint was not framed with reference to the statute, nor was the action founded upon it; therefore defendants could not, by a demurrer to what appears on the face of the complaint, invoke the statute against the complaint. Besides, the statute, which gives a remedy by process in rem against the cattle themselves, does not take away the remedy to recover damages from their owner for wrongs done by them, where they were not distrained damage feasant. And if there be anything which that statute bound the plaintiff to do in connection with his lands, upon which the alleged trespasses were committed, and he left it undone, it might be that the defendants could avail themselves of it as a defense to the action."

We think there is no merit in the appeal, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

48 Cal. App. 474

Ex parte MARINCOVICH. (Cr. 728.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 10, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⊜304(4)—That Santa Catalina is ordinarily called Catalina matter of common knowledge.

As against claim of one charged with violating the fishing laws in fish and game district No. 20 (described by St. 1917, p. 1061, § 47, as consisting of Catalina Island and certain waters), that there is no island along the coast so known, the court will notice that it is matter of common knowledge that Santa Catalina Island is ordinarily referred to simply as Catalina Island.

2. States ⊜12(3)—Unless granted to United States, state has jurisdiction over three-mile water limit.

The rule of international usage that a nation has exclusive jurisdiction over the waters adjacent to its shores for a width of three miles is applicable to a state, save only as control may have been granted to the United States.

3. Fish ⊜8—State's jurisdiction over three-mile water belt extends to fisheries.

The jurisdiction of the state over the three-mile belt of waters adjacent to its shores extends to control over fisheries.

4. States ⊜12(3)—Unless excluded by Constitution, state has jurisdiction over three-mile belt around its islands.

Unless excluded by its Constitution, the state's jurisdiction extends to the waters for a width of three miles around each of the islands along and adjacent to its shores.

5. Constitutional law ⊜26—State's Constitution to be construed against divesting it of its prerogatives.

A state's Constitution is to be construed strictly in its favor, and as not divesting it of any of its prerogatives, unless intention so to do is clearly expressed.

6. States ⊜12(3)—Constitution does not exclude from state's boundaries and jurisdiction waters for three miles around its islands.

Const. art. 21, is not to be construed as excluding from the state's boundaries, and so from its jurisdiction, the three-mile belt of water around each of its offshore islands, merely because, after giving its boundaries as extending three miles into the ocean, it adds merely, "also including all the islands, harbors, and bays along and adjacent to the coast," without saying anything as to the waters around the islands.

7. Fish ⊜9—No uncertainty in boundaries of fish and game district No. 20; "state waters."

There is no uncertainty in the definition by St. 1917, p. 1061, § 47, of fish and game district No. 20, as including Catalina Island and the portions of the state waters within certain lines, "state waters" meaning the three-mile zone around such island, especially in view of section 48, defining district No. 20A as consisting of the portion of the state waters around that island not included in district No. 20.

8. Fish ⊜8 — Amendment of Constitution leaves power in state to regulate deep-sea fishing.

Const. art. 1, § 25, added by amendment of 1910, and providing that the people shall have the right to fish on public state lands, and that no such lands shall be transferred without reservation of such right, provided that the Legislature may regulate time and conditions of fishing, adds nothing to the rights of the people as to deep-sea fishing, and in no way detracts from the power of the Legislature to regulate it.

9. Fish ⊜8—Legislature may regulate fishing, so long as there is no discrimination.

Within the limitations of the Constitution against discrimination, the Legislature, for the protection of fish, may pass such laws as it deems wise.

10. Statutes ⊂⊃110½(2)—Act as to fishing embraces but one subject, expressed in the title.

St. 1919, p. 420, entitled "An act to amend" Pen. Code, § 636, "relating to the protection of fish and game," complies with Const. art. 4, § 24, by embracing but one subject, expressed in the title.

11. Statutes ⊂⊃77(3)—Fishing regulation for single district not local or special legislation.

Pen. Code, § 636, as amended by St. 1919, p. 420, regulating fishing in a single district, is not local or special legislation, which is violative of Const. art. 4, § 25, in view of section 25½, added in 1902, authorizing the division of the state into fish and game districts, and the enactment of such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as may be deemed appropriate to the respective districts.

Original application by Tony Marincovich for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

C. W. Pendleton and Henry E. Carter, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thos. Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., and W. J. Clark, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Petitioner was arrested for a violation of section 636 of the Penal Code. He is charged with having had in his possession, in fish and game district No. 20, a net measuring more than 6 feet in its greatest breadth and which was not a dip net for taking fish to be used as bait only. He attacks the constitutionality of this Code section, particularly in so far as it relates to fish and game district No. 20, claiming that California has no jurisdiction over the waters referred to as "state waters" in the statutory definition of fish and game district No. 20 (Stats. 1917, p. 1061); that the statutory description of that district is fatally indefinite and uncertain; and that section 636 violates section 25 of article 1 and section 24 and subdivision 2 of section 25 of article 4 of the state Constitution. We think that none of these contentions is tenable.

Section 636 provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to have in his possession, in fish and game district No. 20, any net other than a dip net for taking fish to be used as bait, and that such dip net for catching bait shall not measure more than 6 feet in its greatest breadth. Section 636, Penal Code, as amended July 22, 1919 (Stats. 1919, pp. 422, 423). By the act of July 27, 1917, whereby the state is divided into fish and game districts, districts 20 and 20A are described as follows:

"Sec. 47. Fish and game district twenty shall consist of and include Catalina Island and that portion of the state waters lying between a line extending south from the southeasterly shore in line with and intersecting South East rock; thence around the east end to the north side of a line extending west from the extreme west end of said island.

"Sec. 48. Fish and game district twenty 'A' shall consist of and include that portion of the state waters around Catalina Island not included in fish and game district twenty."

Stats. 1917, p. 1061.

[1] There is no merit in petitioner's claim that there is no island along or adjacent to our coast known as Catalina Island. It doubtless is true, as petitioner says, that the correct name of this island is its old and original Spanish name, "Santa Catalina Island"; but we may not close our eyes and ears to facts of common knowledge, and this court cannot affect to be ignorant of the fact that probably as many as 9 out of every 10 persons met with on the street, when speaking of this island, refer to it simply as "Catalina Island," and seldom, if ever, give the full, original Spanish name. It is due to petitioner to say that he does not urge his hypercriticism with any great degree of strenuousness. His principal contention, as we understand it, is that there are no "state waters" around this island over which the state has jurisdiction to regulate fishing.

[2-4] Unless the people of the state, in their definition of the state's boundary as contained in article 21 of the Constitution, have decreed otherwise, the sovereignty and jurisdiction of California extends over a belt of water, 3 miles wide, circling the island, and the waters of such belt are territorial waters of the state; they are the "state waters" referred to in the statutory definition of fish and game district 20. If the extent of California's jurisdiction is to be determined according to the general rule, based upon usage uniformly recognized by the law of nations, there can be no doubt that it includes a zone of water, 3 miles wide, around Catalina Island. All the writers upon public law agree that every nation has exclusive jurisdiction over the waters adjacent to its shores to a distance of 3 miles from shore, or, as it is frequently expressed, "the distance of a cannon shot from shore." The distance of 3 geographical miles was fixed at a time when no gun could force a ball farther. This rule of international usage is applicable to California just as though it were an independent, sovereign nation, save only that its right of exclusive control over such waters is limited in so far as control may have been granted to the United States. Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S. 234, 11 Sup. Ct. 559, 35 L. Ed. 159; Humboldt L. M. Ass'n v. Christopherson, 73 Fed. 239, 19 C. C. A. 481, 46 L. R. A. 264. In Wheaton, International Law (8th Ed.) § 177, the maritime territorial jurisdiction of an independent nation is defined as follows:

"The maritime territory of every state extends to the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands belonging to the same state. The general usage of nations superadds to this extent of territorial jurisdiction a distance of a marine league, or so far as a cannon shot will reach from the shore along the coasts of the state. Within these limits its right of property and territorial jurisdiction are absolute, and exclude those of every other nation."

The dominion of the state or nation over the seas adjoining its shores is for the purpose of protecting its coast from the effects of hostilities between other nations which may be at war, the protection of its revenue, and the preservation of order by its police. Included in this territorial jurisdiction is the right of control over fisheries, whether the fish be migratory, free-swimming fish, or fish attached to or embedded in the soil. Massachusetts v. Manchester, 152 Mass. 230, 25 N. E. 113, 9 L. R. A. 236, 23 Am. St. Rep. 820; Manchester v. Massachusetts, supra; Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray (Mass.) 268; Humboldt L. M. Ass'n v. Christopherson, supra; notes to State v. Shaw, 67 Ohio St. 157, 65 N. E. 875, 60 L. R. A. 481 et seq.; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. of L. (2d Ed.) 1132; 33 Cyc. 830.

There is just as much reason for the extension of state sovereignty over a 3-mile belt around Catalina Island as there is for the extension of sovereignty over a 3-mile zone along and off the shore of the mainland. In the one case, as in the other, such jurisdiction is necessary to an adequate exercise of the state's police powers and to protect the coast from the effects of hostilities by other nations at war. That a state's sovereignty extends over a 3-mile belt around islands that lie along and adjacent to its shores was evidently the opinion of Secretary Bayard, who, in 1886, wrote to Mr. Manning, the then Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

"We may therefore regard it as settled * * * that, so far as concerns the eastern coast of North America, the position of this department has uniformly been that the sovereignty of the shore does not, so far as territorial authority is concerned, extend beyond 3 miles from low-water mark, and that the seaward boundaries of this zone of territorial waters follows the coast of the mainland, extending where there are islands so as to place around such islands the same belt." (Italics ours.)

See 1 Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 32.

We conclude, therefore, that, unless the people of the state, in their definition of the state's boundary as set forth in article 21 of the Constitution, have deliberately excluded such waters from the territory over which the state's sovereignty extends, the state has jurisdiction over a belt of water, three miles wide, around each of the islands that lie along and adjacent to our shores.

[5, 6] We have no fault to find with petitioner's contention that the sovereignty and jurisdiction of this state extend only to such places as are within its boundaries as established by the Constitution. Pol. Code, § 33. But we do not think that the boundary of California, as defined in the Constitution, necessarily precludes the idea that the state has sovereignty and jurisdiction over a 3-mile belt of waters around each of the islands along and adjacent to the coast. Article 21, of the Constitution, in its definition of California's boundary, after tracing it to a line between the United States and Mexico, proceeds as follows:

"Thence running west and along said boundary line to the Pacific Ocean, and extending therein three English miles; thence running in a northwesterly direction and following the direction of the Pacific Coast to the forty-second degree of north latitude; thence on the line of said forty-second degree of north latitude to the place of beginning; also, including all the islands, harbors, and bays along and adjacent to the coast."

Because this language of the state's organic law expressly extends the boundary of the mainland 3 miles into the ocean, and does not similarly and expressly extend the seaward boundary of the islands that are along and adjacent to the coast, it is argued that it was not intended that the boundary of any of these offshore islands should include any surrounding zone or belt of ocean waters.

It is a universally recognized canon of construction that laws in derogation of sovereignty shall be construed strictly in favor of the state, and should not be permitted to divest the state or its government of any of its prerogatives, unless the intention to effect that object is clearly expressed. As we already have pointed out, California, according to the decisions of the federal Supreme Court and the opinions of writers on international law, acquired, on her admission to the Union, the sovereignty of an independent nation over a zone of waters 3 miles wide extending along the mainland, and also over similar zones or belts around the islands along and adjacent to her coast, unless, by her own definition of her boundary, the state has deliberately excluded such waters from her territory and jurisdiction. In defining its boundary in its organic law, the state has not expressly said that it shall not include any zones or belts of waters around the islands that lie along and adjacent to the coast. Nor has the state, in its definition of her boundary, clearly and unequivocally expressed an intention to reject that sovereignty which, unless clearly renounced by her, she rightfully has over a belt of water, 3 miles wide, girdling each of such islands. We are satisfied, therefore, that under the canon of construction to which we have adverted it must be held that the state's sovereignty extends over a belt of water, 3 miles wide, around each of such islands, and that such waters are the "state waters" referred to in the statutory definition of fish and game district 20. The same conclusion was reached by division one of the District Court of Appeal for this district in the recently decided case of Suttori v. Peckham, 191 Pac. 960.

[7] There is no uncertainty in the statutory definition of fish and game district 20. Santa Catalina Island, or, as it is popularly known, Catalina Island, is an island in the Pacific Ocean situated about 7 leagues off the mainland of Southern California, and separated therefrom by the Santa Barbara Channel. It is a part of Los Angeles county. The island extends in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction; its longitudinal course, in a general way, paralleling the shore line of the mainland. As will be recalled, the act whereby the state is divided into fish and game districts defines, in section 47, district 20 as consisting of the island and "that portion of the state waters lying between a line extending south from the southeasterly shore in line with and intersecting South East rock; thence around the east end to the north side of a line extending west from the extreme west end of said island." There is no ambiguity or uncertainty here. For reasons already stated, the "state waters" referred to by the act consist of a zone of waters, 3 miles wide, surrounding the island. That, by the words "that portion of the state waters," as that phrase is used in section 47 of the act, the Legislature intended to refer to a portion of the 3-mile belt or girdle of ocean waters that encompasses the island of Catalina, and not some other island or place, is made manifest by the fact that in the next section—section 48—it is said that fish and game district 20A shall consist of "that portion of the state waters around Catalina Island not included in fish and game district 20." The "portion of the state waters" that comprises fish and game district 20 consists, therefore, of that segment of the 3-mile belt around the island which lies between a line extended due south from the rock known as South East rock and a line extended due west from the most westerly extremity, or northwesterly end, of the island. A glance at any map will show that the "state waters" between these two lines are those "state waters"—that is, zone of waters 3 miles wide—that extend along and seaward from the southwesterly, or windward, side of the island, and face the mid-Pacific Ocean. The remaining portion of the "state waters" that comprise the 3-mile belt around the island is in fish and game district 20A.

[8, 9] There is no conflict between section 636 of the Penal Code and section 25, article 1, of the Constitution—added by the amendment of 1910. By this amendment to the organic law the people were given no right, with respect to deep-sea fishing, not previously possessed by them. Paladini v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 369, 173 Pac. 588. Wild game (included within which is fish—People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183) always has belonged to all the people of the state. It is evident, therefore, that what the people of the state own they can alienate on such terms as they choose to impose, and that the Legislature, as the law-making representative of all the people, may dispose of the fish in the state's deep-sea waters on such terms as to it may seem best, subject only to the constitutional limitations against discrimination. Within those limitations, the Legislature, for the protection of fish, may pass such laws as to it may seem most wise. The measures best adapted to that end are for the Legislature to determine, and the courts cannot review its discretion. Ex parte Kenneke, 136 Cal. 527, 69 Pac. 261, 89 Am. St. Rep. 177; In re Phoedovius, 177 Cal. 238, 242, 170 Pac. 412.

"The ownership being in the people of the state, the repository of the sovereign authority, and no individual having any property rights to be affected, it necessarily results that the Legislature, as the representative of the people of the state, may withhold or grant to individuals the right to hunt and kill game, or qualify or restrict, as in the opinions of its members will best subserve the public welfare." Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 533, 16 Sup. Ct. 600, 606 (40 L. Ed. 793).

It has been held that a statute making it unlawful to fish in the waters of the state, with intent to sell or trade the fish after they are caught, is not unconstitutional, even though the act benefits none but wealthy sportsmen. State v. Dow, 70 N. H. 286, 47 Atl. 734, 53 L. R. A. 314. In this New Hampshire case the court, holding that the act was not discriminatory, employed this language:

"It is not apparent in what way the defendant is denied any right granted to others. If they [the wealthy sportsmen] may fish, so may he [the defendant]; and the prohibition of his fishing with intent to sell the fish to them equally enjoins them from fishing with intent to sell their fish to him. 'The statute makes no discrimination. * * * Everybody is prohibited.' True it is that the prohibition affects some more than others. 'Such is necessarily the effect of all restrictive laws. * * * The equality of the Constitution is the equality of persons, and not of places; the equality of right, and not of enjoyment. A law that confers equal rights on all citizens of the state, or subjects them to equal burdens, and inflicts equal penalties on every person who violates it, is an equal law.'"

These principles were not changed by the addition of section 25 to article 1 of the Constitution. The principal purpose of that amendment was to preserve to the people the right to fish upon the public lands of the state, and to require that grants of land by the state should not be made "without reserving to the people the absolute right to fish thereon." The proviso of the section authorizing the Legislature to fix "the season when and the conditions under which the different species of fish may be taken" was intended to leave the matter exactly as it was before the section was added, except as it restricted the power to alienate the public land without such reservation or to create private fisheries thereon. Paladini v. Superior Court, supra.

[10, 11] The title to the act whereby section 636 was last amended does not violate the requirement of section 24, article 4, of the Constitution, that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in the title. The title of the act whereby the section was last amended reads: "An act to amend section six hundred and thirty-six of the Penal Code, relating to the protection of fish and game." Stats. 1919, p. 420. The act relates wholly to the "protection of fish and game," and nothing else. It comprises but one subject, and that subject the protection of fish and game, is expressed in its title. Nor is the section amenable to the objection that it is local or special legislation, and therefore violative of subdivision 2 of section 25 of article 4. Section 25½ of article 4 of the Constitution, added in 1902, reads:

"The Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and may enact such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts."

The purpose of this section is to remove certain of the restrictions, imposed by the preceding section, against local and special legislation, by specifically authorizing local legislation for the protection of fish and game. Paladini v. Superior Court, supra.

We see no ground upon which the legislation that is made the object of petitioner's attack may be held invalid.

Petitioner is remanded, and the writ discharged.

48 Cal. App. 654

PEOPLE v. LEJKOJES. (Cr. 890.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⟸935(1)—Trial judge should set aside conviction, unless satisfied it was sustained by the evidence.

The trial judge, who presided at both trials of defendant, and who set aside the verdict of conviction in the first trial because not sustained by evidence, should have set aside the second verdict also, unless he was satisfied that it was sustained by the evidence.

2. Criminal law ⟸1144(18)—Refusal to set aside conviction presumed proper.

The discretion vested in the trial court to grant or refuse a new trial is presumed to have been lawfully exercised, and, despite the leniency which courts habitually show to those charged with crime, every intendment is in favor of the regularity of the trial court's action in denying a new trial after conviction, the same as it would be in favor of his action in granting a new trial.

3. Arson ⟸37(1)—May be established by circumstantial evidence.

Arson, like other crimes, may, and must frequently, be proved by circumstantial evidence.

4. Criminal law ⟸552(3)—Circumstantial evidence need not be absolutely incompatible with innocence.

Circumstantial evidence, to be sufficient to sustain a conviction, need not be absolutely incompatible with the innocence of accused, and incapable of explanation on any other reasonable hypothesis; the true rule being that the facts shall not only be consistent with the guilt of accused, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion.

5. Arson ⟸37(1) — Circumstantial evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Circumstantial evidence held sufficient to sustain the conviction of defendant for burning the house in which he was staying, notwithstanding facts in evidence claimed to show the guilt of others.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin Griffin, Judge.

Max Lejkojes was convicted of arson, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Martin Stevens, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BRITTAIN, J. The appellant, who was convicted of arson, appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. It is conceded that the fire was of incendiary origin and that the appellant had an opportunity to commit the crime.

Because of the circumstantial character of the evidence, the appellant contends the verdict should have been set aside on the ground that the possibility of the crime having been committed by another was not excluded.

[1] The entire record has been examined with painstaking care, and the conclusion has been reached that this court ought not set aside the verdict. It was disclosed on the part of the appellant that the case had been tried before, and that the verdict of guilty on the first trial had been set aside on motion for a new trial. The same judge presided at the second trial. Like the jurors, he heard and saw the witnesses. Unless he was satisfied that it was sustained by the evidence, it was his duty to set aside the second verdict, as he did the first. People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 Pac. 166; People v. Chew Wing Gow, 120 Cal. 298, 52 Pac. 657.

[2] The discretion vested in the trial court to grant a new trial is presumed to have been lawfully exercised. People v. Hotz, 73 Cal. 241, 14 Pac. 856; People v. Brooks, 90 Cal. 174, 27 Pac. 72. In criminal cases these rules are more frequently invoked in favor of the accused than on the part of the state, but despite the leniency which courts habitually show to those charged with crime, after a jury has reached a verdict of guilty, on appeal every intendment is in favor of the regularity and propriety of the action of the trial court in denying, as in granting, a motion for a new trial.

[3, 4] Arson, like other crimes, may and frequently must be proved by circumstantial evidence. People v. Scott, 13 Cal. App. 301, 109 Pac. 498; People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 239, 31 Pac. 52; People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142. The law does not require, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt in cases of circumstantial evidence, that the existence of inculpatory facts must be absolutely incompatible with the innocence of the accused, and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt. The true rule is that the facts shall not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. People v. Murray, 41 Cal. 66; People v. Davis, 64 Cal. 440, 1 Pac. 889; People v. Bellamy, 109 Cal. 610, 42 Pac. 236.

[5] In applying these rules to the facts shown by the evidence, it is not necessary to recite every circumstance disclosed in a trial in which the taking of evidence occupied five days. While all the circumstances must be considered, where the accused and the people rely upon different and unrelated trains of circumstances to reach opposed conclusions, the outstanding facts in each train may be best understood if stated separately.

The property where the fire occurred was owned by a Mrs. Larson, aged 52. For many years she had been a widow. She had one child, a daughter, aged 26, at the time of the fire. The property had been purchased under an installment contract in 1914, and the final payment was not made until some time in 1918. Title was then transferred to Mrs. Larson, who assumed a mortgage of $2,000 on the property. At that time the insurance policy for $3,000 held by the mortgagee was assigned to Mrs. Larson. At the time of the fire the mortgage debt had been reduced to about $1,800. The building was an old one, and on the adjustment of the fire loss its value was established at $3,500. The insurance adjustment covered the loss from three fires, which occurred, respectively, on April 1, April 29, and June 8, 1919. The present accusation relates only to the fire of April 1.

Before moving to the house which was burned, on California street, near Tenth avenue, in San Francisco, in 1914, Mrs. Larson, with her daughter, lived in a larger house on Folsom street. In 1907 the accused became a member of her family, or at least rented a room in her house, with the privilege of cooking his own meals in its basement; but sometimes he was invited to eat his meals with Mrs. Larson and her daughter. He was a vegetarian, and preferred to cook his own meals. He moved with the Larsons to the California street house, and continued to live there until the fire of April 1, 1919. In November, 1918, Mrs. Larson rented another house on Clay street, to which she moved with her daughter; the appellant remaining in the California street house. The Clay street house was about the same size as the Folsom street house, but the Larsons did not move their belongings at once. At intervals between November and the time of the fire, four months later, they moved many small loads of furniture and boxes. In March, 1919, while still occupying the Clay street house, Mrs. Larson rented, but neither she nor her daughter moved to, another house on Pine street, to which some of the things from the California street house were moved. During the four months the Larsons were moving they were frequently at the California street house, and Miss Larson was there with the appellant on Wednesday and Thursday preceding the fire, which occurred about 2 o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, April 1, 1919.

On the evening of March 31 a Mrs. Harrington, living next door to the Larson house, had a visitor, who called attention to noises in the Larson house, in the room close to that in which they were sitting. The son of Mrs. Harrington, who had been twice married, was the witness Schaeffer, a member of the fire department, and the first person to enter the house after the fire was discovered. About 2 o'clock in the morning the witness Cowing, a letter carrier, who was returning from his work to his home adjoining the Harrington house, saw smoke coming from the upper windows of the Larson house. His wife was sick. He first aroused her, and then rang the Harrington bell, believing the occupants of those houses to be in danger. After hurriedly telling them there was a fire next door, he ran to the fire alarm box in the next block, where he turned in the alarm, returning at once to the scene of the fire.

When Cowing returned, the appellant was at the bottom of the front steps, apparently fully dressed, and wearing his hat. He deposited on the sidewalk a large bundle, which was later found to contain bedding. The appellant walked to a side door leading to the basement. Cowing got to the door about the same time. There was heavy smoke issuing from the door. Cowing then heard the appellant say, not in a loud tone, "Fire! Fire!" A moment later Schaeffer, who had partly dressed, entered the basement at the side door, but was compelled to withdraw by reason of the smoke and pungent fumes. While inside he saw two distinct fires burning, and it was later discovered there were three such fires in the basement alone.

After the arrival of the chemical engine, the basement fires and others on the first and second floors were extinguished. While the firemen were still in the house, where they had been joined by the acting fire marshal, a policeman saw the appellant approaching the house, and at first stopped him; but, on being told that the appellant lived there, he accompanied him into the house. The appellant was taken to the fire marshal, and his answers to questions then asked him were such that the marshal directed the policeman to arrest him on the charge of arson.

The whole house was littered with tin cans, bottles, and paper. At various places were what the marshal called "plants," meaning easily fired materials piled together, with the appearance of having been placed for the purpose of incendiarism. Sliding doors had been pulled out, and the space behind them stuffed with papers and rags. At other places, old wooden inside blinds had been chopped to pieces and piled around similar kindlings of paper. There were a number of these so-called plants, some of which had been ignited, while some were unburned. There was a strong odor of alcohol, and uncorked bottles of alcohol, filled or partly filled, were found placed close to the plants, or some of them. One of the plants, in which there was a partly burned candle, was at the door of the bathroom, adjoining the room occupied by the appellant. A section of flooring, making a hole about 32 inches by 3 feet, had been removed from a closet under the stairway, making a draft from the basement to the first floor.

The appellant testified in his own behalf, and his story did not differ greatly from that he told to the fire marshal and the policeman. He said he went to the house early in the evening before the fire, and, the hall being dark, he went at once to his room. He did not enter the bathroom. He was cold, and, on removing his other clothing, he retained his undershirt, putting his pajama shirt on other that. He was suffering from chilblains, and, after removing his stockings, he anointed his feet and put on others. This statement is important, because the fact that he had had time to put on his socks after discovering the fire was commented on by the fire marshal, and the socks he said he had removed were neither in the bundle he carried out, nor were they discovered in a subsequent search of his room, which was untouched by the fire. If they had been discovered, they would no doubt have been produced, as were other things discovered in his room by his counsel. He further stated that he had had trouble with his ears, and before going to bed he had put some medicament in them, and had then closed them with absorbent cotton. He was awakened, and perceived the odor of smoke. He did not know from whence it came; but, as it became stronger, he arose, pulled on his trousers and shoes, and in the dark gathered together such clothing and bedding as he could in a bundle made of a part of the bedding, put on his hat, and unlocked the door of his room. On going into the hall he discovered the fire was in the house from which he was fleeing with his bundle. He went downstairs to the front door, but did not immediately open it. He stopped at the door in the dark to put on his coat and vest. He then unlocked the front door and went out. He saw Cowing, the letter man, and stated that he at once called "Fire! Fire!" He took his bundle down the front steps, and then went around to the side door. Some time before, the lock to this door having been broken, he had braced the door, so that it could not be opened from the outside; but he went there, in his excitement, and pushed it open, only to be driven back by the smoke. When he told his story, the fire marshal commented on his stockings. He was taken to his room, but did not make the explanation concerning the chilblains, nor point out the socks he had removed. When the fire marshal spoke of his shoes being laced, he said he had laced them while he was on the sidewalk. In regard to the hole in the flooring, he said he was building a stairway, and, when the marshal said no one had ever seen a stairway opening of that size, the appellant replied that he was building it on the installment plan. Notwithstanding the fact that the appellant's employer and one of his coemployés testified that, for the 11 years he had been in the employ of one concern as a cabinet maker, his duties had been faithfully performed, and that his reputation for veracity was good, the circumstances detailed were at least consistent with the guilt of the appellant. To sustain the conviction, however, the evidence must also have been inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis.

Under the facts of the case, the only other hypotheses suggested are that the appellant was insane, but this is denied by him; that the fire was the work of boys or other vandals, not actuated by motives of malice, but the careful preparation for the fire, which the marshal testified would have taken a man at least a full day, removes this theory from the realm of rationalism; that the fire was started by or at the instance of the owner, for the purpose of collecting the insurance, without the knowledge of the appellant, but it is inconceivable that after 12 years' intimate acquaintance with him, these multiple fires would have been started in the lower part of a house in which he was known to be sleeping. The only rational conclusion, based upon any assumption of a purpose of collecting insurance, is that the appellant must have been a party to the crime. But one other hypothesis is advanced. It is that the fire was started by those designated in the evidence of Mrs. Larson as I. W. W.'s, or pro-Germans, and it is upon this that the appellant places his strongest plea for reversal.

After the Larsons moved, or started to move, to the Clay street house, they had as roomers a Mrs. Parsons and her son. Mrs. Larson testified they told her the son was a fugitive from justice, who had been arrested in Chicago as a slacker from military service. About two weeks before the fire, she testified, she reported the son to the officers of the government, and he was arrested. On the same day the mother left the house. The son was discharged from custody, and the whereabouts of the Parsonses were unknown at the time of the trial. On March 27, which was the day Miss Larson last visited the house with the appellant, there was mailed in San Francisco an anonymous typewritten note, addressed to Mrs. Larson, reading as follows:

"You are stuck on the federals aint you—we will fix you so cutey that you never know what happened to you, report the slackers will you do it again and the Irish."

There were three other typewritten anonymous letters produced at the trial. There was a suggestion that Parsons had used the typewriter owned by Miss Larson, and which both she and her mother used; but these letters could not have been written before his arrest on the charge of Mrs. Larson, and he had no access to the machine afterwards. The language of the first note is unusual in its reference to "the federals." In her testimony Mrs. Larson, in response to a question by the attorney for the appellant about Parsons, said:

"He was a slacker, and was a fugitive from the federal—from Chicago—and was in hiding."

Again:

"His mother said they were hiding, and were very much afraid the federals would catch them."

Again:

"He was later indicted by the federals of—what do you call it—slacker?"

The insurance policy was not canceled immediately after the first fire. The appellant was released on bonds, and took up his abode in the Pine street house alone; Mrs. Parsons and her daughter remaining in the Clay street house. On April 10 another anonymous letter was mailed. It referred to the collection, presumably of insurance money. A third letter, with an indistinct post date, probably mailed before the one of April 10, spoke of "this last one" as an April fool joke. On April 29 strangers in the city, who were desirous of seeing Chinatown, went with Mrs. Larson, Miss Larson, and the appellant, to Oakland, to see a moving picture of Chinatown instead. They returned to the Clay street house about midnight, and were then informed that the California street house had again been set on fire. They had refreshments, and the next afternoon Miss Larson went to the California street house to ascertain the character of the injury. There was no direct evidence concerning the Oakland trip, other than their own. On May 19 the last of the anonymous letters was mailed. It referred to things happening to Germans who came to Mrs. Larson four years before, and said that two of them had committed suicide "rather than be giving evidence against the peoples." There were references to Lenine and Trotzsky, and to burning. The last fire occurred on June 8. The insurance was then canceled, and thereafter there were neither any more fires at the California street house nor any more anonymous letters.

There was no offer of evidence that anything had happened to any Germans, or that Mrs. Larson had any communication with the federals, as she called the government agents, except in connection with the arrest of Parsons, who was released. The appellant, though he had been for many years a resident of the United States, was born in East Prussia, and was registered as an alien enemy, yet he was not only left in charge of the property of Mrs. Larson, but after the first trial she employed as her own counsel the gentleman who was substituted as the attorney for the appellant.

There are certain other circumstances which the jury had the right to and no doubt did consider, in connection with the claim of pro-German or I. W. W. activities. When the Larsons moved from California street to Clay street, the gas was turned off from the house; but the electric service was continued. All the light bulbs but one were then removed. It was left in a fixture in the second story hall just outside of the room occupied by the appellant. The appellant moved his cooking utensils then from the basement to a room adjoining his sleeping room. He had a stove or range burning oil or gasoline. In his bedroom were various articles of furniture for his comfort. There were curtains both at the window and across an alcove to form a closet for his clothing. There were cheap pictures on the walls, and rugs on the floor, so that, but for the fact of his being alone, he was in a very comfortable nest. There was, perhaps, a reason for his locking the door of his sleeping room on the night of the fire. The back basement door could not be locked, and any stroller might have entered the basement, and by way of the hole in the floor have gained the first floor, from which he would have had the run of the house.

The moving, having been carried on for four months or more, had been about completed, and on the Wednesday before the fire Miss Larson removed all the furniture, except his cot, from the appellant's rooms. She took away his oil stove and cooking utensils and all his personal belongings, except an alarm clock and an old discarded coat. She took the curtains, rugs, even the cheap pictures from the walls; but she left, as they had been left during the four months when no one was in the house during the day, in the front room, locked with a common lock, in the basement that any stroller might enter, a number of boxes, a Circassian walnut bedstead worth $350, and several large paintings by famous artists, which she valued at $800. These things she testified were there on Wednesday and on Thursday, when she went back to get a jardiniére or two, and carried away the last remaining light bulb. On the morning of the fire, when she visited the place with her mother, the boxes, the bedstead, and the paintings were gone, and in their place were the dead branches of an acacia tree which had grown in the yard. There was no insurance on these valuable things, but shortly before the fire there was a 10 days' covering note on the contents of the house, for $1,000. It was allowed to lapse, because most of the furniture had been removed to the California street house, notwithstanding the boxes in the basement and the bedstead and pictures. Miss Larson testified further that, after the $3,000 policy was assigned, she learned that there was a mistake in the rate of insurance, and she visited the insurance office, and had the rate corrected. At that time, she further testified, the man told her that, of the $3,000 insurance, $1,000 was on the household furniture of the persons from whom her mother bought, and that she had that $1,000 canceled, reducing the policy to $2,000. Because her mother had expended $700 in improvements in the house, she had had the policy increased to $3,000. The policy was introduced in evidence. It was for the term of three years from April 2, 1918. It was for $3,000 on the improvements, with nothing on any furniture. It was never reduced to $2,000, and never reraised to $3,000. It would be a work of supererogation to go further with the analysis of the evidence. That introduced on behalf of the appellant was full of contradictions and palpable misstatements, of fantastic explanation and improbable stories. The jury simply did not believe the stories on which the theory of the I. W. W. or pro-German intervention was based.

The appellant claims he is the victim of a made case by the acting fire marshal and the arresting policeman, and bases this charge upon the facts that after both the first and second fires the marshal, in endeavoring to surprise a confession, made admittedly false statements to both the appellant and to Mrs. Larson. Regardless of the evil of such statements, which are far too common with those charged with the duty of investigating crimes, the particular statements do not in any way bear on this case, except as to the credit which the jury gave the evidence of the marshal and the policeman. The jury saw them and heard them, and was the judge of their credibility as witnesses under oath.

In view of the entire record, the circumstances submitted to the jury meet every requirement of the law to support the verdict. In such a case this court cannot reverse the judgment, nor declare as a matter of law that the trial judge was guilty of any abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial. The various matters in which it is claimed that the court erred in the admission and exclusion of evidence have been examined, although neither argument nor citation of authority is made to support the claims. The contentions have been fully answered in the brief of the Attorney General. They are entirely devoid of merit, and do not warrant serious discussion.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are both affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COSGROVE. (Cr. 902.)

1. Criminal law ⟸274, 1149—Withdrawal of plea of guilty rests in discretion of court.

The granting of an application to withdraw a plea of guilty to a charge of murder, under Pen. Code, § 1018, rests in the discretion of the trial court, which can be reviewed only for abuse of discretion, accused having no absolute right to withdraw his plea.

2. Criminal law ⟸980(2) — After vacating judgment on plea of guilty, court need not again determine degree.

Where the court granted defendant's motion to vacate a judgment sentencing him for murder in the first degree after his plea of guilty had been entered, but refused permission to substitute a plea of not guilty, it need not again determine the degree of guilt from evidence then introduced, before passing a new judgment and sentence upon defendant.

3. Criminal law ⟸980(2)—In determining degree of guilt on plea of guilty, court can disregard defendant's testimony showing provocation.

In determining the degree of the offense, after defendant pleaded guilty to a charge of murder, the court could accept testimony of witnesses which showed that deceased was shot in the back by defendant without provocation, and find him guilty of first degree murder, disregarding his testimony, which tended to show a provocation, which he claimed reduced the offense to manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

James Cosgrove was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction and sentence to life imprisonment by the superior court for the county of Fresno on a plea of guilty upon a charge of murder. The information was filed March 27, 1917. On April 9, 1917, the defendant was arraigned on the charge and pleaded "not guilty." On May 3, 1917, "the defendant by his counsel asks and is granted leave to withdraw his plea heretofore entered herein. Defendant now waives time and orally pleads that he is guilty as charged in the information." On the same day the superior court rendered judgment on the plea of guilty, finding and specifying in the judgment that the crime was murder in the first degree. The evidence before the court upon this finding consisted of the transcript of the preliminary examination in this case and the inquisition of the coroner's jury. The district attorney made a statement of the facts to the court in substantial conformity to the testimony upon these two hearings, and the attorney for the defendant stipulated as to the correctness of the facts so stated by the district attorney.

Upon December 6, 1919, more than 2½ years after the judgment was rendered, the defendant made a motion to vacate and set aside said judgment upon the grounds: (1) That defendant was never arraigned for judgment, nor arraigned on the information. (2) That before passing sentence the court did not determine from evidence, nor from the facts, the degree of the crime. (3) That the judgment erroneously states an arraignment, and also erroneously states that defendant was sworn and testified to the degree of the crime. The motion to correct the minute entry of the judgment was made for the purpose of striking out the recitals and statement of an arraignment, for judgment, and also the statement that defendant was sworn and testified as to the degree of the crime. This motion was granted. The motion to vacate the judgment was also granted. The motion to withdraw the plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty was based upon the ground that in pleading guilty the defendant did so solely upon the misrepresentation made to him by his counsel that the Governor of the state would grant a pardon to him in 18 months. The trial court denied the motion to withdraw the plea of guilty and substitute the plea of not guilty.

Upon the judgment being vacated, the defendant made application for probation, and the same was referred to the probation officer, who later filed his report, recommending that the application be denied. The court adopted this report, and, after arraigning the defendant and stating that the degree of the crime (murder in the first degree) had been determined upon evidence before the rendition of the prior judgment, pronounced a new judgment on January 17, 1920, and sentenced the defendant to life imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin.

[1] The appellant argues, first, that under section 1018 of the Penal Code the right to withdraw a plea of guilty is conferred upon a defendant, and the application to withdraw such a plea must be granted as a matter of course. It is further argued that, though this be not true, and though discretion be vested in the trial court, nevertheless there was an abuse of discretion in the present case. It has been held that this is a matter entirely within the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling thereon will not be disturbed, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion. People v. Brown, 38 Cal. App. 46, 175 Pac. 85, and cases cited therein. We find no evidence of an abuse of discretion under the facts in evidence in the present case.

[2] The point made by the appellant that the court erred in not determining anew the degree of the crime, prior to pronouncing the second judgment, is without merit. It appears from the record, and indeed it is conceded, that the court took evidence and inquired into the degree of the crime prior to the pronouncement of the first sentence. The matter having once been determined, there was no occasion for a second examination into the facts.

[3] Appellant also takes the position that, assuming the trial court acted within the law in taking as a basis of the new sentence its prior determination of May 3, 1917, that the crime was murder in the first degree, nevertheless the evidence upon which the court made such determination utterly fails to show that the crime committed was murder in the first degree. In support of this last argument, appellant sums up the portion of the testimony before the coroner's jury and at the preliminary examination which is most favorable to his position, but fails to state the contradictory portions of the record, which evidently were more convincing to the trial court. The record shows that the defendant and his wife were separated, and she had obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from him. She was living with her mother in a two-room apartment, and both mother and daughter desired that the defendant should not come to their home. The mother had left the house for a few moments to make some purchases of groceries. During her absence, the defendant rang the bell; his former wife opened the door. She testified she had been ill for some time, and was then very ill, and was afraid of the defendant. His presence so frightened her that she began to cough violently, and went into the bathroom and closed the door, which locked with a spring lock. The defendant followed her to the door of the bathroom and tried to turn the knob of the door. At about this time the mother entered the apartment and defendant said to her: "Marie is having a coughing spell." The wife testified that she did not hear her mother make any reply, and does not think another word was said before the defendant fired the fatal shot. The mother was shot in the back when she turned, probably to put down her packages. The testimony of the grandchild of the deceased, who was the only eyewitness to the shooting, is also to the effect that his grandmother said nothing whatever to the defendant before he fired the shot.

The record shows that the defendant had been drinking intoxicating liquors earlier in the day upon which the shooting occurred, and there is also testimony that the defendant had been addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic liquors for several years. The deceased was shot with a revolver which the defendant had brought with him loaded to the apartment. The court was justified in believing the version of the occurrence contained in the testimony of the former wife of defendant and her child, at the preliminary examination and at the coroner's inquest. It was not bound to ignore this testimony, and accept the defendant's statement, upon which he relies upon appeal, to the effect that when the defendant greeted deceased with the statement, "Marie is having another coughing spell," deceased replied to him, "You here again; I am going to fix you." The appellant's position is that the court should have believed the deceased used this language, and that it so enraged the defendant, who had become abnormal from the use of alcohol, that he became insanely angry, and while in this condition fired the fatal shot. Appellant relies upon such an interpretation of the facts to make the offense manslaughter, instead of murder in the first degree.

We are of the opinion that the record contains evidence amply justifying the trial court in finding facts constituting murder in the first degree. There are no other matters urged by appellant which we consider merit discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. OF NEW YORK et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3303.)

Master and servant ⊂⊃375(2)—Compensation claimant's injury while on way to work, held not one "growing out of and incidental to employment."

An employé's injury was not received when "performing service growing out of and incident to his employment and acting within the course of his employment," as required by Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act; he for his own convenience having left his place of employment at a garage during his regular hours of employment, and having been injured while returning there after such hours to attend to some unfinished duties, ordinarily performed when on duty, though in addition to his fixed hours of employment he was subject to emergency calls.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

Award of compensation was made by the Industrial Accident Commission of California to Arthur H. Johnson, injured employé of the Pure Milk Dairy Company, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, insurance carrier, and the employer bring writ of review. Award annulled.

Jennings & Belcher, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Writ of review to determine the validity of an award, made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of one Arthur H. Johnson and against the Pure Milk Dairy Company, a corporation, and its insurance carrier.

The dairy company, as a distributor of milk in the city of San Diego, operated five automobile delivery wagons and maintained a garage for their care and repair. Johnson was employed as foreman of the garage, and was furnished with a Ford automobile to be used in connection with his employment. He was permitted to use the automobile incidentally for his personal convenience, and kept the automobile at his home during the time when he was at home. Johnson's regular hours of employment were from 7 a. m. until 6 p. m. He was also expected to respond to emergency calls at any time, and the company maintained a telephone at Johnson's home, in order that he might be called at any time when required out of the regular hours by the emergencies of the business.

On the 19th day of April, 1919, having in view some affairs relating solely to his personal convenience and pleasure, Johnson left the garage at about 5 o'clock in the evening and drove the Ford car to his home and to several other places in the performance of his personal errands. After attending to these matters he went to his home, took off his working clothes, and dressed for the purpose of keeping a social engagement of the evening. He then started from his home to the garage for the purpose of attending to some unfinished duties there prior to keeping said social engagement. On his way to the garage, in suddenly turning his car to avoid collision with a motorcycle, the car was overturned, and Johnson received the injuries for which he sought to obtain compensation, and on account of which an award was made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

The question for decision is tersely stated by counsel for petitioners as follows:

"Should compensation be awarded to an employé who, purely for his own purposes, leaves his place of employment before his day's work is finished and, several hours later, is injured upon the public streets when returning to his place of work?"

This question (except only that the applicant had not left his employer's place of business at an unusual time) was presented to this court in Zbinden v. Industrial Accident Commission, No. 1902. Compensation having been denied by the Industrial Accident Commission, the applicant applied for a writ of review. The petition was denied without written decision; this court being then of the opinion that, as determined by the commission, an accident occurring under the circumstances stated did not arise out of or happen in the course of the applicant's employment. The accident in that case consisted in a collision between an electric railway car and an automobile, in which the applicant was riding while on the way from his home to the place of employment. We think that that case was correctly determined, and it is directly in point in this case.

"In the very broadest sense, of course, it is true that an injury which happens to a man who is on his way to his place of employment is an injury 'growing out of and incidental to his employment,' since a necessary part of the employment is that the employé shall go to and return from his place of labor. But it is to be noted that the right to an award is not founded upon the fact that the injury grows out of and is incidental to his employment. It is founded upon the fact that the service he is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. Therefore an employé going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when, as has been said, arriving at the place of his employment, he proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his tasks." Ocean Accident, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 313, 322, 159 Pac. 1041, 1044 (L. R. A. 1917B, 336).

Under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), the employé is entitled to compensation for injuries received by him only where, at the time of the injury, the employé is "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and is acting within the course of his employment." In order to establish his right to compensation, the employé must affirmatively prove that at the time of the injury the condition existed which is thus described in the statute.

Respondents have endeavored to sustain the award made herein by suggesting that through the necessities of business there are two well-defined classes of employés, between whom there rests a sharp line of distinction; the first class consisting of men whose hours of labor are fixed, and who have little or no authority or responsibility, and the second class, consisting of "those individuals who are vested with both authority and responsibility, whose hours of labor are not sharply defined, and whose responsibility may call them to go upon their employers' business at any and all hours of the day or night." It is contended that Johnson belonged to the second class, and that he was "on duty 24 hours of the day, whenever the service of the company required, or when he was ordered, or when in his judgment something was required to be done for the company's welfare"; that therefore, since in his judgment it was necessary for him to go to the garage on the evening in question to see that certain things had been done, he should be regarded as having been occupied in his employer's service while on his way back to the garage.

We think that this contention results in a broad and indefinite description of Johnson's duties, not warranted by the evidence. The evidence shows without conflict that his hours of employment were fixed, although in addition thereto he was subject to call for duty at other hours when the work called for was such as could not be performed in the ordinary course of his daily duties at the garage. This is far from being an employment which kept him in the service of the company at all times and places. When he left the garage for his own convenience and pleasure, he was not engaged in the service of his employer, and would not be so engaged until his actual return to the place of employment, unless, possibly, in some exceptional instances, such as when he might be notified to repair or otherwise care for a milk wagon, which had broken down somewhere on the road. But there is no evidence that any such emergency had arisen. The sole claimed purpose of his intended return to the garage was for the performance of duties at that place, which were such duties as were ordinarily performed by him when on duty at the garage. The conclusion necessarily follows that the employé's injuries were not received at a time when he was performing service for his employer or acting within the course of his employment.

The award is annulled.

MANOOGIAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR IMPERIAL COUNTY.

(Civ. 3282.)

1. Certiorari ⟸31—Will not lie to review orders which have been fully executed by special administrator.

Certiorari will not issue to review orders directing a special administrator to make certain payments, even though those orders were void, where the payments have already been made and the special administrator was not a party to certiorari so that judgment against him for the payments could not be rendered.

2. Certiorari ⟸5(1)—Appeal from account by special administrator adequate remedy for void order authorizing payments.

If an order of the superior court authorizing a special administrator to make certain payments was void, it would not authorize him to credit himself with those payments on his account, so that a remedy by appeal from an order approving the account, if entered, would be adequate to protect those interested in the estate, and therefore certiorari will not issue to review the orders for payment.

3. Appeal and error ⟸843(2) — Appellate court will not decide question for benefit of lower court which affects person not party.

In denying certiorari to review orders directing payments by a special administrator which had been already made, the appellate court will not express its opinion for the benefit of the lower court as to the validity of those orders, which would affect the rights of the special administrator who was not a party to the proceedings for certiorari.

Application for certiorari by Mary Manoogian against the Superior Court for the County of Imperial to annul certain orders entered by that court. Writ dismissed.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for petitioner.

Ault & Anderson, of Calexico, and Guy L. Rockwell and H. B. Stewart, both of Brawley, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of review to annul two orders of the superior court of Imperial county, made in the Matter of the Estate of M. Manoogian, deceased, on, respectively, July 24, 1919, and March 3, 1920, and under which petitioner assumes that the special administrator claims authority for the payment by him of $6,000 commission for the picking, packing, shipping, and marketing of certain grapes, and the payment of the further sum of $9,000 to a certain bank to satisfy notes that the decedent, in his lifetime, had executed to the bank, and secured by a chattel mortgage on the grapes. No creditor's claim, as provided by section 1494 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was ever filed or presented for either of these disbursements. Petitioner claims that neither payment was authorized by the orders here sought to be annulled, for the reason that each order was, as she claims, in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

Petitioner is the widow of Manoog Manoogian, deceased, and as such one of his heirs. Her husband died intestate on July 7, 1918, leaving an estate in Imperial county consisting, in part, of a crop of perishable fruit, viz., a crop of grapes. This grape crop, the intestate, in his lifetime, had mortgaged to the American State Bank of Brawley to secure his notes to the bank for $12,000. At the time of his death the notes were overdue, and the bank, which had taken possession of the crop under the mortgage, was then actually engaged in picking, packing, shipping, and marketing the grapes. The intestate, prior to his death, had entered into a contract with J. Schoenburg Company to do the picking, packing, shipping, and marketing. On July 10, 1918, Peter P. Hovley was appointed special administrator. The original minute entry of the order appointing Hovley was no more than the entry of an order appointing him special administrator, and did not purport to confer upon him any special powers. The bank refused to deliver to the special administrator any of the grapes unless and until the balance due to it on the notes, amounting to about $9,000, was paid. Wherefore the special administrator filed in the superior court a petition setting forth the facts relative to the notes and mortgage to the bank and the bank's refusal to surrender possession of the grapes unless paid the balance due it; also, the defendant's arrangement with J. Schoenburg Company. Thereupon the court, on July 24, 1919, made its order, entered nunc pro tunc as of July 10, 1918, the date of Hovley's appointment, which, after reciting the facts set forth in the petition, is as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that Peter P. Hovley, special administrator of the estate of M. Manoogian, deceased, make such guaranty as shall be necessary to obtain possession from American State Bank of the aforesaid crop of grapes; that said special administrator proceed with the picking, packing, shipping and marketing of said grapes; that said crop of grapes be marketed through J. Schoenburg Company of Chicago, Ill., in accordance with the terms of a contract entered into by and between deceased and said J. Schoenburg Company prior to the death of deceased, and that said special administrator pay to said J. Schoenburg Company a commission of ——— per cent. (———%); that said special administrator be and he is hereby authorized and directed to make such other expenditures from the funds of said estate and from the returns of said crop of grapes as he shall find necessary for the proper care, picking, packing, shipping and marketing of said grapes, and for the benefit and profit of the estate of deceased."

This is one of the orders sought to be annulled by this proceeding.

Prior to the nunc pro tunc order so made on July 24, 1919, viz. in August 1918, the special administrator had paid the American State Bank of Brawley the balance due to it on decedent's notes, had received from the bank possession of the crop of grapes, and had picked, packed, shipped, and marketed them through said J. Schoenburg Company, paying the latter for its services about $6,000.

On March 3, 1920, the special administrator filed with the superior court affidavits showing that, at the time when he was appointed, the court had made an order conferring upon him authority to pay the bank the balance due to it, if necessary to do so in order to obtain possession of the grapes, and also to pay a commission to J. Schoenburg Company, but that, owing to a clerical error or oversight, such order was not entered in the minutes. Thereupon the superior court ordered the clerk to correct his minutes by adding to the entry of the order appointing Hovley special administrator the following:

"And said Peter P. Hovley is hereby authorized and instructed to do all things and to perform all acts necessary for the preservation of the estate and the whole thereof of the deceased; to pay off from the first available funds of said estate whatever liens or debts it may be necessary to pay in order to obtain for the special administrator aforesaid possession of said estate and the whole thereof, and to expend whatever moneys may be necessary in obtaining possession, and in picking, harvesting, packing, shipping and marketing that certain crop of grapes heretofore taken over by the American State Bank of Brawley, by virtue of a crop mortgage, and to keep a careful account, and to render to this court upon demand thereof, a full, true and accurate accounting of all transactions had in the handling of the property of said estate, and more particularly of the grape crop aforesaid."

Claiming that this order was beyond the superior court's jurisdiction, petitioner seeks to have it annulled by the judgment of this court in this proceeding.

[1] Assuming that each of the orders so sought to be annulled was in excess of the superior court's jurisdiction, and that therefore the payments by the special administrator to the bank and J. Schoenburg Company were unauthorized, nevertheless we think that the relief sought herein, and all the relief that could be given in this proceeding, viz. the annulment of the orders, would be of no material or beneficial consequence to the petitioner here. It would not restore to the estate the money paid by the special administrator. The force of each of the orders has spent itself. Each order has served its purpose, in so far as it may be claimed that either ever had any force or effect. Each order has become functus officio. Nor could any judgment that might be entered herein be competent evidence against the special administrator, who is not a party to this proceeding. The writ of review will not be granted where no beneficial result will follow. Burr v. Supervisors, 96 Cal. 210, 31 Pac. 38; Reagan v. Bahrs, 11 Cal. App. 234, 104 Pac. 589; 6 Cyc. 747.

[2] Moreover, petitioner has a plain and adequate remedy. If, as petitioner claims, each of the orders to which she objects was without and beyond the court's jurisdiction, then each is a void order; and, if void, no protection will or can be afforded the special administrator thereby. The special administrator must render an account, on oath, in like manner as other administrators. Section 1417, Code Civ. Proc. If, on the settlement of the special administrator's account, the superior court shall refuse to allow these payments as proper items of disbursement, then petitioner, as an heir of decedent, will not be prejudiced by either of the orders of which she complains. If, on the other hand, in settling the special administrator's account, the superior court shall allow either the payment to the bank or that made to J. Schoenburg Company, and if the orders that petitioner is here seeking to have annulled were not within the court's jurisdiction, and, consequently, are void, as claimed by petitioner, nevertheless, there still will remain the right of appeal from the order settling the account. Subdivision 3, § 963, Code Civ. Proc. Thus there is afforded petitioner, by such right to appeal from any order settling the special administrator's account, a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. See Burr v. Supervisors, supra.

[3] It is not incumbent upon us to anticipate the action that hereafter may be taken by the superior court in settling the special administrator's account, or that may be taken by the referee who was appointed by that court to state and take the account. It does not devolve upon us to pass upon the validity of either of the orders of which petitioner complains, merely to afford guidance to the superior court, or to the referee appointed by it, in its or his future conduct during the administration of the estate. The special administrator is not a party to this proceeding; and, whatever his rights may be when the time arrives for settling his accounts in the superior court, they should not be concluded until he has had his day in court.

The writ is dismissed.

JORDAN v. ALDERSON et al., State Board of Medical Examiners. (Civ. 3222.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 16, 1920. Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 13, 1920.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⟸11(3)—Conflicts in or erroneous rulings on admission of evidence not considered on certiorari to medical board.

The court, on certiorari to annul board's order revoking license to practice medicine, has nothing to do with conflicts of testimony before the board, nor with irregularity or erroneous rulings on admission of evidence; the record showing the jurisdictional requirements of proper evidence were fulfilled.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⟸11(3)—Evidence necessary to convict of crime not necessary for revocation of license.

That the act complained of in proceeding before the board to revoke a license to practice medicine is called a criminal abortion did not make the proceeding a criminal one, so as to make applicable the Code provisions with respect to evidence necessary to convict of crime.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Determination on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Determination by the trial court on conflicting evidence is not interfered with by the appellate court.

4. Certiorari ⟸64(2)—Board's record finding quorum present conclusive.

A board's record showing it found the jurisdictional fact of presence of a quorum on the hearing must prevail on certiorari to annul its order in the proceeding before it.

5. Certiorari ⟸70(2)—Failure to answer not available where trial proceeded as though there were answer.

That no answer was filed to amended petition for certiorari cannot avail on appeal, no point having been made of this in the trial court, but the hearing there having proceeded as though a denial had been filed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Certiorari by Fisher R. Jordan against Harry E. Alderson and others, members of the State Board of Medical Examiners. From an adverse judgment, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, and Samuel M. Shortridge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment refusing on certiorari to annul an order of the state board of medical examiners revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine in the state of California.

The proceedings before the board were taken under the provisions of the Medical Practice Act (Stats. 1913, c. 354; Stats. 1915, c. 105, and also amended in 1917 [chapter 81] and 1919 [chapter 632]). The complaint charged the petitioner with unprofessional conduct under subdivision 1 of section 14 of the act, by procuring a criminal abortion upon a pregnant woman.

[1] Appellant contends that the record of the proceedings had and taken before the board shows such an absence of proper evidence as to amount to lack of jurisdiction in the board to make the order under review. It will serve no useful purpose to again state the powers of the court upon certiorari, particularly with reference to the action of the board of medical examiners in revoking a physician's license for unprofessional conduct in procuring an abortion. This subject has been fully discussed in several recent decisions: Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 185 Pac. 1006; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 Pac. 625, expressly approved in Suckow v. Board of Medical Examiners, 187 Pac. 965; Anderson v. Board of Dental Examiners, 27 Cal. App. 339, 149 Pac. 1006.

The record shows that there was an ample sufficiency of proper evidence to prove that the woman operated upon was pregnant at the time of the offense charged. The woman herself so testified, and on oath reaffirmed the truth of a full, detailed written statement giving circumstances, conditions, and symptoms, signed by her at the emergency hospital shortly after the offense. Also, expert medical testimony given by a physician who had made an examination of the patient shortly after the offense was proper evidence and of a convincing character. There was a conflict in the testimony of the expert witnesses, which is quite usual, and appellant complains that his cross-examination of the woman at the hearing on her belief as to her previous pregnancy was erroneously limited by the board. But it is well settled that on this proceeding the court had nothing to do with the conflict of testimony nor with irregular or erroneous rulings on admission of evidence where the record shows the jurisdictional requirements with respect to these matters have been fulfilled. Tinn v. U. S. District Attorney, 148 Cal. 774, 84 Pac. 152, 113 Am. St. Rep. 354; Lanterman v. Anderson, supra; Anderson v. Board of Dental Examiners, supra.

[2] The record also shows by the same testimony, and by proper and legal evidence, the performance of the illegal operation by petitioner. The testimony and denials of the petitioner who was a witness for himself, only created a conflict in the evidence before the board, with which, as we have already said, the court had nothing to do on the hearing of the writ of certiorari. The fact that the act complained of is called a criminal abortion does not make the proceedings before the board a criminal proceeding to the extent of making applicable to the hearing the provisions of the Penal Code with respect to evidence necessary to convict of a crime. Lanterman v. Anderson, supra.

Appellant contends that the order revoking petitioner's license did not receive the affirmative vote of seven members of the board who heard the testimony. The record shows the affirmative vote of eight members. The minutes do not show that Dr. Alderson was present at the beginning of the meeting at which this vote was taken, but even leaving out his vote there remained seven other affirmative votes.

Appellant also claims that seven members were not present during the entire hearing. The trial court admitted testimony on the question of which members were present. Appellant draws special attention to the testimony on this point given in the trial court by his own counsel during the hearing had on the writ. This testimony was to the effect that two of the members of the board conversed between themselves in one part of the room during the time that petitioner was on the witness stand in his own behalf. Under cross-examination, whatever effect this testimony would have melted away. The phonographic reporter and two of the members of the board also testified in court upon this question.

[3] The trial court, going further than is required or permitted upon certiorari, received and considered this testimony. It concluded by the judgment appealed from that the weight of such testimony was in favor of the regularity of the vote and hearing of the board. In other words, it determined in favor of the correctness of the record of the proceedings before the board returned into court under the writ. If the matter were open to us we could do no more than refer to the oft-repeated rule that the determination of the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be interfered with by the appellate court.

[4] However, not only the court but also the board of medical examiners determined the existence of these jurisdictional facts. It not only determined these facts impliedly, by making its order revoking the license, but again expressly, upon a motion to reconsider by appellant upon this ground after unfavorable action of the board had been taken. Its record showing this fact affirmatively made unnecessary the taking of testimony on the point. It was distinctly so held upon this precise question in Lanterman v. Anderson, supra.

[5] Appellant is in no position to take advantage of the failure of respondent to file an answer to the amended petition. The hearing before the trial court proceeded as though a denial had been filed. No point was made of this in the trial court. Furthermore, the petition and amended petition contain the entire record of the proceedings before the medical board. This record contradicts the allegations of the petition, and must prevail. Lanterman v. Anderson, supra.

The record of the proceedings before the board shows that the board did not act without jurisdiction in making the order complained of, and the court properly refused to annul the order on the hearing of the writ.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MILLAR v. BELL et al. (Civ. 3336.)

1. Deeds ⊂=211(4)—Coercion and breach of confidence shown by evidence.

Facts warranted by evidence held to authorize cancellation, on the ground of coercion and breach of confidence, of a deed, without any adequate consideration, to a brother-in-law, executed by one when urgently wanting a comparatively small sum of money and overindulging in liquor.

2. Deeds ⊂=75—No ratification by acceptance of part of income of property.

Ratification of deed, without adequate consideration, barring suit to cancel it on the ground of coercion and breach of confidence, held not to arise from acceptance by grantee, for some time, of $200 a month; this being but a part of the income of the property, and the compulsion accompanying the execution not being shown to have been removed.

3. Deeds ⊂=75—No ratification from absence of claim in partition suit.

That one who, without adequate consideration, conveyed an interest in property, set up no claim thereto in a subsequent suit for its partition, to which he was made a defendant, held not a ratification of his deed barring suit to cancel it on the ground of coercion and breach of confidence, in view of assurances from one with whom he had confidential relations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by James B. F. Millar against Charles H. Bell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, Herbert W. Clark, and Arthur E. Bolton, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the cancellation of a deed of conveyance of an undivided one-third interest in the real property described in the complaint which he had executed and delivered to the defendants Charles H. Bell and Mary E. Bell by reason of the alleged coercion and breach of confidence of said Charles H. Bell. He also prayed for the cancellation of a deed of trust executed by said defendants to their codefendant Mercantile Trust Company. By its judgment the court granted the relief sought, and the defendants have appealed.

It is contended by them that the judgment is not supported by the evidence, for the reason that the evidence shows: First, that the deed of conveyance in question was freely and voluntarily executed by the plaintiff; and, second, that after discovery of the facts upon which the plaintiff bases his right of rescission and cancellation he ratified his act in executing said deed.

Findings were waived by the parties, but the record contains all of the evidence taken at the trial.

As might be expected in an action of this character, the evidence is strongly conflicting; but, resolving that conflict in favor of the version of the transaction adopted by the trial court in arriving at its judgment, the facts may be summarized as follows: Charles H. Bell is the brother-in-law of James B. F. Millar, the plaintiff, and Mary E. Bell is his wife and the sister of James. The father of the latter died about six months before the occurrence of the events out of which the present litigation arose, leaving an estate of the value of about $180,000, consisting principally of real property, one-third of which was bequeathed and devised to his said son. James had contracted the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, and when under the influence of this habit spent his money recklessly and contracted debts; indeed, on several occasions, for the purpose of procuring means to continue his excesses, he had resorted to the forgery of checks. On said occasions his brother-in-law had proved to be a staunch and loyal friend and invariably came to his assistance. In the early part of November, 1915, James was in urgent need of money, and so by letter informed Mr. A. E. Bolton, the attorney for the executors of his father's estate, and who had long been the attorney for James Millar, Sr., the father, and was intimately acquainted with the members of the family. James' father had been aware of his son's weakness and had realized that he might at some time be in trouble as a result thereof, and had expressed the desire to his attorney and friend, Mr. Bolton, that he come to his boy's aid should occasion arise. James at this time was residing in Dinuba, there engaged in the practice of dentistry, earning thereby some $2,000 or $3,000 a year. Upon receipt of his letter Mr. Bolton consulted with Charles H. Bell. They both realized that this demand of James for money indicated that if something were not done to control him he would probably upon coming into his share of his father's estate rapidly dissipate it in unwise and reckless expenditure when in his periodical debauches. They decided to visit James at Dinuba and talk things over. They accordingly did so, and there proposed to him that he should enter into some arrangement by which he would be protected from dissipating the inheritance of which he was soon to come into control. Several methods were suggested: One, that a guardian be appointed for James' estate; another, that an annuity be purchased for him; and, again, that his property be placed in trust for his benefit. James refused to consider the proposed guardianship or the annuity, and they were not pressed, but it was made to appear quite plainly to him by his brother-in-law that unless he entered into some such arrangement he need expect no financial aid in his embarrassment. It is even testified by James that his brother-in-law at this time referred pointedly to his infractions of the law above mentioned and hinted at unpleasant consequences if he remained obdurate—which, however, seems quite improbable and in all likelihood found little credence in the trial court. At the conclusion of the interview Mr. Bell and Mr. Bolton advised James to consult a lawyer, make up his mind what he wanted to do, and to let them know. Testifying as to this interview Mr. Bolton said:

"The main thing at Dinuba was to get into his mind that something had to be done, and that is all that was accomplished then."

A few days thereafter, on November 15, 1915, James appeared in the law office of Mr. Bolton in San Francisco ready to enter into some arrangement for the purpose of carrying out the object suggested by his brother-in-law on the visit to him at Dinuba. He had not consulted an attorney, deeming it unnecessary to do so in view of his confidence in both Mr. Bell and Mr. Bolton and their known and appreciated friendship for him. In the meantime Mr. Bolton had given the matter some thought, and had arrived at the conclusion that in order to effectually protect James from the possibility of dissipating his inheritance and to assure him of future maintenance, the only feasible thing for James to do was to make an absolute deed of all his property to some person in whom he had confidence. It was explained to him by Mr. Bolton that if he did so he would no longer have control of it, nor could he direct such person in the expenditure of the funds derived therefrom. This fact was also emphasized by Mr. Bell when the plan proposed to be adopted was made known to him. According to the testimony of Mr. Bolton, James expressed the desire that Mr. Bell be named as such grantee, while the plaintiff's recollection of this part of the transaction is that the deed was presented to him for signature with Mr. Bell's name therein as grantee without any previous discussion of such selection. Mr. Bell at first strongly demurred to having the conveyance made to him, and insisted to James that it be made to the latter's sister and brother. This James would not consent to, but was willing that such a conveyance be made to his sister and Mr. Bell jointly, energetically protesting his greater confidence in Mr. Bell than in his brother. There was much discussion before this decision was finally reached, as a result of which James derived the conviction that, although he was executing an absolute deed to his property he would still receive the benefit of it. Evidently there was some assurance given him that he would receive a monthly allowance of $200, for Mr. Bell himself testifies that upon James saying he would like to have $300, he replied:

"Well $200 would be enough, but I will promise you nothing. I refuse to make you any promises."

This witness also testifies to a like categorical refusal to make any promises when James stated that his understanding was that the property would be returned to him in five years' time; but, as to this, James testified that such was the understanding. Mr. Bolton, testifying to this interview and the attitude of James and the effect of the discussion and negotiations upon his mind, said:

"In talking with Jimmie (the plaintiff) it was talked with Jimmie that a trust could be made. * * * I apprehend that it might be fair to state that Jimmie thought it would be put in trust. * * * There was enough said, to be perfectly frank with everybody, there was enough said in the transaction, considering the knowledge that Jimmie had of Dr. Bell—Jimmie would have had a fair right to have assumed. * * * 'Well, if I brace up as a man Dr. Bell would convey this property back to me.'"

The deed to Charles H. Bell and Mary E. Bell being executed, there was advanced to James sufficient money—about $1,000—to meet his pressing obligations, and thereafter Mr. Bell sent to him the sum of $200 monthly until, in March, 1916, Mr. Bell and his wife made a deed of trust of the property theretofore conveyed to them by James to the Mercantile Trust Company for the purpose of paying to James during his lifetime the sum of $200 monthly, reserving, however, a power of revocation. In the meantime distribution of the estate of James Millar, Sr., was had, James' one-third interest therein being distributed to the Mercantile Trust Company, to be subject to the terms of said deed of trust. Immediately after said distribution a suit was commenced for the purpose of partitioning the real property thus distributed in undivided interests to the heirs or assigns of said deceased, to which said James was made a party defendant by virtue of the interest therein created in his favor by said deed of trust so executed to the Mercantile Trust Company. The summons and complaint were served upon him; but, except for assisting in the actual physical partition of the lands, he took no active interest in the suit. His connection with it may be gathered from a letter written to him by Mr. Bolton wherein he said:

"The complaint will set forth the facts that distribution has been had, that it is desirable that partition be had according to the respective rights of the parties, and so forth. It will then be necessary for you and the other parties in interest to file an answer to the complaint admitting the facts as set forth therein and requesting that partition be had. It is impossible for me to appear as attorney for both the defendants and the plaintiffs in the action; therefore I am inclosing herewith an authorization to be signed by you authorizing Mr. J. S. Shuman to appear for you in that action. Of course this is only a matter of form, and I will prepare all the papers in the office, and I will then have him sign them as attorney."

In order to give point to the contention of the appellants that the plaintiff ratified his deed of conveyance after discovery of fact claimed by plaintiff to confer upon him the right of rescission, one other detail should be added: On October 6, 1916, the plaintiff addressed to Charles H. Bell and Mary E. Bell a written notice of rescission and cancellation of his conveyance of October 15, 1915, stating therein as grounds for such action that said conveyance had been made without any valuable consideration, and at a time when he was incapable of managing his affairs, and was made under menace, duress, and undue influence. At the same time the plaintiff employed an attorney in Dinuba, a Mr. Smith, to look into the facts and circumstances attending his execution of said conveyance. Mr. Smith visited Mr. Bolton at his office in San Francisco, and was shown the deed or a copy thereof, also the deed of trust to the Mercantile Trust Company, and was informed of the reasons for and circumstances connected with their execution. He as also invited by Mr. Bolton to offer any suggestions that he might have to make in the interest of his client. Mr. Smith returned to Dinuba, and there the matter dropped until the commencement of the present action some two years later.

[1] We have no difficulty upon the foregoing facts in arriving at the conclusion that the judgment is supported by the evidence. While recognizing that the grantees named in the plaintiff's deed of conveyance and Mr. Bolton acted in the highest good faith and exercised their best judgment for the protection of the interests of the plaintiff, the fact still remains that when in dire need of a comparatively small sum of money, and in some measure for the purpose of procuring an advance of such amount, his judgment probably impaired by alcoholic excesses, being convinced that in urging the alienation of his property they were doing so for the purpose of protecting and preserving his interest therein and that it would eventually be returned to him, imposing in them a trust and confidence merited by long intimacy with his family and personal friendship and kindness to himself, by said deed he, without receiving therefor any adequate consideration, stripped himself of practically all he possessed in the world. To be sure, the grantees in said deed have since its execution voluntarily paid or caused to be paid to him the sum of $200 every month and have made provision for continuing this payment during the term of his life; but there is no legal compulsion upon them to do so, and they have the right and power to discontinue these payments at any time, and, while there is nothing in the record to indicate that that contingency is likely to arise, neither a court of law nor equity would be warranted in assuming that they will never do so, especially if irritated or their feelings wounded by what they might justly consider ungrateful or inconsiderate conduct on the part of the plaintiff, or by acrimonious litigation. In a transaction where the elements of trust and confidence enter as largely as in the present case a court of equity will not be slow to lend its aid where the absence of any of the essentials of a valid transfer of property is fairly established. We think the facts above set out, resolving any conflict concerning them in favor of the judgment of the trial court, fairly disclose such a case, and that the trial court was justified in setting aside the plaintiff's conveyance, unless the evidence established, according to the contention of the appellants, a legal ratification by its grantor.

[2, 3] Two circumstances are urged by the appellants as having this effect, namely, the continued acceptance by plaintiff of the monthly payment of $200 after he became aware that the defendants denied any legal obligation resting upon them as a result of the conveyance by plaintiff to them of his property, and the fact that the plaintiff as a defendant in the partition suit referred to above failed to set up therein any claim to the property therein sought to be partitioned, but acquiesced in the distribution of the one-third thereof that he now claims to the Mercantile Trust Company under the terms of the deed of trust executed by Charles H. Bell and his wife.

We do not think the first of these facts can be given the effect claimed for it by the appellants. If the transaction was as contended by them an absolute conveyance, imposing no obligation upon them, then such payments were not made by virtue of the terms of that transaction, so that the acceptance of such payments cannot be regarded as a recognition of its validity; and if the transaction is to be regarded as of the character testified to by the plaintiff, and that such payments were in accordance with its terms, it still remains the fact that the money so paid was a part—and a part only—of the income produced by the property so conveyed by him and which, according to his understanding of the transaction, was to be used for his benefit. His acceptance of such payments cannot therefore be said to estop him to assert the invalidity of his transfer, especially when the element of compulsion which accompanied its execution is not shown to have been removed, and the money thus received was equitably his own.

As to the plaintiff's conduct with regard to the partition suit, by which he apparently acquiesced in the distribution of his property to the Mercantile Trust Company, it is very evident from the terms of Mr. Bolton's letter above given that the plaintiff's participation therein was purely perfunctory and nominal, and that he was entitled by reason of those confidential relations between him and Mr. Bolton (who was conducting said partition suit), to which we have already referred, to assume that nothing would result therefrom with regard to his property interests contrary to the understanding which, according to the trial court, he was justified in deriving from the negotiations culminating in the aforesaid conveyance of his property.

Entertaining these views, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. TORRES. (Cr. 720.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 22, 1920.)

1. Kidnapping ⇐6—Whether girl consented to go with accused held for jury.

In a prosecution for child stealing under Pen. Code, § 278, whether the girl consented to go with defendant held for the jury.

2. Criminal law ⇐1159(3) — Conviction of child stealing based on conflicting evidence not disturbed on appeal.

In a prosecution for child stealing, where there was a direct conflict in the evidence as to both the taking and detaining of the child, a verdict of guilty cannot be disturbed on appeal.

3. Kidnapping ⇐1—Consent of child to accompany accused no defense.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 278, for stealing a female child of the age of 13 years, it is no defense that the girl accompanied the defendant of her own volition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Juan Torres was convicted of child stealing, and appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. D. Swanner, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

THOMAS, J. Defendant was informed against, and, after trial, convicted by a jury of his peers of the crime of child stealing, under section 278 of the Penal Code—the child being a female of the age of 13 years—and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. A brief statement of the facts follows:

The child lived with her parents near Garden Grove, in Orange county, on and for some time prior to February 8, 1920, at which time, it is claimed, "she went away with the defendant." From the record it appears that at about 10 o'clock at night defendant and the minor went to a "little house," remaining there until about 3 o'clock in the morning, thence going to a "big house," where they went to bed. The next day defendant was arrested. The girl remained at the "big house" until about 2:30 o'clock of the afternoon of the day of defendant's arrest. The mother and stepfather of the child testified that neither had given consent to their girl's going with the defendant. There was conflict in the evidence as to the material allegations of the information, which the jury settled in favor of the people.

As we gather from the record, three points are urged by appellant here for reversal: (1) That the girl consented to go with appellant, and, hence, the latter could not be guilty of the offense charged; (2) that the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's request for certain instructions, his number 5 and 7; and (3) that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, particularly in this, that there is no evidence that defendant intended to or did conceal the said child.

[1] As to the first point, it will be sufficient to point out that the testimony of the minor shows that on the night of February 8, 1920, defendant came to her home and asked her to go away with him; that he wanted to marry her; that she informed him that she could not go until her father consented; that he took hold of her by the wrist and she then accompanied him; that they went to a "little house" and then to a "big house," as already set forth; that when she got up the next morning she wanted to go home, but could not because defendant told her she could not go; and that she tried to go but could not, for the reason that the lady of the house was following her around. Defendant, appellant here, testified that prior to the date in question—February 8, 1920—the child's parents had given their consent to his marrying the minor, but had subsequently revoked such consent; that he did not take the girl by force; that he asked her if she was willing to go with him, and that she answered in the affirmative; and that he did not tell her she could not go home. The "lady of the house," referred to in the child's testimony, denied that she followed the child around, and testified that, on the contrary, the child was at liberty to go and come as she pleased while there. The jury, as we have said, settled this conflict in the evidence in favor of the prosecution.

[2, 3] Appellant complains of the action of the learned trial judge in sustaining objections of the district attorney "relative to the acts and conduct of said minor, holding that she being a minor could not consent to leaving home." As supporting this, our attention is called to the case of People v. Black, 147 Cal. 426, 81 Pac. 1099; but we do not think that case in point. In the case cited there was no conflict in the evidence; there was no showing that defendant had any intent to conceal and detain the minor. In the case at bar there is direct conflict as to both the taking and detaining; the evidence of each being present, as already pointed out, and the jury having decided the conflict in such evidence in favor of the people, we are without authority to disturb that verdict on appeal. In the Black Case the court said that this "is true when the evidence, even though meager, is yet sufficient, if believed by the jury, to support their finding, and is always true when sufficient but conflicting evidence is presented upon the subject." It was the absolute absence of conflict in the evidence in that case as to defendant's intent to detain that caused the court to disturb the verdict. Such condition, as we have seen, is not present here. The question, therefore, whether the girl accompanied the defendant of her own volition is, in our opinion, immaterial; nor is it a defense in a case like this. 1 Cyc. 146; 8 R. C. L. 297; State v. Brandenberg, 232 Mo. 531, 134 S. W. 529, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 845; People v. Cook, 61 Cal. 478; Queen v. Biswell, 2 Cox. C. C. 279; Gould v. State, 71 Neb. 651, 99 N. W. 541. So far as we have been able to discover, the question of the consent of a minor, under the section which is the basis of the information here, has not been passed upon by any of the appellate courts of this state. Still, we believe the conclusion here reached is, as we have seen, supported by both principle and the weight of authority of the courts of other jurisdictions.

The court refused to grant defendant's request to give the following instructions:

"(5) Nor does the circumstance that she was a minor preclude you, gentlemen of the jury, from taking into consideration her conduct and actions for the purpose of ascertaining whether as a fact her will was dominated by that of defendant, and her freedom of action controlled and restrained entirely by his wishes, or whether her going to and remaining at the house of Mrs. Calderon overnight, as she did, was not a matter of her own volition, induced by the suggestion of defendant."

"(7) The court instructs you that if you find from the evidence that the minor child involved in this case went to the home of Mrs. Calderon and remained there overnight of her own volition, and that her will was not dominated by that of defendant, and her freedom of action controlled and restrained entirely by his wishes, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

Under the statute, one who maliciously or fraudulently "entices" away a minor child is guilty of child stealing. To entice is to instigate, by exciting hope or desire; to lead astray. The minor may be "enticed" away without any domination over his or her will. The desire to do something promised by the abductor may alone suffice to lead astray the most self-willed girl or boy. The rulings under consideration were correct.

In view of what we have said upon the first two points urged, discussion of the third point becomes unnecessary.

Judgment affirmed.

BIDEGARAY v. ORMACA. (Civ. 3209.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1920.)

1. Time ⟸10(1)—Act to be done on holiday may be performed on next business day.

By Civ. Code, § 11, an act appointed by law or contract, other than an act of necessity or mercy, to be done on a holiday, may be performed on the next business day.

2. Sales ⟸183—Buyer not bound to pay until delivery or offer to perform.

The buyer of lambs was not bound to pay for them until the seller delivered them or in good faith offered to perform.

3. Contracts ⟸279(2)—Obligation extinguished by offer of performance only under certain conditions.

An obligation is extinguished by an offer of performance only when made in accordance with the rules prescribed in Civ. Code, §§ 1485–1505, requiring a good-faith actual offer, which must be made to the person to whom performance is due, if an agent has not been appointed, while, if he is not at the place fixed for performance, it must be made wherever he may be found.

4. Sales ⟸176(1)—Party may not induce other to believe delivery will not be made, and then take advantage of reliance on representation.

Regardless of the rule requiring modifications of written contracts to be evidenced by writing, one party may not, on pretense of desire on his part to depart from exact performance of a nonessential detail, induce the other party to believe that delivery of goods sold will not be made, either at the time or place specified in the contract, and then take advantage of the other's reliance upon his representation, despite Civ. Code, § 1698.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1170(7)—Appellate court will not reverse for harmless error in admission of evidence.

In an action for failure to deliver lambs sold, if under a technical application of Civ. Code, § 1698, the trial court erred in admitting certain evidence tending to vary the written contract by parol, where there remained sufficient evidence to support the findings, and there has been no miscarriage of justice, the appellate court, under the Constitution, will not reverse.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by J. Bidegaray against Louis Ormaca. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. K. Bonestell and J. A. Steele, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment against him for $1,250. He presents a single question of law in support of the appeal, based on an objection to the admission of evidence over the objection that it was an attempt to change the terms of a written contract by parol in contravention of section 1698 of the Civil Code. The respondent maintains that the section has no application to the facts of the case.

The respondent sued on two counts; the second being in the ordinary form of an action for debt. In the first count it was alleged that in May, 1918, the defendant sold to plaintiff 500 lambs at the agreed price of $7 per head; that the plaintiff then paid the defendant $250 on account, and the defendant agreed to deliver the lambs to the plaintiff at Helm station, in Fresno county, on or about May 26, 1918; that plaintiff was ready and willing to pay the balance of the purchase price on May 26 and thereafter; that the defendant had failed and refused to make delivery, and, on information and belief, that defendant had sold the lambs to others on or about May 26, and still retained the $250 paid him; and that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $1,750. The appellant alleged that the plaintiff agreed to take the lambs on May 26, at Helm station, and to pay for them; denied the readiness of the plaintiff to pay the balance of the purchase price; denied that the defendant had failed or refused to deliver; and alleged that he was willing to deliver on May 26, that he then offered delivery, that the plaintiff then refused to accept delivery, and that the defendant thereafter held the lambs for a period of five days, up to June 1. He denied damage, and denied the debt set up in the plaintiff's second cause of action.

The court made general findings: First, that all the allegations in the first cause of action in the complaint were true, except as to the amount of damages, which the court found to have been $1,250; and, second, that all the allegations of the second count were true, except as to the amount of the debt, which was found to be $1,250.

[1] Exclusive of the evidence to which the objection was interposed, the record shows that May 26, 1918, was Sunday. The appellant stands upon what he considers his strict contractual rights. An act appointed by law or contract, other than an act of necessity or mercy, to be done on a holiday, may be performed on the next business day. Civ. Code, § 11. The appellant's corral was about four or five miles from Helm station. The respondent's corral was about seven miles from the station, and about two miles from the appellant's corral. On Sunday morning the appellant stated that he went to the station about 7 or 8 o'clock and stayed all day. He left his lambs at his corral. On his direct examination he first testified that he went alone. Later he said that afternoon he came up to town. He ate lunch with his herder, about four miles from Helm. "We went out there," he said "and got lunch. Then we went back to Helm again, and back to camp again." It is immaterial whether he went to Helm on Sunday or not, or whether the respondent was there or not on that day. As a matter of fact, he was not.

The evidence is important in connection with the evidence concerning what he did on Monday. He testified that he went back to Helm early Monday morning; also that he went there on Tuesday and Wednesday, on which latter day, he testified, he sold the lambs to his brother-in-law, Ahado. The market price of lambs was then $10 a head. The appellant's herder testified that the appellant was at the corral on Sunday, and told them to put the lambs in the corral until Mr. Bidegaray came. He further testified that Ahado, who had also testified that he bought the lambs on Wednesday, had said on May 31, in the presence of Bidegaray and others, that he had bought the lambs on Monday, May 27. Another witness testified positively that at Huron, on May 31, in the presence of himself, Pete Irigary, and Bidegaray, Ahado said that he had bought the lambs from Ormaca, on Monday, May 27, at 10 o'clock in the morning, at Kutner-Goldstein's in Fresno. If the appellant was in Fresno at that hour on Monday, his testimony that he was at Helm, waiting to meet the respondent, could not have been correct.

The trial court resolved the conflict in the testimony against the appellant, and this court is bound in such a case by the implied finding of the trial court. Under the appellant's evidence, he never took the lambs to Helm, and he did not seek in any way, other than by going there, if he went, to find or communicate with Bidegaray. The respondent was not at the station, but there is no evidence that he would not have gone there, had the appellant taken the lambs there for delivery. On this appeal the appellant stands upon a rigid application of the law in regard to the evidence to which objection was made. In the foregoing no reference has been made to any part of the evidence in dispute.

[2, 3] The appellant contends that the respondent was bound to accept and to pay for the lambs at Helm station. The respondent was not bound to pay for them until the appellant delivered the lambs, or in good faith offered to perform the contract. He never took the lambs to Helm station, and therefore must base his right on an offer of performance. His evidence shows affirmatively he made no such offer. An obligation is extinguished by an offer of performance only when made in accordance with the rules prescribed in sections 1485 to 1505 of the Civil Code. There must be an actual offer. Civ. Code, § 1487. It must be made to the person to whom performance is due, if an agent has not been appointed, and if he is not at the place fixed for performance, wherever he may be found. Civ. Code, §§ 1488, 1489. It must be made in good faith. Civ. Code, § 1493. It is only when these requirements have been fulfilled that actual production of the thing to be delivered is excused. The appellant failed to meet these requirements, and he never became entitled to resell the lambs he had already sold to the respondent, nor to retain the $250 paid on account, and which he testified he intended to keep. The evidence was sufficient to support the findings, and they in turn support the judgment.

The reason why the respondent did not go to Helm appears from the evidence to which objection was made. The respondent testified that on May 24 the appellant visited the respondent in his office in Fresno, and said that the 26th would be Sunday, and they could count the lambs on another day. The respondent replied that with stock Sunday or Monday was just the same, but that the appellant could bring them any time on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday to the respondent's main corrals. The appellant testified that he had a conversation with the respondent at the time stated, and that—"I saw the contract dated on Sunday, so I went on the 24th, and asked him if he was going to take the lambs out on Sunday, and he said: 'Didn't you ever work on Sunday?' That was all that was said about it."

The trial court probably believed the evidence given by the respondent upon this subject. The essential conditions of the contract of sale were the delivery of the lambs and the coincident payment of the balance of the purchase price. Neither the time nor the exact place of delivery was of the essence of the contract.

[4, 5] Regardless of the rule requiring modifications of written contracts to be evidenced by writing, one party to a contract may not, on the pretense of desire on his part to depart from the exact performance of a nonessential detail, induce the other party to believe that delivery of goods sold will not be made, either at the time or place specified in the contract, and then take advantage of the other's reliance upon his representations. To apply section 1698 of the Civil Code to such a state of facts would be to make it an engine for the perpetration of fraud, instead of a defense against it. If, even under the most technical application of the section, the trial court was in error in admitting the evidence to which objection was made, there remains in the record sufficient evidence to support the findings, and there does not appear to have been any miscarriage in justice. The case is peculiarly within the constitutional restriction on the power of appellate courts to reverse judgments for error in the admission of evidence, unless the court is of the opinion that there has been such a miscarriage. Upon the entire record that is not the opinion of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONTRA COSTA CONST. CO. v. DALY CITY. (Civ. 3333.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 24, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸360(2)—Not liable for extra work not approved as provided by contract.

Where a contract with a city for laying a pipe line provided that extra work should be paid for according to a prearranged schedule of prices, if authorized by resolution of the board of trustees, the contractor cannot recover on the express contract for extra work performed without prearranged prices or the approval of the trustees.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸360(2)—No implied liability for work under ultra vires contract.

There is no implied contract by a city to pay for extra work done for it under an agreement made ultra vires by its engineer.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸360(2)—Unauthorized promise of engineer to pay for extra work not binding.

Where a contract for a pipe line provided for payment for extra work according to a prearranged schedule of prices only if authorized by resolution of the board of trustees, a promise by the city engineer in charge of the work to the contractor that the city would make a fair settlement for certain extra work is not binding on the city, since it was beyond the authority of the engineer under the contract.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸230—Contractor chargeable with knowledge of limitation on powers of agents and officers.

A contractor dealing with a municipal corporation is chargeable with knowledge of the limitations on the power of its agents and officers.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸360(2)—City engineer held not authorized to promise payment for extra work.

A clause in the contract for the construction of a pipe line for a city along a designated highway, whereby the city guaranteed the rights of way, did not authorize a city engineer to promise payment for extra work made necessary by the fact that the highway commissioner, in granting the right of way, required a trench deeper than that specified.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Contra Costa Construction Company against the City of Daly City. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George Appell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ramsey Probasco and Robinson & Sizer, all of Oakland (Albert B. Harris, of counsel), for respondent.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for extra work, in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, a municipal corporation.

The plaintiff and the city of Daly City, a municipal corporation, entered into a written contract for the construction of a water pipe line for the city's water supply. The pipe line was required to be laid, by the contract, plans, and specifications, in Mission road (outside of city boundaries) 3½ feet below the old curb line of the road. After plaintiff commenced work, it was stopped by an injunction not involved here, and before work recommenced it developed, or was discovered for the first time, that the state was undertaking the construction of a section of concrete paved highway along this portion of Mission road. The state highway commission, as it is popularly called, asserted and maintained exclusive possession of the road and the right of way, including the strip of land adjoining the pavement where the pipe was to be laid. The city's engineers thereupon wrote a letter to the highway commission, asking for a permit on behalf of the city to lay the pipe. This permit was granted, but only on certain conditions as to the manner in which the work should be performed. Among those conditions was the requirement that the pipe be laid 4 feet below the profile of the highway pavement, instead of 3½ feet below the old curb line.

The plaintiff was informed by the city engineers of this new requirement and of changes in the plan necessary to meet this requirement. The plaintiff continued with the work, and then discovered that this change in the plan would bring the pipe trench below the surface soil and into rock and it protested that this would entail considerable additional expense. The engineers orally directed the plaintiff to proceed with the work, and "keep a good record of it, and see what it costs, and when we get through we will make a fair settlement with you." After the work was finished, a claim for the extra work, labor, and materials necessitated by this change in the plan was presented to the board of trustees, and was by it rejected. This suit was commenced for the sum of $2,844.80, and resulted in a judgment for $1,432.98. The original contract price was $8,900.

The contract provided that the work should be done in strict accordance with the plans and specifications, and completed to the satisfaction of the engineers of the city, and its board of trustees, for the sum of $8,900; and it further provided that, in the event of any deductions or additions being made, certain unit prices established and specified in the contract would be used in determining the amount to be added or deducted. These, however, do not include the changed depth of the trench. The specifications contained provisions to the effect that the engineers should decide, in case of misunderstanding, as to the true interpretations of the plans and specifications, and correct errors or omissions in the plans and specifications when necessary for the proper fulfillment of their intention. The board of trustees might by resolution order alterations in quantities of materials specified, and in case of increase it should be paid for upon the established unit prices. All necessary rights of way for the construction of the work to be guaranteed by the city; also the following provision under the heading "Extra Work":

"Any work not contemplated in these specifications that may be requested of the contractor by the engineers shall be paid for according to a prearranged schedule of prices agreed to between the engineer and the contractor, and no payments will be made for such work unless they be authorized by resolution of the board of trustees."

[1] The muncipality had the right to specify in the contract the precise conditions under which alone it would be obliged to pay for extra work. This it did. But this method was not followed by the contractor. There was no prearranged schedule of prices for the extra work agreed to between the engineers and the contractors; neither was the extra work or alteration, nor any payment therefor, authorized by resolution of the board of trustees. As this provision of the contract was not complied with, there can be no recovery under the express contract. Gray v. La Société Française, etc., 131 Cal. 566, 63 Pac. 848.

[2, 3] The findings are prepared in such a way as to support the theory of an implied as well as an express contract. We are of the opinion that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment on the theory of an implied contract. It is well settled that an implied contract does not arise for work done for a municipality under an ultra vires contract. Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 157, 152 Pac. 293; Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96. That would have the effect of putting the power to contract where none existed, and would in effect change the charter of the city. As the engineers here were not permitted to contract on behalf of the city under the terms of the contract defining and limiting their powers, to hold that they could by their conduct give rise to an implied contract would in effect change the express contract and brush away the safeguards the city had placed in the contract for its protection. The city cannot be held liable for the acts of the engineers in ordering this work unless the engineers in fact had the power so to do.

[4, 5] One dealing with a municipal corporation is chargeable with knowledge of the limitations of power of its agents and officers. Wallace v. San Jose, 29 Cal. 180. The fact that the city guaranteed all rights of way did not enlarge the powers of the engineers nor authorize them to act as general agents with full power to secure the right of way. This was a matter which should have been taken up by the contractors with the board of trustees under the contract. An implied contract in this case could not arise at least without knowledge or action on the part of the board of trustees before the extra work was done. Griffiths v. Los Angeles, 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 119, 54 Pac. 383.

The only action of the board of trustees in regard to the matter is the rejection of the claim for payment for the extra work. The whole matter seems to have been handled between the engineers and contractors under the belief that equitable considerations would prevail, and not the strict terms of the written contract. The engineers had no power to obligate the city for this extra work. The judgment is not supported by the evidence, either on the theory of an express or implied contract.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

BENNETT v. BENNETT. (Civ. 3469.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1920.)

1. Divorce ⟸37(22)—Criticism by wife, caused by husband's attentions to other women, is no justification for separation.

A husband cannot, by a course of improper conduct often repeated, arouse the suspicion and jealousy of his wife, and humiliate her by attentions to other women and by receiving love letters from such other women, and then claim immunity from the wife's criticism and reproach or that her accusations justified him in leaving her.

2. Divorce ⟸51—Wife's condonation is revoked by husband's desertion.

Under Civ. Code, § 121, though a wife condoned offenses on the part of her husband with other women by resuming marital relations with him, nevertheless the condonation was revoked as to all previous acts when the husband deserted the wife without cause, thus giving her another cause of divorce.

3. Divorce ⟸109—Presumption of adultery is rebuttable.

Though the charge of adultery is difficult of proof, and circumstances may be sufficient to justify a presumption of adultery, even under circumstances most strongly warranting the presumption, defendant may rebut it by an explanation of the purpose of his presence at the suspicious time and place.

4. Divorce ⟸129(16)—Evidence insufficient to warrant finding of husband's adultery.

In a husband's action for divorce, wherein the wife cross-complained for separate maintenance on the ground of his adultery, finding that the husband and corespondent had committed adultery held unwarranted by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action for divorce by Albert L. Bennett against Emma T. Bennett. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ben F. Gray and Geo. S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment denying him a divorce from the defendant and granting to said defendant a decree of separate maintenance from the plaintiff and an allowance for her support and the support of her minor child.

Plaintiff filed an action for divorce from the defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty and also upon the ground of desertion. The specific acts of cruelty alleged included accusations, in public and private, of improper relations with various women and reproaches and threats based thereon. Defendant filed an answer, specifically denying the alleged acts of cruelty and also the desertion, and also filed a cross-complaint wherein she alleged desertion by the plaintiff, and also alleged, upon information and belief, that the plaintiff had committed adultery with a young woman named as corespondent in this action, and also alleged that the plaintiff had treated the defendant in a cruel and inhuman manner—the specific acts of cruelty alleged being plaintiff's attendance at the theater and other places of amusement with women whose names were unknown to the defendant, and also plaintiff's conduct in riding in an automobile with the woman named as corespondent herein, and against whom the adultery charge is made. Defendant prayed for a decree of separate maintenance. To this cross-complaint, plaintiff filed an answer denying the desertion.

The court found that the defendant did not "falsely accuse plaintiff of associating with women, or falsely accuse him of being guilty of infidelity." Appellant's argument upon this question is that the record contains positive proof that the defendant did accuse the plaintiff of improper relations with women. We have read through the voluminous record with much care, and while it is true that the testimony clearly shows that the defendant did make such accusations at different times, it appears with equal clearness that the plaintiff's conduct over a long period of years presented a series of episodes abundantly warranting defendant's suspicions, protests, and accusations. The trial court did not find, as stated by the appellant, that the accusations alleged were never made by defendant, but found that the accusations were not "falsely" made by the defendant. The appellant's argument upon this point amounts to a contention that, if a man indulges in numerous improper relations with various women, it is inconsiderate and indelicate upon the part of his wife to mention the matter to him.

The court also found that the other alleged acts of cruelty by the defendant were not committed by her, and also found that the defendant did not desert the plaintiff. These findings, based as they are upon conflicting evidence, must stand undisturbed by us, and warrant a denial of the prayer of the plaintiff for a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony between himself and the defendant. The court also found that the plaintiff did, without cause, desert the defendant.

[1, 2] The appellant maintains his right to leave the defendant because of her accusations and threats against him, which he asserts rendered his condition intolerable. While such accusations and threats might have justified him in leaving her, if they had been unfounded, and due to no fault upon the part of the plaintiff, in the light of the present record, the initial fault was with the plaintiff, and the testimony clearly warrants the inference by the trial court that, if his conduct had been more conventional, he would not have been subjected to reproaches and accusations. It certainly cannot be successfully maintained that a man may, by a course of improper conduct oft repeated, arouse the suspicion and jealousy of his wife, and humiliate her by attentions to other women and by receiving love letters from such other women, and then claim immunity from criticism and reproach. The letter appearing in the record, received by the husband from a woman in Buffalo years before this action was commenced, is eloquent upon the proposition that his conduct was highly improper, to say the least, and was such as to warrant accusations and reproaches by his wife. While the wife may have condoned this and numerous other offenses, which the court was justified in finding from the record, by resuming marital relations with the appellant at Salt Lake City, nevertheless the condonation was revoked as to all previous actions when the husband deserted the wife, without cause, as found by the court, thus giving her another cause of divorce. Civ. Code, § 121.

[3, 4] Upon the finding which we have heretofore discussed, the decree of the trial court was warranted, and we may not interfere therewith. There is an additional finding to the effect that the plaintiff was guilty of adultery with the corespondent named herein. This finding is attacked by the appellant as being unwarranted. The evidence bearing upon this matter is uncontradicted in the record, and at most shows merely an opportunity for such action. There are no circumstances in evidence regarding the general conduct of the plaintiff and the corespondent toward each other, nor regarding the disposition of the corespondent which would afford a basis for the belief that given the opportunity, the parties would indulge in illegal relations. It is true that the charge here made is difficult of proof and that circumstances may be sufficient to justify a presumption of adultery; but it is also true that even under circumstances most strongly warranting the presumption, the defendant may rebut the same by an explanation of the purpose of his presence at the suspicious time and place. Johanson v. Johanson, 12 Cal. App. 635, 108 Pac. 55.

In the present action, the court found that adultery had been committed at the apartment of the corespondent. The testimony regarding the incident upon which the finding was made was that the plaintiff and corespondent had been riding in his automobile. They were followed by two detectives, and his wife and daughter. At about 10 o'clock in the evening, they drove to the apartment of the corespondent. The automobile was left outside, and the occupants went into the apartment, consisting of one room and kitchenette. After a short time, from 20 to 40 minutes according to the various witnesses, the detectives knocked on the door, which was opened by the corespondent. The wife and daughter and the detectives then entered the room and found the plaintiff fully attired, seated at a table. The corespondent was also fully dressed, and there was nothing about the appearance of either to contradict their explanation, which was that they had spent the short time while they were in the apartment in talking about his affairs and in looking at pictures which had been sent to her by her husband in France. Under the circumstances in evidence here, we think this finding regarding the adultery of the plaintiff and of the corespondent is one unwarranted by the evidence. It is, however, unrelated to the other findings, which are amply sustained by the evidence, and which are sufficient to sustain the judgment. Upon the findings and evidence regarding the plaintiff's desertion of the defendant the judgment must be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHRISTIAN. (Cr. 723.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⇐371(9)—Evidence of subsequent offenses admissible in rape case to prove purpose and to corroborate prosecutrix.

In a prosecution for rape, where the prosecuting attorney has elected the act on which he relied for conviction, evidence of subsequent similar offenses by defendant against prosecutrix is admissible, when limited to the purpose of proving defendant's purpose and corroborating the testimony of prosecutrix.

2. Criminal law ⇐1144(15)—Jury presumed to have obeyed in having limited evidence of other offense.

On appeal from a conviction of rape, it must be presumed that the jury obeyed the instructions of the trial court limiting the effect of evidence of other offenses which had been introduced.

3. Criminal law ⇐304(6)—Court takes judicial notice Calexico is in California.

On appeal from a conviction of rape, the court takes judicial notice that Calexico is within the state, so that evidence that defendant took prosecutrix there would not show a violation of the Mann Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8812–8819).

4. Criminal law ⇐1137(5)—Defendant cannot complain that evidence showed another offense, when he alone testified to that charge against him.

On appeal from a conviction for rape, defendant cannot complain that evidence of subsequent offenses by him at another place was inadmissible, as tending to support a charge of child-stealing, when the prosecution's evidence made no reference to his taking prosecutrix to that place, and he alone testified that he had been charged with child-stealing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

J. T. Christian was convicted of rape, and he appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

M. G. Phillips and John S. Cooper, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WELLER, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The prosecutrix, a girl about 13 years of age, was a schoolmate of defendant's daughter, and was in the habit of visiting his home for some months prior to the commission of the offense. On several occasions defendant asked the girl to submit to his desires; but she repeatedly refused, until on the 20th of June, 1919, he succeeded in accomplishing his purpose. The two girls came from school about noon on that day; the defendant arriving home shortly thereafter. According to the testimony of the prosecutrix, at some time during the afternoon Christian indulged in sexual intercourse with her, on the bed in his room. Defendant's daughter stated on the stand that she saw the two sitting on the side of her father's bed, but that she did not witness the act. The prosecutrix further related the circumstances of several subsequent indulgences of a similar character, in Los Angeles. She also testified that in November of the same year she made a trip with defendant and his daughter to Calexico, where all three occupied one bed at a hotel, and that while there Christian more than once had carnal knowledge of her person. Defendant's daughter was a witness to some of the later acts in Los Angeles, and also to the instances in Calexico.

Appellant raises two points upon which he relies as ground for reversal: (1) That the court erred in permitting testimony relating to subsequent acts; and (2) error in allowing evidence of a separate and distinct offense to be presented to the jury.

[1] 1. The rule is well settled in this state that in cases of this character, after the prosecution has selected the particular offense upon which it relies, and has introduced evidence in support of the charge, testimony of subsequent acts of the same nature between the parties may be received for the sole purpose of corroboration. Within these limitations proof of subsequent offenses is admissible to show the adulterous disposition of the defendant and as tending to sustain the charge alleged in the information. People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 623, 76 Pac. 500. The rule was followed in this case. After the prosecutrix had testified to the incidents occurring on June 20, 1919, the district attorney elected to stand upon that date as the one on which the crime was committed. Witnesses then testified to subsequent acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix, for the limited purpose, as expressly stated by the prosecution, of corroboration of the charge.

[2] The court instructed the jury that the succeeding acts were to be considered only to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act charged in the information was committed. In deliberating upon its verdict the jury is presumed to have obeyed the instructions of the court. Thus restricted, evidence of other similar acts, whether occurring before or after the date alleged in the information and selected by the prosecution, could be effective only to induce a belief in the probability of the truth of the main charge. Subsequent acts produce the same impression upon the mind as do prior acts. Each indicates the depraved character of the accused in the same manner and to the same extent. When it is shown that two persons have on a certain occasion indulged in sexual intercourse, it is a strong circumstance in support of testimony relating to previous similar indulgences. We can see no difference between the corroborative effect of evidence of such acts, whether preceding or following the date specifically charged in the information.

[3, 4] 2. Appellant contends that the testimony regarding the trip to Calexico was inadmissible, for the reason that it tends to support a charge of child-stealing, or a violation of the Mann Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8812–8819). As to the latter, we take judicial notice of the fact that Calexico is within the limits of the state of California. The matter relating to child-stealing was brought out by the defendant in his own testimony. He stated that he had been brought back on a charge of child-stealing, and that afterward the charge of rape was lodged against him. We are not concerned with the charge on which defendant was arrested. In the information before us he is charged with the crime of rape, of which he was convicted. The prosecution made no reference to any other crime, but confined its testimony to occurrences at the hotel in Calexico after the child arrived there, simply for the avowed purpose of corroboration of the principal charge. Defendant cannot predicate error upon the admission of his own testimony.

We have carefully examined the entire record, and find no error therein.

Judgment affirmed.

PLEASANTS v. HANSON et al. (Civ. 2139.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 24, 1920.)

1. Deeds ⟸196(3)—No presumption that gift from parent to child is void.

There is no presumption that a deed by a parent conveying property to a child is void, and the burden is on one attacking such deed to prove fraud and undue influence.

2. Deeds ⟸196(3)—Prima facie evidence of fraud or undue influence requires grantee to overcome it.

Where a prima facie case has been made, showing that a deed was obtained by fraud or undue influence, it rests with the grantee to produce sufficient evidence to so weaken or destroy the effect of that presented by plaintiff that the latter no longer establishes a prima facie case.

3. Deeds ⟸72(7)—Gift of property to one of several children without reason closely scrutinized.

A deed from a parent to one of several children, made without valuable consideration, will be closely scrutinized by courts of equity, especially where thereby one child receives a large part of the parent's estate, since the relation of parent and child, though not strictly fiduciary, is naturally one of confidence and trust.

4. Deeds ⟸211(4)—Evidence held to support finding of fraud and undue influence.

Evidence tending to show that defendant, who was one of five children, and who alone of the five had not been contributing to his mother's support, obtained a deed of property constituting the greater part of her estate by falsely representing that he had no property, and that his wife, who had property, would desert him if the conveyance was not made, and that at the time of conveyance the mother was infirm with age and disease, though not mentally incompetent, held to sustain the court's finding that the deed was obtained by fraud and undue influence.

5. Deeds ⟸211(4)—Fraud and undue influence may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

Fraud and undue influence sufficient to invalidate a deed of gift may be established by circumstantial as well as direct evidence.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1) — Trial court must determine weight of conflicting evidence.

Where plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding of fraud and undue influence, but the defendant's testimony gave an entirely different version of the transaction, it was for the trial court to determine the weight of the testimony, and finally to say whether defendant succeeded in overcoming the prima facie case established by plaintiff.

7. Evidence ⟸220(2)—Failure to deny accusation of fraud admissible as admission.

Evidence of a conversation between grantee and grantor, since deceased, in which the grantor charged grantee with false representations, which he did not deny, is admissible as an admission by grantee against his interests.

Action to have decreed null and void and to set aside a certain deed of conveyance on the grounds that the same was procured from the gantor by the grantee through imposition upon the former of misrepresentation and undue influence. Plaintiff was awarded judgment, from which the defendants prosecute this appeal.

The second amended complaint alleges and the court finds: That plaintiff's intestate, who died on the 5th day of December, 1915, was, on the 5th day of August, 1915, and for many years prior thereto, the owner in fee simple and in the actual and peaceable possession of a certain lot of land (the real property in controversy here), situated in the town of Winters, Yolo county, of the reasonable value of $2,000, and also was the owner and in like possession of another lot of land in said town, of the value of $600; that the total value of all the property, real and personal, owned by her on said day was $2,600; that said Mary J. Hanson was, on the day mentioned, the mother of five living adult children, exclusive of the said Isaac J. Hanson, and that all of said five children were for many years immediately prior to said day in constant and confidential association with said deceased, and that said five children had for many years prior to her death assisted her financially and in other ways, "and said Isaac J. Hanson had done nothing in any way toward assisting her for more than 28 years immediately prior to her death"; that said Mary J. Hanson on the day aforesaid, and for some time prior thereto and thereafter, was infirm physically, being at said time suffering from ailments of the limbs and severe attacks of heart trouble, and then more than 75 years of age, and required to be confined to her bed for long periods of time immediately prior to the day last mentioned on account of said years and illness, and that, by reason of her age and the ailments referred to, the deceased, on the said 5th day of August, 1915, was incapacitated from doing any business or entering into any contracts whatever; that the said Isaac J. Hanson, knowing his said mother's incapacity, infirmity, and disability, and for the purpose of defrauding her, procured her, by certain false and fraudulent representations, to execute a deed whereby she conveyed to him the tract of land in question; that the defendant Lillian Hanson, wife of said Isaac J. Hanson, was at the time mentioned herself the owner of real estate of the value of $100,000, standing in her own name, and that said Isaac J. Hanson falsely represented to his mother that, unless she conveyed to him the lot of land in question, his wife, the said Lillian Hanson, would desert him and turn him out into the world penniless, as he was without money or property of any character in his own right; that said Isaac J. Hanson represented to his mother that he could not return to the defendant, Lillian Hanson, unless his said mother executed said instrument of conveyance and that his said wife, Lillian Hanson, had sent him to his mother, Mary J. Hanson, to demand that she (said Mary J. Hanson) execute said conveyance; that, notwithstanding the representations so made by said Isaac J. Hanson, the said Mary J. Hanson still refused to sign or execute the instrument conveying the land in dispute to said Isaac J. Hanson, and that the latter thereupon became "greatly excited and red in the face and shook said instrument at Mary J. Hanson and cried, 'Oh, Ma, you have to sign this paper or I shall be a pauper;'" that said Mary J. Hanson, being weak in body and mind and by reason of the maternal love she bore said defendant, Isaac J. Hanson, and fearing that he would be deserted by his said wife, Lillian Hanson, if she (Mary J. Hanson) refused to sign said instrument, and "being alone at said time, and having no separate or independent advice, and believing all and each of said representations to be true, and by reason of said representations and wholly and only on account thereof, executed said instrument in writing and acknowledged the execution thereof and delivered the same to the defendant Isaac J. Hanson"; that each and all of said representations were false, and defendant Isaac J. Hanson knew each and all of said representations to be false when he made them to said Mary J. Hanson, and that he made said representations for the purpose of influencing said Mary J. Hanson to sign said instrument; that there was not then, and there never was, any consideration given for said instrument; that defendant Isaac J. Hanson is, and was at said time, a scheming and calculating business man, and had property of the value of more than $50,- 000; that said Mary J. Hanson at all times herein mentioned implicitly trusted said defendant Isaac J. Hanson, and reposed absolute confidence as to all matters in said defendant, Isaac J. Hanson, he being her oldest living child, and that her confidence was such, and her belief in said Isaac J. Hanson was so strong and implicit, that she would have executed and signed any papers presented to her by him for her signature; and that the said deed, referred to in the complaint as having been signed by said Mary J. Hanson for said Isaac J. Hanson, was in fact signed for him by her by and because of the confidence she had in him as hereinbefore set forth.

The complaint contains a second count or cause of action, setting forth the fact of the physical infirmities of Mary J. Hanson and the facts respecting the alleged misrepresentations made by Isaac J. Hanson to the deceased, as alleged and set forth in the first count, and upon these facts bases the allegation that Mary J. Hanson was induced to execute and deliver to said Isaac J. Hanson the deed in question through undue influence, and the court also found accordingly.

The most important question submitted here for decision is whether the evidence supports the findings of the court, to which we reply, in limine, that tested by the principles of law which govern in a case of this character, the evidence appears to be sufficient to have justified the decision. At any rate, as we must view the evidence, it amply supports the findings.

[1, 2] While it is true that there is no presumption that a deed by a parent conveying property to a child is invalid or void, and that, when such a deed is attacked on the ground of fraud or undue influence, the burden is cast upon the parent to prove such fraud or undue influence, it is also true that when a prima facie case of fraud or undue influence in the procurement of the conveyance is made by the parent, it then rests with the donee (defendant) to produce sufficient evidence to so weaken or destroy the effect of the evidence presented by the plaintiff as that the latter's evidence cannot longer stand as establishing a prima facie case either of fraud or undue influence or both. He (the defendant) may do this by showing in a proper way that the evidence of the plaintiff tending to show fraud or undue influence is not credible or for sufficient reasons not to be relied upon.

[3] But in cases of this class—that is, where property is obtained without a valuable consideration by a child from its parent—intrinsic circumstances may exist which call for the strictest scrutiny of such transactions. This observation has emphatic application to those cases where one child, to the exclusion of other children of the parent, receives from the latter, without a valuable consideration, a very large part of the patrimony to which all the children would in equal shares succeed under the law of descent or succession in case of intestacy. This rule follows from the fact that the relation existing between parent and child, although strictly not fiduciary, is naturally one of confidence and trust, and since, therefore, that would be upon its face an unnatural transaction, which would result in one of a number of children receiving from the parent as a gift the larger portion of the latter's estate, thus excluding the other children from the enjoyment of benefits growing out of the parent's estate to which naturally they would be entitled, it is not a harsh or unreasonable rule which requires the courts, on an issue as to whether the favored child had obtained the gift through the free and voluntary act of the parent or through fraud or undue influence, to scan or examine the transaction scrutinizingly or require the defendant, where fraud or undue influence is prima facie established as against the donee in the transaction, to make very satisfactory proof that the showing on the part of the plaintiff is wholly without foundation for its support.

The instant case, in the facts as indicated by the complaint and the court's findings, and, as we shall later see, as shown, by the evidence, finds almost a complete counterpart in the case of Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 Pac. 289. The following language taken from the opinion in that case (7 Cal. App. 20, 21, 93 Pac. 292) has peculiarly cogent application to the present case:

"But the relation of parent and child, where business transactions are carried on between them, is the source of the very highest considerations of confidence and trust. Confidence in such a case originates in and proceeds from natural laws, and, generally speaking, is innate and an essential part of the nature of both, for in whom could a parent repose a greater degree of confidence than in him to whom has been directly transmitted his own blood, and over whom he has exercised parental dominion and discipline from infancy to matured manhood. So, when a son, dealing with his parent with regard to the latter's property, gains an advantage or obtains title to such property without adequate or any consideration, the transaction should, upon principles of equity and fair dealing, be scanned with the strictest scrutiny. And, a fortiori, should such transaction be examined circumspectly when the parent is, as here shown to be, aged and mentally infirm, even though not altogether incompetent, and where there are other children, for the exclusion of whom from the parent's estate no reasonable account is given or apparent. The books are full of cases illustrating the application of the principle as thus stated."

In Comstock v. Comstock, 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 453, a case in which an aged parent conveyed property to her son and the deed set aside, the court said:

"It is a well-settled rule of equity jurisprudence, that all gifts, contracts, or benefits, from a principal to one occupying a fiduciary or confidential relation to him, are constructively fraudulent and void. The court, in such cases, acts upon the principle 'that if confidence is reposed, it must be faithfully acted upon; if influence is acquired, it must be kept free from the taint of selfish interest, and cunning and overreaching bargains.' 'In this class of cases, there is often found some intermixture of deceit, imposition or overreaching advantage, or other mark of positive or direct fraud. But the principle upon which courts of equity act in regard thereto, stands independent of any such ingredient, upon a motive of general public policy. Among the relations subject to the foregoing rule are those of parent and child, attorney and client, and principal and agent.' "

[4] The evidence supporting the allegations of the complaint may be briefly summarized. It may first be stated that this evidence comes mainly from members of the family of deceased. The deceased, at the time of her death in the month of December, 1915, was of the age of 76 years, and the deed in question was executed and delivered by her to the defendant Isaac J. Hanson, on the 6th day of August, 1915, or approximately four months prior to the date of the passing of deceased. For a long period of time prior and down to the date of her death, deceased had been and was a sufferer from a serious heart affection, which, with other physical ailments which were of themselves of a less serious nature, often confined her to her bed for certain periods of time of varying duration. The deceased was a woman naturally of strong intellectuality, and had, in her time, been a devout lover of good book reading or literature of the higher order. The effect, however, of the long siege of physical ailments and like disability was to impair in no small or insignificant degree the natural strength of her mentality, and thus to render her power of self-will much less marked and positive than it had been when, in her earlier years, she was in the enjoyment of excellent physical health. In other words, she had, from her long, uninterrupted period of physical illness, grown noticeably feeble, not only physically, but also mentally, and, while it is not here claimed that she was wholly incompetent to transact ordinary matters of business with some degree of intelligence and judgment, it nevertheless appears to be reasonably inferable from the evidence that her condition, mentally, at and for some time immediately preceding the time at which the transaction from which this controversy arises, was such, by reason of her long years of physical suffering and her venerable years, that she could the more easily or the more readily than when she was in the enjoyment of her normal physical health be influenced by those in whom naturally or for other reasons she reposed confidence and trust.

The evidence further shows, and as to this there is no dispute, that, shortly after the disastrous and never-to-be forgotten earthquake and fire in the city of San Francisco in April, 1906, the deceased purchased the property in dispute and another lot in the town of Winters, Yolo county; that there were residence structures thereon, either erected by herself or those preceding her in ownership of the lots; and that, though she realized from both pieces of said properties at times an income in the way of rents, the same were scarcely sufficient to maintain her and that, for a period of 10 years immediately preceding her demise, she resided, during alternate periods, with her three married daughters, Mrs. Pleasants and Mrs. Willis, of Winters, and Mrs. Olds, of Piedmont, Alameda county. It further appears that these daughters thus took care of their mother, and received and asked for no compensation as in return for the performance of that service.

At the time of the transaction upon which this action is founded, Mrs. Mary J. Hanson was a widow, her husband having died in the year 1890, and she had five living children, to wit, the defendant Isaac J. Hanson, Edwin J. Hanson, and the three daughters above named. Isaac J. Hanson was a married man, and had lived in Brockton and Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, for something like 28 years before the date of the execution and delivery of the deed in controversy. During that period of time Isaac J. Hanson contributed nothing to the support of his mother, except that, upon an occasion when he was on a visit to California, he bought her a pair of shoes, for which he paid $10; and here we may well interpose that, while Isaac testified in chief that he had from time to time remitted small amounts to his mother from his Eastern home, he admitted, on cross-examination, that the sums so sent to his mother were in payment by installments of a loan of $100 with which his mother had previously accommodated him.

The evidence without controversy shows that the relations existing between the deceased and her three daughters and her son Edwin J. Hanson were always and mutually of the most affectionate character—that is, that she uniformly entertained for them and they for her that reciprocal love and fondness which may naturally be assumed to exist as a general rule between parent and child. Edwin J. Hanson testified that he worked in San Francisco for some 5 or 6 years and down to the time that he entered college; that during a part of that period of time he was engaged in the milk business; that during said time he sent and gave to his mother all his earnings, to be used by her for her support; and that he continued to help his mother until the time he started to college.

As to the circumstances under which the deed in question was made by the deceased, it may be stated generally that there is testimony supporting the allegations of the complaint and the findings that Isaac J. Hanson represented to his mother that his (Isaac's) wife was wealthy in her own right; that he himself was the possessor of no means; that his wife was persistently insistent that Isaac should obtain from his mother a conveyance of the particular piece of property in dispute; that his wife had said to him that, unless he did obtain a deed to said property, she (the wife) would desert him and send him out into the world penniless; that the deceased, moved by these representations and the incessant importunities of Isaac that she convey to him said property, and thus save him from becoming "a pauper," finally yielded thereto against her own convictions, and so consented to and did execute and deliver to Isaac the conveyance.

Edwin J. Hanson testified that Isaac, when on a visit to California, either in the year 1914 or 1915, on one occasion, in the city of San Francisco, stated to him (Edwin) that he (Isaac) and his wife were jointly worth $100,000—that is, that each was worth the sum of $50,000. Mrs. Pleasants testified that Isaac and his wife, having gone to the state of Washington in the year 1914 to attend to some property matters they had in that state, passed through California on their way to their Eastern home; that they went directly to Winters, and inquired about the deceased and as to where she was then living. Mrs. Pleasants replied that deceased was then in Piedmont, stopping with Howard Willis during the absence from home of the latter's parents, to which Isaac interrogatively retorted, "Oh, she's alone, is she?" Mrs. Pleasants answered affirmatively, and shortly thereafter Isaac and his wife left Winters and went to Piedmont; that it was upon this visit to his mother (July, 1915) that Isaac succeeded in prevailing upon his mother to make the conveyance to him of the property in controversy.

Harvey Olds, a grandson of deceased by her daughter of that surname, testified that, on the evening of the departure of Isaac and his wife for their home in the East, a farewell gathering of the family was had at the family home of the Oldses; that he (the witness), during the evening, had occasion to go into the kitchen, where the deceased and Isaac were together and alone and engaged in conversation; that he overheard his grandmother, "in excited tones," say to Isaac, "Why did you make me believe that Lillian would leave you?" And he said, "Oh, what's the difference; don't worry;" and then she said, "I will worry; you had no right to tell me that Lillian would leave you unless this property was deeded over to you;" and he said, "Oh, forget it, Ma; it's all right; don't say anything about it; you will come out all right"—or something like that.

Thus there has been presented, in synoptical fashion, sufficient of the evidence introduced in support of the charge that the conveyance under attack was obtained by Isaac by the exercise of undue influence upon his mother to show that this court cannot justly hold, as a matter of law, that the findings upon which the judgment rests are not so fortified evidentially as to render them entirely immune from successful attack.

[5] It is true that there is no direct testimony showing coercion or the exercise of undue influence by Isaac in the procurement of the deed. But there can be no successful impeachment of the legal proposition that in a case of this character, no less than in any other case, the ultimate fact may be established by circumstantial evidence. Indeed, in this case, in considering the evidence with a view of determining its logical effect, the court was authorized to, and doubtless did, take into account the general atmosphere, so to speak, or, in other words, the general surroundings, of the controversy, as they were opened up by the proofs, and as to this consideration these facts were singularly significant: That the deceased and her children, who were with and near her nearly all their lives, were always on excellent terms, and that said children at all times manifested and practiced in their treatment of their mother the love and affection which alone spring from filial duty, and that the deceased in full measure reciprocated that love and affection; that said children, for years, contributed to her support, and otherwise gave her that care and attention in the helplessness of her venerable years and physical disability which it is the natural duty of all children to bestow upon their parents similarly circumstanced; that Isaac had been away from her for many years, had not during these years companionized with her, had in a sense or to an extent thus become estranged from her, although, quite naturally, she still bore for him a mother's love, and that, unlike his brother and sisters, he had contributed nothing towards her support, maintenance and care; that, finally, and as a most rational conclusion from all those facts, no sane or sound reason existed, or at least, none such was shown, why, to the exclusion of her other children, she should have given the bulk of her estate, or by far the larger portion thereof, to Isaac.

It is to be conceded that the evidence, as it appears in the record, does not appear to show as clearly or satisfactorily as such a fact should be shown, where it is relied upon to vitiate a deed of conveyance or a will, that the deceased, at the time of the making of the deed in question, was mentally incompetent to transact business; but the evidence, as we have shown, is undisputed that she had been for a long time prior to that transaction in poor physical health, being at times required to remain in her bed, and upon the whole evidence it was for the trial court to determine whether or not her mental condition had been so affected as the result of her physical sufferings as to have rendered her more tractable, and therefore more susceptible to external or extrinsic pressure or influences, than she would have been under normal circumstances or conditions, and so, under the force of persistent importunity by one for whom naturally she entertained a strong sentiment of affection and love, and in whom consequently she reposed confidence, would be likely to perform or do some act which, if left wholly to her own volition with reference thereto, she would not have done or performed. And we doubt not that the situation as developed by the evidence was such as to have warranted the court in finding that, in her weakened physical condition, the deceased would the more readily believe the representation made by Isaac that his wife would desert and leave him penniless, if he did not succeed in obtaining the conveyance in question, and that, so believing and actuated by a mother's love, she would the more readily accede to his demand for the conveyance. The conclusion would naturally follow that the procurement of the deed by Isaac was the result of the prosecution by him of undue pressure upon the donor, which, of course, means that undue influence was exercised by Isaac upon his mother to induce her to give him the property.

[6] The defendants, it is true, gave an entirely different version of the transaction from that presented by the witnesses for the plaintiff. But it was for the trial court to determine the weight of all the testimony, pro and con, received into the record, and finally to say whether the defendants succeeded in overcoming or repelling what clearly appears to be a good prima facie case of undue influence made by the plaintiff.

The appellants have cited a number of cases, some from this and some from other jurisdictions, which they vigorously contend fit the facts of this case as they view them, and so, they insist, established the legal invalidity of the findings and the judgment. Among the cases so cited is that of Boardman v. Lorentzen, 155 Wis. 566, 145 N. W. 750, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 476, in the opinion in which the Supreme Court of Wisconsin said:

"There must be shown a subject unquestionably susceptible to undue influence, either as the result of old age, mental weakness, or both; also some clear evidence of opportunity, and a disposition on the part of the beneficiary to exercise such influence, in order to raise the presumption of such exercise, and call upon the defendant to so far weaken it, at least, as to destroy efficiency to establish the ultimate fact. It must follow that to warrant such a result as was reached here as to undue influence, the fact of susceptibility to such influence must be left at the end of the trial unquestionably established, and the disposition to exercise such influence established by clear evidence."

That was a case in which the father, aged and infirm mentally and physically, transferred his small estate to his son-in-law in consideration of an agreement on the part of Lorentzen, the donee, and his wife (daughter of the donor), that they would care for and support him during the few remaining years of his life. The children of the donor, other than the married daughter above referred to, had not lived with or in any way cared for the donor for over 25 years, while Mrs. Lorentzen, who was his youngest daughter, remained and lived with him until after her mother's death and down to the day that she was married to Lorentzen. It is plain that that case is, so far as the facts are concerned, wholly different from this. Indeed, it is the reverse of this case, since here the donee was the only child of the five of the deceased who had not been with, or to any extent contributed to the support of, his mother, while the other children had always lived near and contributed to her support and otherwise ministered to her wants.

The California cases named by appellants as supporting their position as to the question whether the evidence in this case is sufficient to sustain the finding of undue influence are In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 302, 44 Pac. 577; In re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 296, 49 Pac. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179; Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 390, 396, 73 Pac. 1081; Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 762, 130 Pac. 872. An examination of these cases and a comparison of them with the case at bar, however, will at once disclose to the mind that there is a clear distinction between them founded in the facts. It is not regarded necessary to review said cases herein for the purpose of determining the verity of his statement.

[7] The last and only other point made by the appellants is that, over their objection, the court erroneously permitted the witness Harvey Olds to relate the conversation he overheard between the deceased and Isaac J. Hanson, in the kitchen of the Olds home, and to which conversation reference is above made. It is claimed that the ruling was erroneous under the doctrine of the case of Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 Pac. 872, supra. But this claim is not well founded. In the Gleason Case, the declarations objected to were by the deceased to a third party, and not in the presence of the beneficiaries under her testament. The court therein held, as all the cases hold, that the declarations of a decedent which contravene the provisions or terms of a testament previously made by him are not admissible as evidence of undue influence having been used to induce him to make the will, but that, where the testamentary incapacity of the testator is an issue and sought to be established, any declarations he may have made, before or subsequent to the testamentary act, tending or reasonably having a tendency to establish that he was of unsound mind at the time he executed the testamentary instrument, are competent and admissible for that purpose. In the case at bar, the conversation objected to was between the deceased and the defendant Isaac J. Hanson himself, after the deed had been executed by the former and by her delivered to Isaac, and therefore said conversation constituted the subject of competent evidence which was admissible upon the theory that the conversation, in so far as Isaac's part therein was concerned, included an admission against his own interest—"admission," in the juridical sense of that term. In fact, the proof of the conversation involved, necessarily, proof of extrajudicial statements concerning the transaction in dispute, which, except where they are mere self-serving declarations of the declarant, are always admissible under the familiar rule of evidence that they are against the interest of the declarant.

As stated, no other points are made. We have in our examination of the record found no legal reason for disturbing the decision below.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

48 Cal. App. 681

BLACKWELL v. AMERICAN FILM CO., Inc., et al. (Civ. 3470.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 27, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 23, 1920.)

1. Abatement and revival ⟹68—Action for personal injury does not abate on death of plaintiff after judgment.

An action for personal injuries to plaintiff does not abate on death of plaintiff while a judgment in his favor rendered before his death had not been vacated or set aside.

2. Carriers ⟹320(21)—Where testimony as to colliding automobiles was conflicting, reconciling it is for jury.

In an action against the owners of two automobiles which collided for injuries to a passenger in one, where the evidence was conflicting as to the operation of the two cars at the time of the accident, it was for the jury to pass on and reconcile the conflicting statements in the light of the circumstances surrounding the accident and the opportunity of the witnesses to observe the facts to which they testified.

3. Carriers ⟹306(1)—Where negligence of both automobile operators contributed to a passenger's injuries, each is liable.

Where injuries to a passenger in one of two colliding automobiles were proximately caused by the negligence of the operators of both automobiles, each operator is liable to the passenger for the full damage sustained by him, so that where appellant was negligently driving on the left side of the road it was no defense to his liability that the codefendant, against whom no verdict was rendered, was operating at negligent speed.

4. Trial ⟹205 — Refusal of instruction that burden of proof was on plaintiff held error.

In an action for injuries to an automobile passenger brought against the operators of both colliding automobiles, it was error to refuse a charge requested by one defendant that plaintiff, to recover against that defendant, must establish its negligence by a preponderance of the evidence where there was no other instruction as to the burden of proof against that defendant and there was an instruction as to burden of proof against the other.

5. Appeal and error ⟹1064(1)—Charge that judgment may go against one or both defendants not prejudicial, where verdict for both would be erroneous.

In an action for injuries to an automobile passenger brought against the operators of the two colliding automobiles, where there was no proof that the passenger was contributorily negligent or that it was an inevitable accident, an instruction that plaintiff could recover against one of the defendants and may be against both, though erroneous, was not prejudicial, since a verdict for both defendants would have been contrary to the evidence.

6. Appeal and error ⟹1064(1) — Failure to submit form of verdict for both defendants held not prejudicial.

In an action against two defendants for injuries to an automobile passenger where a verdict in favor of both defendants would have been contrary to the evidence so that it would have to be set aside, it was not prejudicial error for the court to fail to submit a form of verdict in favor of both defendants.

7. Appeal and error ⟹1064(1)—Negligent defendant not prejudiced by inconsistent instructions as to burden of proof against codefendant.

In an action against the operators of two colliding automobiles for injuries to a passenger in one, appealing defendant, who was guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury to plaintiff and therefore liable for such injuries, was not prejudiced by inconsistent instructions as to the burden of proof of the negligence of the codefendant.

8. Appeal and error ⟹1064(1)—Instruction as to testimony of all parties held not prejudicial error.

An instruction that plaintiff was interested in his case and that the employés of both defendants were interested but that such interest did not require disregard of their testimony, though it should be considered in weighing such testimony, was not prejudicial, since it referred to all parties, but it is unsafe for the court to call attention to the testimony of witnesses.

9. Trial ⊂228(3) — Instruction referring to proximate cause of accident, instead of injury, not error.

In an action for injuries to a passenger in an automobile which collided with another, instructions which referred to the negligence of defendant as the proximate cause of the accident, instead of proximate cause of the injury, to plaintiff, were not erroneous.

10. Appeal and error ⊂1064(1), 1067—Errors as to instructions held not prejudicial.

Where plaintiff was, under the evidence, entitled to recover from one or the other, or from both, of the joint tort-feasors, and the instructions made it clear that the jury should fix the responsibility on one or both, errors by the court in giving instructions and refusing requests did not result in a miscarriage of justice and do not warrant reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Edward Blackwell against the American Film Company, Incorporated, and another, in which Rachael E. Blackwell, as administratrix, was substituted as plaintiff after the death of the original plaintiff subsequent to judgment in his favor. From the judgment against the American Film Company, Incorporated, that defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thompson & Robertson, of Santa Barbara, and Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, and W. P. Butcher, of Santa Barbara, for United Stages.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff's intestate, her husband, Edward Blackwell, was seriously injured in a head-on collision between an automobile, owned by the American Film Company, with one owned and operated by the defendant United Stages. Both defendants denied any liability in the premises and alleged the negligent operation of the automobile of its codefendant as the proximate cause of the accident. It is not claimed by either that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or that the injury was caused by inevitable accident. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant American Film Company alone, awarding damages in the sum of $13,762. From the judgment entered, that defendant has appealed.

[1] Blackwell has since died, but the action did not abate; the judgment in his favor, rendered before his death, not having been vacated or set aside. Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 153, 86 Pac. 178. Rachael E. Blackwell, as administratrix of Blackwell's estate, has been substituted as plaintiff in his place.

In seeking a reversal of the judgment, appellant places its reliance upon errors in giving and refusing instructions, and in submitting to the jury three forms of verdict claimed to be misleading and unfair to the film company.

[2] The collision occurred at night on a straight section of the highway, and the evidence demonstrates that each machine was in plain sight of the other for approximately a half mile. There is testimony that the automobile of the defendant film company was on the left-hand side of the road, and that the driver of the stage, his automobile being then on the right-hand side, turned off the paved section of the highway to his right, just before the collision occurred, in order to avoid the crash, and that the film company auto lights "made a straight line toward the stage." There is other evidence which would reverse the respective positions of the automobiles, and also indicate that the stage was being operated at the speed of 40 to 45 miles an hour, while that of the film company was proceeding at a rate of 30 to 35 miles per hour. These were all matters for the consideration of the jury, whose duty it was to pass upon and reconcile the conflicting statements, in the light of the circumstances surrounding the accident and the opportunity of the witnesses to observe the facts concerning which they testified.

[3] The injury suffered by plaintiff was not self-inflicted; it resulted either from the negligence of the defendant, the American Film Company, or from the negligence of the defendant United Stages, or from the negligence of both. All the authorities recognize the right of a plaintiff to recover, under such circumstances, against either, or both of the defendants, whose concurring acts of negligence united in producing the injury. Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171. If it were established to the satisfaction of the jury that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the concurring negligence of the appellant film company, and the respondent stage company, the appellant was liable without regard to the negligence of its codefendant. Muller v. Hale, 138 Cal. 163, 168, 71 Pac. 81. When the question arises between two parties, who are jointly charged with negligence, it is only necessary to show that both contributed to the injury, notwithstanding the fact that one may have been wanton and reckless and that the other simply manifested want of ordinary caution. Although the act of each defendant alone might not have caused the injury, there is no good reason why each defendant should not be liable for the damage caused by the different acts of all. Spear v. United Railroads, 16

Cal. App. 637, 659–661, 117 Pac. 956. If the film company was guilty of negligence in the instant case, it has no defense in the fact that the negligence of the stage company may have also contributed to that damage, through the operation of its stage at an excessive rate of speed. Forsythe v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 569, 572, 87 Pac. 24.

In the light of these authorities, if the jury believed that the automobile of the appellant was being negligently operated on that portion of the highway reserved to the use of the auto of the stage company, and that such fact contributed to and was a proximate cause of the accident, then the jury was justified in bringing a verdict against the appellant, notwithstanding that the excessive rate of speed of the stage may have been a concurring cause. Appellant is reluctant to concede that the law, as we have stated it, is particularly applicable to the facts in this case, which explains some of the contentions it has made.

[4] The appellant requested the court to instruct the jury:

"That the burden of proving the negligence of defendant American Film Company rests upon plaintiff, and in order for plaintiff to recover against defendant American Film Company it must establish such negligence by a preponderance of the evidence."

The request was refused, and no reason appears, or suggests itself to us for such action by the lower court, for the instruction contained a correct statement of law. All the court did in that regard was to state to the jury that—

"In civil cases * * * a preponderance is all that is required. That is, such evidence as when weighed with that opposed to it has more convincing force, and from which it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests."

The jury were thus left uninformed as to where the burden of proof rested, as to appellant's negligence. Later in its charge, in dealing with the other defendant, the United Stages, a common carrier, the court gave a proper instruction as to the burden of proof in considering its negligence. The refused instruction should have been given. It was error, but, as we shall presently show, in our further consideration of the instructions, not prejudicial, to refuse it.

[5] The court instructed the jury:

"In this case the plaintiff is entitled to recover of at least one of these defendants and perhaps both of them. That is a question for you to determine. There is no question of contributory negligence or unavoidable accident involved in this case. One or either of these defendants and perhaps both of them, for you to determine, were guilty of negligence."

Again, in the course of its charge, the court said:

"As I have told you, the plaintiff is entitled to recover against one of these parties, and maybe both."

It was error for the court to thus charge the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover; but, as the entire record so clearly establishes the fact that a verdict for both the defendants would have been contrary to the evidence, the error should be regarded as immaterial. Levitzky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 299, 305; Green v. Ophir C. S. & G. M. Co., 45 Cal. 522, 527; In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 454, 31 Pac. 453; City of Santa Ana v. Gildmacher, 133 Cal. 395, 399, 65 Pac. 883.

[6] In this same connection, the court submitted but three forms of verdict to the jury: One for damages against both defendants; the second for damages as against the defendant United Stages, and in favor of the defendant American Film Company; and the third against the defendant American Film Company, and in favor of the United Stages. No other form or forms of verdict appear to have been requested. In fact, as already stated, none other could have been rendered under the evidence. Both appellant and the other defendant, to all intents, acknowledged that plaintiff's intestate was injured in the accident, and each industriously sought to fasten the liability for his injuries upon its codefendant. That appears to have been the theory upon which the case was tried. No prejudicial error resulted from the failure of the court to submit to the jury, with the others, a form of verdict finding in favor of both defendants. Upon this record, such a verdict, if found, would be clearly erroneous. (Cases last cited.)

After fully and correctly instructing the jury as to the reciprocal duties owed plaintiff by each defendant, the court further charged it:

"If you believe from the evidence that the sole and proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the American Film Company or its servants, then it will be your duty to find a verdict against that company and in favor of the United Stages.

"If, on the other hand, you believe that the sole and proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the United Stages, then it will be your duty to find a verdict against that company and in favor of the American Film Company.

"And if you find that both were guilty of negligence in any degree which proximately contributed to the accident, you will find against both.

"But if the evidence is equally consistent with the exercise of due care on the part of the defendant American Film Company no recovery can be had against that defendant. Of course, if the evidence is equally balanced as to either defendant then you will find in favor of that defendant."

[7] Appellant contends that the sentence italicized conflicts with another portion of the charge, wherein the jury was told that as the United Stages was carrying plaintiff's intestate as a passenger for hire, when he was injured, a presumption of negligence arose which threw upon that defendant the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on its part. It argues that if the evidence was equally balanced the stage company had not overcome its burden, and the verdict should necessarily have been against it. Assuming such a state of the evidence to exist, the instruction did no violence to the right of the appellant. As one of two joint tort-feasors it was liable to plaintiff for the injuries received, regardless of whether a verdict was returned against its codefendant or not.

[8] The court also instructed the jury:

"Plaintiff, of course, is interested in his case, and the employés of both defendants are interested. You are not on that account, however, solely to disbelieve any of them. You are merely to consider that interest in passing upon their credibility."

Appellant contends that this was error. In our opinion it was not prejudicial error, because it included witnesses on all sides of the case (Pennsylvania Co. v. Versten, 140 Ill. 637, 30 N. E. 540, 15 L. R. A. 798), but there was no occasion for giving the instruction. It is never safe for a trial judge, in instructing a jury, to comment upon or call attention to the testimony of one or more witnesses. In the instant case the court had already instructed the jurors that they might, in weighing the evidence and determining the credibility of the witnesses, consider "their relation to the parties" and "their interest in the case." That was sufficient, and the instruction should have stopped there.

[9] In two places, in its charge, the trial court used the following language: "Negligence is of no consequence unless it is the proximate cause of the accident." Appellant complains of the use of the word "accident" instead of the word "injuries," contending that, granting its negligence might have caused or contributed to the accident, the negligence of the other defendant might have been the sole or an aggravating cause of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff's intestate. Appellant attempts to make a distinction without a difference. Furthermore, the charge, in other apt instructions, properly related the negligence of the defendants in this case to the injuries of plaintiff's intestate.

[10] Except in the particulars considered, the charge was a corrrect and fairly adequate statement of the law of the case. The plaintiff's intestate was seriously injured by the collision of the automobiles of the two defendants, without any fault of his own. As bluntly stated by the court to the jury, he was entitled to recover from one or the other, or from both, of the joint tort-feasors. The instructions made it clear that it was for the jury to decide and fix the responsibility on one or both defendants. The errors committed by the court in refusing, and in giving instructions, therefore, did not result in a miscarriage of justice, and are not such as would warrant a reversal. It does not require the invocation of the remedial provision of the Constitution, which is clearly applicable, to so hold. The authorities already cited establish the rule that such errors are immaterial and should be disregarded when, as in the instant case, a verdict finds abundant support in the law and the facts. Levitzky v. Canning, supra; Green v. Ophir C., S. & G. M. Co., supra, and other cases first cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUMBOLDT COUNTY v. VAN DUZER et al.

(Civ. 3335.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 23, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession ⟸8(1)—Land dedicated to public use not acquired by.

Land dedicated to public use cannot be acquired by adverse possession.

2. Dedication ⟸44—Finding that land conveyed to county was used by public supported by evidence.

In an action by a county to quiet title to land conveyed, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the land conveyed was impressed with a trust for public use, and was accepted and used as a public road and ferry crossing.

3. Dedication ⟸16(1)—Conveyance and use as road constituted dedication.

The public use of a road to a ferry, together with a map of appraisers designating the land as a road, followed by a deed of conveyance to the county, constituted a dedication to public use of the land conveyed, although the deed did not designate the purpose of the conveyance.

4. Navigable waters ⟸44(1)—Law of accretion applied to county property.

Where landowner conveyed a strip of land to county, to be used as a roadway to a ferry on a stream bisecting the land, and the river changed its course, the law of accretion applied to the county's property, as well as to the landowner's.

5. Dedication ⟸63(2)—Intent to abandon by county must be clearly manifest.

To effect an abandonment of an easement for public use of property acquired by grant to the public authorities, the intention to abandon must be clearly manifest, and mere nonuser of an easement acquired by grant does not amount to an abandonment.

6. Highways ⊂⊃79(1)—No abandonment of roadway to ferry shown.

Action of board of supervisors of county, releasing one from operating ferry and later granting a license to another, the latter operating the ferry in whole or in part between new lands, and using different approaches to the landing by reason of the changeableness of the river, was no evidence of an abandonment of a roadway conveyed to the county by a landowner to the original landings.

7. Estoppel ⊂⊃62(8)—County not estopped from asserting title to land.

A county was not estopped from asserting title to a roadway to a ferry crossing by reason of its permitting the grantor to clear and cultivate the land for years, where the landowner profited by the use of the land in excess of the expenditure made in clearing it; landowner not paying any taxes upon the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Humboldt County against Isaac Van Duzer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. W. Hunter, of Eureka, for appellants.
A. W. Hill and H. C. Nelson, both of Eureka, for respondent.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, quieting title against defendants to a strip of land in Humboldt county, acquired by the county in the year 1880, for the purpose of a public road and ferry crossing over Eel river.

The land in question was deeded in 1880 to the county by defendant Van Duzer's predecessor, George H. Singley, for a money consideration, by an ordinary grant deed describing the land conveyed by metes and bounds, conveying the fee, and not specifying that the land was conveyed for road and ferry purposes. The deed was made in pursuance of the report of a board of appraisers appointed by the board of supervisors in 1879 for the purpose of selecting and appraising land to be acquired for ferry purposes at the place on the river called Singley's ferry. The report of the appraisers contained a map or plat showing the location of the land to be acquired, connecting roads, river bank, and other pertinent objects near by. The land itself, as shown on the map, was designated "New Road." It was filed and recorded in 1880.

Singley had been licensed by the board of supervisors to operate Singley's Ferry November 5, 1879. In December, 1880, Singley petitioned the supervisors to be relieved from the obligation of operating the ferry, specifying in his petition the difficulties of operation, occasioned by the erratic behavior of the river in shifting its course, throwing up sand bars and the like. This petition was granted, and no license to operate a ferry at this place existed until a year later. On December 20, 1881, a license was granted to Martin McDonald to operate a ferry at Singley's Ferry. Defendant Van Duzer, who had during the same year acquired the lands of Singley, signed and filed an instrument consenting to the use of his lands and dedicating the same for the purposes of landings for the ferry to be operated by McDonald.

It appears that McDonald, in whole or in part, used McDonald lane as an approach to the ferry landing, instead of the Singley road, the land here involved. McDonald lane was also involved in this action, but as to it the defendants filed a disclaimer. The Singley road fell into disuse as a result of the ferry changing its landing places from time to time. The defendant Van Duzer eventually took possession of the arable portion of the land which had been deeded to the county by Singley, and he and his tenants have been cultivating and farming it for upwards of 30 years.

[1] Appellants claim title to a part of the land by adverse possession. It is recognized that land dedicated to public use cannot be acquired by adverse possession, but it is claimed that this land was never impressed with a trust for public use. It is pointed out that the deed itself did not dedicate the land for road or ferry purposes, and it is contended that the finding of the court that the land had been accepted and used as a public road and ferry crossing is not supported by the evidence.

The findings, following the testimony, show that the river has undergone many changes, annually moving and shifting about, throwing up sand bars, so that there was a constant struggle between the ferrymen and the river. The ferry had to move up or down the river for deep water and suitable landings, as the river in its whim changed deep water to sand bar, or river bank, and back again. The testimony of witnesses who had seen the ferry operated in 1880 was heard at the trial. The face of the ground had changed so much in 30 years that these witnesses were not able with great exactness to designate the precise boundaries or location of the river approach used by the public in 1879, 1880, and thereabouts. Appellants claim that the testimony shows the land so used was at one side of and not within the boundaries of the land in suit. The surveys and testimony are both conflicting on this point.

However, before the trial commenced, the boundaries of the disputed land had been marked out by rows of white flags by a surveyor and several witnesses testified that these flags marked the river approach used by the public in 1880 and other dates specified.

[2, 3] The findings of the trial court upon this conflicting evidence are sufficiently supported by the testimony. The public use of the road, together with the map of the appraisers, referred to, which designated the land "New Road," followed by the deed of conveyance to the county, constituted a dedication to public use of the land conveyed.

[4] Whether the ferry be a highway or not, the ferry crossing was a public use, and it is no great consequence to this case whether the land was dedicated to one public use or another. We see no application in the argument of appellant that a ferry is not a highway. The land, originally bisected by the river, is now all dry land, owing to the fact that the river has moved south. In this process of moving, whatever land involved was used strictly for ferry purposes, as distinguished from a public road to and from the ferry landings, became a part of the road proper. The law of accretion would apply to the county's property, as well as to the defendants.

Appellants contend that, if it is held that this land was once dedicated or impressed with a public use, nevertheless this public use was abandoned by the county; that after abandonment of the public use the land was thereafter held by the county in its proprietary capacity, as distinguished from its governmental capacity, and that thereupon the land, no longer being held for a public use, was subject to acquisition by adverse possession. It is claimed that the release of Singley as ferryman, the changes in the river course, and the location of the ferry, the fact that there is now no water touching the land upon which a ferry could be floated, the establishment of other approaches and the recent construction of a concrete bridge across the river, constitutes such an abandonment of the public use of the land.

It is not to be doubted that land held for a public use cannot be acquired by adverse possession. This is established in this state by a long line of authorities. These authorities are cited and reviewed in People v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 735, 93 Pac. 878, and Patton v. Los Angeles, 169 Cal. 531, 147 Pac. 141. But it has been held that property held by a city or county in its proprietary capacity is subject to acquisition by adverse possession. Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005. Furthermore, it has been intimated that property held for a public use may be converted into proprietary property by an abandonment of the public use by the public authorities, and thereafter become the subject of acquisition by adverse possession. People v. Kerber, supra; Patton v. Los Angeles, supra.

We have been referred to no case where a street or highway, once dedicated by formal act or conveyance, has been held to have been abandoned by implication. We do not regard People v. Goodin, 136 Cal. 455, 69 Pac. 85, as so holding. The case of Myers v. Daubenbiss, 84 Cal. 1, 23 Pac. 1027, deals with Pol. Code, § 2620, before it was repealed in 1883. In McRose v. Bottyer, 81 Cal. 122, 22 Pac. 393, Pol. Code, § 2631, and Civ. Code, § 806, and section 811, subd. 4, were construed together, to the effect that a servitude acquired by user was extinguished by nonuser, but this, by express limitation of section 811, Civ. Code, has no application to a grant as in the case at bar.

On the contrary, many authorities hold that property, once dedicated, set apart, or held for a public use, cannot be acquired by a private owner by adverse possession, even while its public use may be discontinued. Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 51, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145; County of Yolo v. Barney, 79 Cal. 375, 21 Pac. 833, 12 Am. St. Rep. 152; San Francisco v. Sharp, 125 Cal. 534, 58 Pac. 173; People v. Myring, 144 Cal. 351, 77 Pac. 975; Wheeler v. City of Oakland, 35 Cal. App. 671, 170 Pac. 864; Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 435, 4 Pac. 433, 52 Am. Rep. 303; London, etc., Bank v. Oakland (C. C.) 86 Fed. 30; Id., 90 Fed. 701, 33 C. C. A. 237; San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 171, 13 Pac. 405.

[5] To effect an abandonment of an easement or public use of property acquired by grant to the public authorities, the intention to abandon must be clearly manifest. Mere nonuser of an easement acquired by grant does not amount to an abandonment. Hayford v. Spokesfield, 100 Mass. 491; Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 206, 28 Pac. 944; Gardner v. San Gabriel Valley Bank, 7 Cal. App. 106, 93 Pac. 900.

If mere nonuser shall be held to be an abandonment of a public highway or street, every encroachment or nuisance on the public highway would effect an abandonment to the extent of the encroachment. The negligence of the public authorities in not removing the encroachment or obstruction would then be a legal substitute for the formal action or proceeding of abandonment provided by law. In that case the possessor, by thus separating the public use from the fee, could, by a system of "divide and destroy," acquire title by adverse possession in face of the long line of well-established authority to the contrary. Some of these decisions involve facts showing a period of nonuser for as long a period as in the case at bar.

[6] In this case there was no formal abandonment, and no action of the public authorities clearly showing an intention to abandon the public highway. The action of the board of supervisors in releasing Singley from the obligation of operating a ferry at Singley's Ferry, and a year later granting a license to McDonald to operate a ferry at Singley's Ferry, was a change of ferrymen only. This action did not affect the highway. That McDonald operated the ferry in whole or in part between new lands, and used different approaches to the landings, and that other roads and approaches were used to ferry and ford across the river, does not affect the land in question, by showing any action on the part of the public authorities indicating an intention to abandon the road. These subsequent events are merely evidence of the subsequent nonuser of the land in question by the public as a highway.

In view of the foregoing considerations the findings of the trial court against abandonment of the public use of the land must be sustained. The findings are very full on this point, and from these it is further made to appear that the land in question may again be found necessary as an approach to the river crossing; that, although the river channel is at present far removed from its old channel, it has recently shown indications of returning to the old river channel, which would leave the present concrete bridge entirely on one side of the stream. This fact, of course, by itself does not indicate the intention of the public authorities 30 years ago, but it emphasizes the peculiar feature of this case, the changeableness of the river, and indicates that the nonuser, though long in point of time, was temporary in character. In such case abandonment is not inferred. Lake View v. Le Bahn, 120 Ill. 92, 9 N. E. 269; McAlpine v. Chicago, etc., Ry., 68 Kan. 207, 75 Pac. 73, 64 L. R. A. 85, 1 Ann. Cas. 452.

[7] Appellants finally claim that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting title by allowing them to clear and cultivate the land. But the trial court found against this contention, holding that the appellants had profited by the use of the land in excess of the expenditure made in clearing it. Likewise the proof did not show the payment of taxes on the land by appellants; the tax bill description excepting lands sold, which under the facts excluded the land in question. Moreover, these things do not raise an estoppel. San Leandro v. Le Breton, supra; Sacramento v. Clunie, 120 Cal. 29, 52 Pac. 44.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

SCHALK CHEMICAL CO. v. R. W. PRIDHAM CO. (Civ. 3455.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1920.)

1. Contracts ⊂=10(4) — Buyer's right to increase amount of order was a unilateral provision.

Where a certain number of cartons was ordered at prices quoted, with the statement that "we have the privilege of increasing the amount of the original order at any time during the period the original contract is in effect," the provision as to the privilege of increasing the amount of the original order was unilateral, and the purchaser could not recover damages by reason of the seller's refusal to deliver more than the original number ordered.

2. Sales ⊂=89—Agreement to extend contract without consideration.

A letter from a manufacturer of cartons, which had been selling the same to plaintiff, "We herewith agree to extend your contract for W. P. cartons to August 31, 1917, at the prices now in effect," was without consideration, and was unenforceable against the manufacturer after notice of withdrawal, although deliveries were made upon orders received after the expiration of the original contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the Schalk Chemical Company against the R. W. Pridham Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Thomas and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against it in an action for damages for failure to deliver to plaintiff a quantity of pasteboard cartons in accordance with an alleged contract between the parties. The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of a certain washing powder packed in pasteboard cartons of different sizes. The defendant is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling such cartons.

There is only one question presented by the appeal, and that is as to the existence of a binding contract between the parties for the delivery of the cartons ordered by plaintiff which the defendant refused to deliver. The alleged contract is evidenced by correspondence between the parties which it is necessary for us to consider in some detail. On December 3, 1914, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant requesting quotation of prices on cartons. The material part of the letter is as follows:

"We would be pleased to have you submit your bid on 2,010,000 Hydro Pura cartons, basing your estimates on the following specifications and requirements."

Then follow detailed specifications as to size, quality, quantity, etc., of three different types of cartons, and also dates of delivery of each different style. To this letter defendant replied on December 23, 1914, as follows:

"We herewith beg to quote you on the following cartons as per specifications attached. These cartons to conform with your request for bids under date of December 3d, and to be as per your samples in every respect.

10M Hydro-Pura display cartons.....	$37.50	per M.
900M large size Hydro-Pura cartons.....	3.70	" "
600M small size Hydro-Pura cartons....	1.85	" "
500M sample cartons.....	1.00	" "

"Delivery on above as per your letter of December 3d."

Plaintiff thereupon, on January 6, 1915, sent to defendant the following letter:

"We are in receipt of yours of December 23d, in which you quote us prices on Hydro Pura cartons according to number and specifications named in your letter of December 3d."

Then follow quotation of prices, amounts, etc., in accordance with letter of December 3d. The letter then continues:

"You can enter our order for the above amount of cartons at the prices stated, to be delivered according to our requirements between January 1, 1915, and July 1, 1916. These cartons must be satisfactory to us at all times in regard to printing, color, and quality, and we have the privilege of increasing the amount of the original order at any time during the period the original contract is in effect."

On January 12, 1915, defendant wrote to plaintiff, acknowledging its order, as follows:

"We are in receipt of your order of January 6th for:

10,000 Hydro-Pura display cartons at.....	$37.50 M
900,000 large Hydro-Pura cartons at.....	3.70 M
600,000 small Hydro-Pura cartons at.....	1.85 M
500,000 Hydro-Pura sample cartons at.....	1.00 M

"These cartons to be taken out between January 1, 1915, and July 1, 1916."

The quantity of cartons contracted to be furnished by the above correspondence was duly delivered, and no question arises over this portion of the transaction. However, on February 3, 1915, defendant wrote to plaintiff a letter which is one of the things upon which plaintiff relies to establish the contract under which recovery is sought here. This letter is as follows:

"We beg to advise that the prices quoted you on December 23, 1914, on Hydro-Pura cartons will apply upon any excess quantity, over the quantity specified, which you may take between January 1, 1915, and July 1, 1916."

[1] The position of the trial court with reference to this last letter was, apparently, that as the record contained no evidence of any agreement on the part of the plaintiff to take any quantity of cartons whatever in excess of the 2,010,000 ordered by its letter of January 6, 1915, this letter of February 3, 1915, was in effect nothing more than a quotation to plaintiff of the same prices at which deliveries were to be made under the contract contained in the letter of December 23, 1914; that this quotation of prices, being an offer without consideration, could be withdrawn at any time before acceptance. Plaintiff and appellant seeks to save this alleged contract from the objection that it is lacking in mutuality by arguing that the intent of the parties appears from the correspondence to be that the defendant was obliged to order all its requirements of cartons from the plaintiff during the period from January 1, 1915, to July 1, 1916. We think a mere reading of the foregoing correspondence demonstrates that the defendant could not have recovered damages from the plaintiff for its failure to order from defendant all of its requirements in cartons in excess of the 2,010,000 specifically ordered in the letter of January 6, 1915. Unless defendant had this right, the contract is a unilateral one, and plaintiff may not recover upon the same. Jenkins v. Anaheim Sugar Co., 247 Fed. 958, 960, 160 C. C. A. 658, L. R. A. 1918E, 293; Bartlett v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 671, 674, 117 Pac. 934.

There are numerous cases upon this question which are cited to us by the respondent, and there are many others to be found, but we consider it unnecessary to discuss the matter more fully. Since we are of the opinion that the plaintiff was not bound to purchase from the defendant all its requirements of cartons in excess of the specified quantity ordered during the period mentioned in the letters, it becomes immaterial whether or not the defendant knew, because of previous dealings with the plaintiff, approximately what plaintiff's requirements were each year. Plaintiff being required to purchase nothing under the letter of February 3, 1915, before quoted, the offer contained therein was without consideration. The plaintiff claims that this offer contained in said letter of February 3, 1915, was kept in force and effect until August 31, 1917, by reason of the following letter, written by defendant to plaintiff on April 5, 1916:

"We herewith agree to extend your contract for Washing Powder cartons to August 31, 1917, at the prices now in effect."

This letter in no way removes the objection to the enforcement of the alleged contract. It remained an offer, which, being without consideration, could be withdrawn at any time. The defendant did accept orders for cartons under the extension offer up until July 1, 1916. It is because of the refusal to fill orders after that time at the prices quoted in the letter of December 23, 1914, that this action is brought. The plaintiff continued to demand the filling of orders at the old prices during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1916, and on February 21, 1917, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff in response to a letter from said plaintiff:

"We have heretofore notified you, orally and otherwise, and we now again notify you, that these prices are withdrawn, particularly because of the disturbed market conditions, and the price hereafter must be fixed as each order is given and accepted."

Thereafter the plaintiff was compelled to order its cartons in the open market at a higher price than it had previously paid for the same, and it is for this excess in price that recovery is sought in the present action.

[2] In our opinion the trial court did not err in its holding that this offer to furnish cartons up until August 31, 1917, at the same prices at which they had been furnished under the contract of December 23, 1914, was without consideration. For this reason it was unenforceable against the defendants after notice of withdrawal.

There are numerous matters urged by appellant in its brief which we consider immaterial. The fact that some deliveries were made upon orders received by the defendant after July 1, 1916, cannot operate to give binding force to this unilateral contract. This proposition scarcely needs the citation of authority, but the case of Cold Blast Trans. Co. v. Kans. City Bolt & Nut Co., 114 Fed. 77, 80, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696, seems to be precisely in point. The further fact that the plaintiff company did order from the defendant all the cartons required by it during the time specified in the letters, and up until the time of the refusal of the defendant to furnish the cartons at the old prices, is also immaterial, in view of our conclusion that plaintiff was not obligated to do this.

SILVIUS v. MORDOFF et al. (L. A. 6077.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⟸559(3)—Deficiency judgment for less than mortgage from defaulting defendants held error.

Where the mortgagors defaulted in an action to foreclose a mortgage, and the court decreed foreclosure as against a junior lienholder for a part only of the face of the note secured by the mortgage, it was error to render judgment against the mortgagors for the deficiency after the foreclosure sale, for only the amount found due as against a subsequent lien.

2. Mortgages ⟸183—Payment by mortgagee, in violation of promise to pay for building, imposes liability without negligence.

Where a mortgagee promised one who took a trust deed on property subject to the mortgage that he would pay the amount of the mortgage only for labor and materials used in a dwelling which was being erected on the premises, he is liable to the subsequent incumbrancer for breach of that promise, without proof of negligence on his part.

3. Appeal and error ⟸837(11)—Incompetent evidence disregarded in determining sufficiency to support findings.

In determining the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, incompetent evidence admitted over proper objection thereto cannot be considered.

4. Mortgages ⟸183—Agreement between parties as to application of money does not benefit junior lienholder.

A promise by the mortgagor to the mortgagee that he would apply the proceeds of the mortgage to payment for labor and material used for the erection of a house on the mortgaged premises does not inure to the benefit of the holder of a trust deed subject to the mortgage who was not in privity to the promise.

5. Mortgages ⟸183—Agreement to pay money to contractor for building does not require mortgagee to see to application.

A promise by the mortgagor to the mortgagee that he would pay the money loaned to a contractor for material and labor for the construction of a building on the mortgaged lot is performed by payment of the money to the contractor for that purpose, though the contractor thereafter diverted it to other property, so that the mortgaged property did not receive the benefit.

6. Trial ⟸25(4)—Junior mortgagee, defending for breach of senior's promise to apply funds, has right to open.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, where the holder of a trust deed subject to the mortgage defended on the ground of the mortgagee's breach of agreement to apply the money borrowed to the construction of a house on the premises, the burden of proof is on the holder of the trust deed, in the absence of any showing of confidential relations between her and the mortgagee, and she has the right to open and close.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by F. D. Silvius against J. M. Mordoff and others. From a judgment decreeing foreclosure for only a part of the face of the mortgage, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. T. Sprowls, of Phoenix, Ariz., for appellant.

H. S. McCallum, of Los Angeles, and Wm. J. Variel, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment in his favor in an action by him to foreclose a mortgage. His objection to the judgment is that it does not cover the amount secured by the mortgage. The mortgage was executed by J. M. Mordoff and Olive Mordoff, husband and wife, on a lot in Hollywood, to secure the payment of their note to Silvius for $3,000. The defendant Elizabeth Snow was made a party to the suit, under the allegation that she had or claimed an interest in the premises which was subject to the lien of the mortgage.

The defendants J. M. Mordoff and Olive J. Mordoff suffered default. Elizabeth Snow appeared and answered. Upon the issues raised by her answer the court made findings, and thereupon gave judgment against all of the defendants, foreclosing the mortgage for the sum of $1,400, with interest and attorney's fees, amounting to $1,664.98, together with costs. The judgment directed that, if the foreclosure sale did not produce enough to pay said sums, a deficiency judgment should be entered against Mordoff and wife for the balance. The judgment was apparently given upon the theory that the Mordoffs were not indebted to Silvius for the full amount of the note.

[1] The failure to direct a deficiency judgment against Mordoff and wife for the full amount of the note, interest, attorney's fees and costs was plainly an error and probably an inadvertence. They made no defense, the complaint states a good cause of action against them for the recovery of the full amount of the note, and a deficiency judgment should have been directed accordingly. The plaintiff is entitled to a reversal of the judgment with respect to them with directions to the lower court to enter a judgment correcting this error.

The court found, in effect, that prior to the execution of the mortgage Elizabeth Snow was the owner of the lot mortgaged; that it was agreed by and between Mordoff and Elizabeth Snow that she should convey the lot to him in consideration of $300 in cash and his note for $1,700, secured by a trust deed of the lot, and that Mordoff should then borrow $3,000 by means of a first mortgage on the lot, the same to be paramount to such trust deed, of which sum $2,500 was to be used by him in erecting on said lot a dwelling house to cost at least $3,000. It further found that thereupon she executed the deed to Mordoff, and that Mordoff and wife executed to Silvius the note and mortgage sued on, and also the trust deed to Snow; that all these instruments were placed in escrow with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, to be delivered by it in proper order to the respective parties entitled thereto, together with $500 of the mortgage money to be paid to Mordoff; that the plaintiff was a party to the said escrow agreement; that the escrow agreement was that the balance of $2,500 called for by the mortgage was to be paid outside of the escrow by Silvius "in the construction of said proposed dwelling house as the construction work progressed; that the construction of a dwelling house on said premises was commenced and partially constructed by a contractor for said Mordoff, but no building was ever completed thereon, and the construction thereof was abandoned in the fall of 1917; that of the $2,500 left in the hands of said F. D. Silvius, to be used in the construction of said proposed dwelling," he paid out in the matter of the construction of the building the sum of $900, and no more. It also found that no money had been paid to Elizabeth Snow on the balance of her purchase price for the lot secured by the deed of trust, and that the mortgage note was wholly unpaid; that Silvius had notice of the agreement between Snow and Mordoff above described, and of the escrow instructions, and knew that the mortgage was given for a building loan, to be used in paying for labor and material in the construction of the building on said mortgaged premises; "that the said F. D. Silvius was negligent in the disbursement of said money intrusted to him, in paying out of the said sum of $2,500 only the sum of $900, that went into or that was used in the construction of said building."

[2] The answer of Elizabeth Snow did not purport to state the defense to which these findings relate. It charges fraud by Mordoff and Silvius toward Elizabeth Snow, setting up, with much detail, a scheme by them to induce her to sell the lot to Mordoff upon the faith of his promise to borrow $3,000 on a first mortgage on the lot, give her a subordinate lien for the price of the lot by a trust deed thereon, use the borrowed money to build a house thereon for the better security of both liens, and, having thus obtained title from her, to defraud her by converting the borrowed money to their own use and leave the lot unimproved. With respect to this defense the court found that Silvius was not guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation. In narrating the facts concerning the alleged fraud, the answer sets forth the facts stated in the findings as above summarized, except on the point of negligence of Silvius in paying out the borrowed money. Negligence is not alleged. Construing these findings in the sense most favorable to the judgment (Paine v. San Bernardino Co., 143 Cal. 656, 77 Pac. 659; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257), they appear to show that Silvius made a promise running to Elizabeth Snow that he would pay $2,500 of the borrowed money for labor and material actually used in the construction of the proposed house on the lot, and that he failed to do so, except as to $900. If this be so, he would be responsible for the failure to perform his agreement, even if such failure was not the result of his negligence. Roussinet v. Rebout, 76 Cal. 456, 18 Pac. 423.

It thus appears that the findings and judgment proceed upon a theory not pleaded in the answer. It is very doubtful if the record can be said to show that the parties proceeded, without objection, to try the case upon the theory that the defense shown by the findings and judgment was in issue, so that plaintiff is now precluded from raising the objection, as held in Illinois, etc., Co. v. Pacific Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 297, 47 Pac. 60, and Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 112, 103 Pac. 332. But, as we think the evidence does not support the findings and judgment, even upon the theory upon which they are apparently founded, and as the appellant bases his appeal upon this claim, it is unnecessary to consider any other question, except the sufficiency of the evidence, to which we now proceed.

The deal was accomplished by the deposit of the instruments in escrow with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company and the subsequent complete delivery thereof by said escrow holder. There were four separate deposits with the trust company, each accompanied with separate written instructions, signed by the depositor alone—one by Silvius, under date of April 4, 1917, of a check for $500, to be used when Mordoff's first mortgage was filed for record; one by Elizabeth Snow, under date of April 4, 1917, embracing her deed of the lot to Mordoff, to be delivered on payment by Mordoff for her of $300, and execution by him and his wife to her of the trust deed of the lot, subject to a $3,000 mortgage; and two by Mordoff, both under date of April 6, 1917, the first being a check of $300, for Elizabeth Snow, and the trust deed of the lot to her, subject to the $3,000 mortgage, and the second being the mortgage on the lot by Mordoff and wife to Silvius, to be delivered on payment of $500, and stating that the balance of the money borrowed thereon was to be paid "outside of escrow." The instructions of Silvius also stated that "balance of funds are to be paid outside of escrow."

None of these instruments contained anything indicating or implying that Silvius was to pay out the $2,500 balance only upon bills for material and labor used in constructing the proposed house, or anything at all with respect to the manner in which he was to make such payment, or the purpose for which the balance of $2,500 of the borrowed money was to be used.

[3] The only evidence produced by Elizabeth Snow tending to prove any agreement as to the application of the money to be borrowed by Mordoff from Silvius was her own testimony to the effect that she was the owner of the lot prior to the deal; that she never knew Mordoff in the transaction, but dealt through her own agent, J. J. Mann; that Mann represented to her that Mordoff was a prosperous builder who had a large amount of lumber and material on hand, and that after obtaining title to the lot Mordoff would borrow $3,000 on the property and build a house on it to cost not less than $4,000; that she relied on Mann's representations in selling the lot, and that she never saw Silvius, nor had any communications with him, until after Walters, the contractor, had abandoned work on the house. This evidence was objected to by the plaintiff on the ground that the representations made by Mann to her were not made in the presence or hearing of Silvius, but the court overruled the objection. It does not appear that Silvius had any knowledge of them, nor that Mordoff ever made any agreement with her to build a house on the lot with the money he borrowed, except from the evidence contained in a document signed by Mordoff and wife and Elizabeth Snow and delivered to Silvius on May 21, 1917, more than six weeks after the transaction was closed which was given in evidence by Silvius. This writing stated that "Mordoff has agreed to construct one certain eight-room house on the lot." The representations of Mann were incompetent against Silvius, and, having been objected to by him, that evidence must be disregarded. The information contained in the aforesaid document came to Silvius long after the deal was closed, and it did not inform him that Elizabeth Snow was relying on him, or even on Mordoff, to do anything with respect to the borrowed money then remaining in his hands, if any there was, which does not appear, although it did inform him that the plans of the house had been changed. It does not even state that the house was to be built with the money borrowed on the mortgage.

The only evidence of any agreement by Silvius respecting the money borrowed was produced by him. He testified that Mordoff made a written application to him for a loan on the lot and that he agreed to make the loan. The application was then introduced in evidence. It directed Silvius to pay $500 of the money to be borrowed to the trust company and to "pay unto J. M. Walters such and sundry sums for material and labor for the construction of one certain eight-room double residence according to the plans herewith. When you can certify that you have paid the above amounts above enumerated, the accounting for the amounts due on the face value of the said mortgage will have been complete." This application was dated April 6, 1917.

[4] The application of Mordoff, accepted by Silvius, was an agreement between himself and Silvius, to which Elizabeth Snow was not a party. There is no evidence that Silvius was informed that Elizabeth Snow was relying on him to protect her trust deed by seeing to it that the money which he loaned to Mordoff, and paid out on Mordoff's order to Walters for "material and labor for the construction of" the house on the lot, was actually paid out for labor and material which was actually used in the construction of the building. Under the evidence, he was responsible to Mordoff alone for the proper payment of the money. There does not appear to be any privity of contract between Silvius and Elizabeth Snow, whereby he was put under obligation to her for the proper application of this fund, or became her trustee for that purpose. Holder Lumber Co. v. Scarborough, 28 Cal. App. 154, 151 Pac. 674.

[5] Moreover, the application of Mordoff does not by its terms bind Silvius to see that the material and labor for which the money was to be paid out was actually used in a building on the lot. It states that he should pay the same to Walters "for material and labor for the construction of such building." There is no evidence to show that the materials and labor for which bills were rendered to him by Walters, and which he paid to the amount of $2,500, were not bills for material purchased for the construction of the building on that lot, or that the labor which the money paid for was not labor upon the house. In a technical aspect of the case, therefore, there is no evidence of any actual breach of the obligation to Mordoff. It does not appear but that Mordoff sanctioned the payments that were made to Walters. It is entirely consistent with the evidence that Walters may have purchased the material for the construction of this building and thereafter diverted it to one or more other buildings which he was erecting at the same time. The evidence shows that he was then erecting other buildings under similar conditions and indicates that he may have done this very thing. It also tends to show that Walters was the real defaulter, and that all the other parties concerned suffered injury therefrom.

[6] It must be remembered that the burden of proof was on defendant Snow to establish the facts of her defense. The execution of the note and mortgage was not denied. In the absence of any evidence, Silvius was entitled to judgment of foreclosure against her for the full amount of the note. Consequently, she should have opened the case at the trial. Silvius opened the case, apparently on the theory that she should first exculpate him from the charge of fraud. He had no such burden. There was nothing to show any confidential relation between the two, or to put him in the position of a trustee for her as to the expenditure of the money he loaned.

We are therefore of the opinion that the evidence does not support the findings, so far as they may be construed to declare that Silvius was responsible to Elizabeth Snow for the application of the $2,500 solely to the payment for materials and labor actually used in erecting the building on the lot. Without this construction, the findings do not support the judgment. A reversal is therefore necessary as to all the defendants.

The judgment is reversed.

BEESON v. SCHLOSS et al. (L. A. 6038.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 7, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸694(1)—Specifications necessary to review sufficiency of evidence to sustain findings.

The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings cannot be reviewed, where the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify any of the findings.

2. Appeal and error ⟸694(2)—Denial of nonsuit presents sufficiency of evidence, without specifications.

The denial of a motion for nonsuit presents a question of law whether or not there is any evidence which may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, where the evidence is brought up by bill of exceptions, though it contains no specifications as to the sufficiency of the evidence, or as to errors of law, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 647, the decision denying such motion is deemed to be excepted to.

3. Appeal and error ⟸871—Denying nonsuit on preliminary hearing as to limitations presents question for review.

Where the court, in advance of the trial on the merits, heard the question of the bar of plaintiff's action by a contractual limitation, and at the close of such hearing denied defendant's motion for nonsuit, because the evidence showed the action was barred, the question whether there was any substantial evidence to support the conclusion of the trial court that the limitation was unreasonable and void is presented.

4. Limitation of actions ⟸14 — Parties may contract for shorter period, not unreasonable.

Parties to a contract may stipulate therein for a period of limitation shorter than that fixed by statute, which is not contrary to public policy, provided the period fixed is not so unreasonable as to show undue advantage.

5. Limitation of actions ⟸14 — Contractual limitation of 6 months held not unreasonable, because service cannot be made within state.

A stipulation in a contract for employment of plaintiff by defendants, who were nonresidents of the state at all times, that an action for commissions must be brought within 6 months after the statement was rendered, is not made unreasonable by the fact that defendants could not be personally served within the state, and might not have, during the period limited, property therein subject to attachment.

6. Limitation of actions ⟸14 — Contractual limitation of 6 months held not unreasonable as matter of law.

A stipulation in a contract for personal services limiting the commencement of an action for commissions earned thereunder to 6 months after statements were rendered is not unreasonable as matter of law.

7. Limitation of actions ⟸14—Evidence held not to show contractual limitation of 6 months to be unreasonable.

Evidence showing that plaintiff delayed bringing his action for commissions after the 6-months period limited in his contract, waiting until defendants' accounts within the state were sufficient to justify proceeding by attachment, and until he could determine the amount of the commission more accurately, held not to show that the 6-months limitation was unreasonable, since he would have had 3 years to wait the accrual of sufficient funds to attach after action was begun, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 581a, 583, and he could have taken defendants' deposition to ascertain the amount due, and then amended his complaint accordingly.

8. Attachment ⟸12 — Agent, suing for accounting, held entitled to attach principal's property.

An agent, claiming commissions from his principal and not knowing the exact amount thereof, may sue the principal for the amount he believes to be due, and the fact that he asks for an accounting does not prevent attachment of defendant's property, who was a nonresident.

9. Limitation of actions ⟸14 — Falsity of statement does not prevent running of contractual limitation.

Where a contract provided that statements rendered by employers to their salesmen should be deemed correct, unless objected to within 10 days, and required suits therefor to be brought within 6 months after the accounts were rendered, the fact that the account as rendered was not correct does not, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, prevent the operation of the contractual limitation.

10. Appeal and error ⊂=846(5) — Estoppel against defense not raised, where court made no findings thereon.

Though estoppel against a claim in the answer is deemed to be controverted and need not be pleaded, as is ordinarily necessary, plaintiff cannot avail himself thereof to sustain a judgment on appeal, where the findings of the trial court contain nothing on that issue.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Joe Beeson against Nathan Schloss and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wm. L. Jarrott and Crail & Crail, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The complaint sets forth a cause of action for the recovery of commissions alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff for services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendants as traveling salesman, under a written contract between the parties. The defendants are partners doing business under the name of Schloss Bros. & Co. By the terms of the contract the plaintiff was employed to solicit orders for the defendants at prices and terms to be stated by them and in so doing to travel for such time and cover such territory as defendants should direct. Plaintiff was to receive 7 per cent. on the net amount of the sales, being the difference between the gross amount of the accepted sales and certain deductions which the contract provided should be made therefrom. The contract was originally made on September 18, 1913, and covered the period from May 1, 1913, to April 30, 1914. It provided that it was renewable on like terms and conditions for periods of one year, provided both parties so desired and gave notice 30 days before the expiration of such year. It was so renewed for the years including 1914 and 1915, and ending April 30, 1916. The original complaint, filed June 2, 1917, alleged that $10,903.51 was due to the plaintiff from the defendants on account of commissions earned under said contract. The first amended complaint filed February 21, 1918, alleged the balance due plaintiff to be $14,510.16.

In addition to denials of the allegations as to the money due and services performed, the defendants pleaded that the action was barred by a contractual limitation contained in the contract of employment. This clause of the contract was as follows:

"The place of this contract is expressly agreed to be the executive offices of said Schloss Bros. & Co., at Baltimore, Md., and whenever said Schloss Bros. & Co. shall render the said salesman a statement of his account, the said statement shall be deemed to have been correct in all particulars, and so accepted as final and binding on said salesman, his heirs and assigns, unless written objections thereto be filed within 10 days after the rendering of said statement, and the said Schloss Bros. & Co. shall not be liable, nor shall any suit or proceedings of any kind be brought against Schloss Bros. & Co. after the lapse of 6 months from the rendering of any of said statements."

The answer alleged that on May 25, 1916, defendants delivered to plaintiff a full, true, and complete statement of all sales, commissions, drawings and charges, and the amount owing to or payable by said plaintiff prior to said date and for the spring season of 1916, that said statement covered all credits and commissions to plaintiff and all charges against plaintiff under the contract prior thereto, and that no suit or proceedings of any kind was brought against the defendants on any claim of the plaintiff for commissions earned during the time covered by said statements within the period of 6 months from receipt thereof by the plaintiff.

The court made findings to the effect that the defendants on May 25, 1916, delivered to plaintiff a statement of his account as alleged in the answer and that no suit or proceeding of any kind was brought against the defendants for his said claim within the period of 6 months from the receipt by him of said statement. The conclusion of law was that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the full amount of his claim and judgment was entered accordingly. This conclusion and judgment were evidently based on finding V, to the effect that the 6-months limitation fixed by the contract was unreasonable. The defendants contend that the conclusion or finding that 6 months is an unreasonable time within which to begin the action is without support in the evidence.

[1] The bill of exceptions contains no specifications of particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify any of the findings. "The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings cannot be considered on appeal from the judgment where the bill of exceptions relied on contains no specification of insufficiency of evidence." Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 799, 167 Pac. 394, 395 (L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184); Carter v. Canty, 186 Pac. 348. Consequently, we are unable to consider the point that the evidence in the case does not sustain the finding.

[2] The rule is equally well settled, however, that a decision denying a motion for nonsuit presents the question whether or not there is any evidence to support it and that this is a question of law which may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, where the evidence is brought up by a bill of exceptions, although it contains no specifications either as to the sufficiency of the evidence or as to errors of law. Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 18 Pac. 403; Barfield v. South Side Irr. Co., 111 Cal. 119, 43 Pac. 406, disapproving the remark to the contrary in Miller v. Wade, 87 Cal. 411, 25 Pac. 487, and approving Shadburne v. Daly, supra; Martin v. S. P. Co., 150 Cal. 124, 131, 88 Pac. 701; Carter v. Canty, supra. Some of the decisions say that the bill must show an exception to the decision in order to authorize a review thereof, but the Code now provides that a decision denying a motion for nonsuit is deemed to be excepted to. Code Civ. Proc. § 647. Hence, a formal exception is now unnecessary.

[3] At the opening of the trial the attention of the court was called to the contractual limitation set up in defense and at the request of the parties the court proceeded to try, in advance of the trial on the merits, the question of the bar of plaintiff's action by reason of said limitation. Upon this issue evidence was introduced by the parties, and thereupon the defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground that it appeared from the evidence introduced that the contract contained the clause above noted, that more than 6 months before the suit was begun the defendants had delivered to plaintiff a statement of his account for commissions under said contract, and that consequently the plaintiff's action was barred. This motion was denied and the court thereupon proceeded to a trial of the case on the merits. This presents the question whether or not there is any substantial evidence to support the conclusion that the limitation was unreasonable. We are satisfied that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

[4] It is a well-settled proposition of law that the parties to a contract may stipulate therein for a period of limitation, shorter than that fixed by the statute of limitations, and that such stipulation violates no principle of public policy, provided the period fixed be not so unreasonable as to show imposition or undue advantage in some way. Tebbetts v. Fidelity etc. Co., 155 Cal. 137, 99 Pac. 501; Case v. Sun Ins. Co. 83 Cal. 473, 23 Pac. 534, 8 L. R. A. 48; Fitzpatrick v. North American, etc., Co., 18 Cal. App. 266, 123 Pac. 209; Garido v. Am., etc., Co., 8 Pac. 512;[1] 1 Wood on Lim. (4th Ed.) 145; 25 Cyc. 1017.

[5] In making its ruling denying the nonsuit the court below put it on the ground that the limitation was unreasonable because of the fact that the plaintiff could not get jurisdiction of defendants by personal service of process in California. This was not a sufficient reason. The contract shows that the defendants were residents of Maryland when it was made. There was no agreement that they should ever become residents of California. It must therefore be assumed that the plaintiff understood that if he desired to recover a personal judgment against the defendants it would be necessary for him to bring his action in the state of Maryland, unless he was fortunate enough to find some one of the defendants in some other state within the period of limitation fixed. It cannot be supposed that the parties contemplated or intended that the 6 months should not begin to run with respect to an action in any other state than Maryland until some one of the defendants should enter the other state so that summons could be there served upon him. To give the contract such effect would be to practically destroy the limitation entirely. The facts that the services of plaintiff were chiefly performed in California; that plaintiff never resided in Maryland; that he resided in California when the cause of action accrued and has resided in Illinois ever since June 1, 1916, do not appear to us sufficient to show that the 6-months limitation was unreasonable. The courts of Maryland were open to plaintiff and he could have sued there at any time, as the contract implies that he should if he desired a personal judgment; and the courts of California were available at all times for an attachment suit to reach property of defendants here, in case any could be found. Neither the law nor the contract required the defendants to hold property in this state or elsewhere to afford plaintiff a remedy by attachment. We are aware of no decision declaring that such a limitation does not begin to run in any state until the plaintiff can attach property in such state and thereupon obtain constructive service on the defendants by publication of summons. The ground upon which the court below ruled is, in our opinion, wholly untenable.

[6] The limitation of 6 months was not unreasonable as a matter of law. In Tebbetts v. Fidelity, etc., Co., supra, it was held that a period of 3 months was not in itself unreasonable. Numerous cases to the same effect may be found in note 18 on the subject in 10 Corpus Juris at page 344. See, also, 1 Cyc. 281; 19 Cyc. 906; 25 Cyc. 910.

[7] It is claimed that the circumstances shown by the evidence render the time unreasonable. We will state them as briefly as possible: The defendants notified plaintiff in January, 1916, that the contract would be terminated on March 14, 1916. On January 12, 1916, they rendered him a statement of his account up to that date, which he immediately challenged as incorrect. On May 25, 1916, they rendered another statement, also showing nothing due to him. This he also objected to. It was admitted that the only difference between them related to commissions due on large sales of clothing made by the defendants to Foreman & Clark, a firm of clothiers doing a large business with stores in Los Angeles, Chicago, and several other cities, whose trade had been secured to them by the plaintiff. Some of these sales were negotiated by the plaintiff at their respective stores and others at Baltimore, Md., by some representative of Foreman & Clark. The contract provided that, unless it was specially so agreed in writing, the plaintiff should not be entitled to commissions on sales known as "jobs," or on goods sold at less than "regular selling prices." The defendants claimed that almost all the goods sold to that firm came within one or the other of these classes, and made out their statements accordingly. The plaintiff was employed by that firm as manager of its Chicago house from and after April 1, 1916, and at that date he left his former residence in Los Angeles and thereafter resided in Chicago. On March 1, 1916, he made out a statement of his account, which he left with his attorney there during that month, directing him to bring suit on it against defendants and attach the account of Foreman & Clark with defendants, when advised that their account with defendants was large enough to satisfy his claim. This did not occur until some time in May, 1917, and this action was not begun till June 2, 1917.

Said statement of March 1, 1916, was for a balance due him of $10,903.51, and was the one set forth in the first complaint herein. The account sued on contained as credits to defendants a note of $3,495, which he owed them, and $18 for an overcoat, both of which were in some manner satisfied before the first amended complaint was filed, and they were not mentioned therein. Without these credits the balance due plaintiff by the original complaint would have been $14,416.51, only $93.65 less than shown in the first amended complaint. The second amended complaint, filed on June 4, 1918, the day before the trial began, showed a balance of only $12,894.82, which was $1,485.69 less than in the original complaint. The charge on account of sales of the spring and summer season of 1916 was $2,273.46 more, and for the fall and winter of 1915 $3,866.25 less, in the original complaint than in the last one. Plaintiff testified that it took him "several months" to get the data to show how much had been sold by defendants to Foreman & Clark through his instrumentality. He began this work in Chicago "immediately" upon arriving there. During April and May, 1916, the parties were endeavoring to settle the differences by arbitration. This plan was abandoned some time in June or July of 1916. During all the period from April 1, 1916, to May, 1917, he was also trying to ascertain whether or not Foreman & Clark owed enough to defendants to justify an attachment. In March, 1916, he advised with his attorney about bringing suit in Maryland. About June 1, 1918, he obtained the further information on which his last amended complaint was made. These are the facts as shown by the entire record.

These conditions did not prevent the bringing of a suit within the 6 months beginning May 25, 1916, nor make it at all difficult to do so. The cause of action had accrued at least as early as May 1, 1916, and the plaintiff had concluded in March, 1916, that an action was necessary. As we have said, the courts of Maryland were open to him at all times thereafter, and the courts of California were also available. He could await the accrual of a sufficient debt from Foreman & Clark to defendants after the action was begun, as well as before. He would have three years for that purpose, unless the defendant appeared without having been served with summons. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 581a, 583. It was not necessary for him to delay his action for the purpose of ascertaining the exact state of the account. The relation between the parties was that of principal and agent.

[8] Under the decisions in this state, when an agent claims commissions from his principal, and he does not know the exact amount thereof, but the principal knows and refuses to inform him, he may sue the principal, alleging the amount he believes to be due him, and asking for an accounting between them, and for judgment for the amount alleged to be due, and in such action he may attach the property of the principal for such amount. De Leonis v. Etchepare, 120 Cal. 409, 52 Pac. 718; Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 16, 33 Pac. 741; Halldie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 509, 166 Pac. 1. It might have been necessary, of course, for him to have taken the depositions of the defendants in Maryland, as the record shows he did. It further shows that it was by this means that he discovered the data on which he stated the account in the last amended complaint. But if further time would have been necessary to do so, in case he had begun the action within the 6 months, it would have been good cause for a continuance, and it must be presumed that it would have been granted on application. And if such depositions had shown the advisability of amending his complaint, as it appears they did, that fact would have required the court to allow the appropriate amendment if the suit had been commenced earlier, just as it did in the present action, begun a year after the 6 months began to run. It is certain, therefore, that the plaintiff, if he had begun his action in time, would have had the same facilities for pleading and proving his case as he had in the action begun some 5 months too late.

[9] The plaintiff further claims that the defendants' statements of account were false, and that they concealed from the plaintiff the facts constituting his claim against them, which were known to them, but unknown to him. They contend, first, that the contract by its terms requires that statements furnished by defendants as therein specified shall be correct in fact in order to set the limitation in motion; second, that by the rendition of a false statement they are estopped from setting up the claim that the 6-months period began to run at that time. We cannot agree to the proposition that under the terms of the contract the 6-months period does not begin to run at all, unless the statement of account is absolutely correct. It implies the contrary, for it provides that it shall be deemed to be correct, unless written objections thereto be filed within 10 days after the rendition thereof. It is evident that it contemplated differences between the parties with respect to the amount due thereon, and this implies that it was not intended that a correct statement should be absolutely necessary in order to make the limitation of any effect. It may be conceded that the rendition of a willfully false statement for the purpose of hindering the plaintiff in the bringing of his action might create an estoppel against the defendants, preventing them from availing themselves of the contractual bar. It is not necessary to decide this question. There is no evidence that the statements were willfully false or were rendered in bad faith. They showed no balance in favor of the plaintiff.

[10] But the defendants still earnestly contend that they owe him nothing. The principal part of the trial was consumed in an effort by them to establish this claim and by the plaintiff to controvert it. Upon this appeal the larger part of their argument is devoted to the proposition that the plaintiff is not entitled to anything on account of the sales to Foreman & Clark, except that which the defendants' statements allowed him. Moreover, this presents a question of estoppel. In order that the party may avail himself of an estoppel, it is ordinarily necessary to plead it. In this case the estoppel arises against a claim made by the defendant in his answer, which is deemed to be controverted, and in such a case it is not necessary to plead the estoppel. But in order that the plaintiff may avail himself thereof, and obtain a judgment based thereon, it is necessary that the court should make a finding thereof. Blood v. La Serena, etc., Co., 113 Cal. 229, 230, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252; Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 484, 95 Pac. 888. The findings contain nothing on that subject, and it is obvious that the court below did not attempt to decide the question. For these reasons we think there is no merit in this argument for the plaintiff.

The conclusion that the action was barred by the contractual limitation renders it unnecessary to consider other errors assigned by appellants.

The judgment is reversed.

POPST et ux. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 3380.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 21, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⊂⊃386(1)—Compensation to dependents receiving fluctuating amounts for support held discretionary.

Since Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 prescribes no rule for determining the "annual amount" devoted by a deceased employé to the support of dependents, where his contributions for support during the year preceding death have not been constant, either in amounts or times of payment, the determination of what is such amount rests in the sound discretion of the commission, based on the evidence.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃417(7)—Compensation award to dependents held a finding of fact, not reviewable; "determination of question of fact."

In a proceeding by parents, claiming benefits under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 9, par. 3, subd. 2, as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 4, for death of a son, who had contributed to their support irregularly and in differing amounts, so that the "annual amount" was not capable of any mathematically exact measurements, a conclusion of the Industrial Accident Commission as to what is the "annual amount" within the statute is the determination of a question of fact, within section 67, subd. (c), and not subject to review if there is any evidence to support it.

Proceeding by Hermon D. Popst and Mary M. Popst under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for the death of a son, Lynn Popst, opposed by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation, the employer. There was an award of less compensation than was claimed, and the applicants bring certiorari. Petition denied.

Benj. M. Stansbury, of Riverside, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in certiorari, having for its purpose the modification of an order of the Industrial Accident Commission whereby these petitioners, the parents of Lynn Popst, who died as the result of injuries sustained in the course of his employment, were awarded a certain amount as a death benefit under subdivision 2 of paragraph 3 of section 9 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Law (Stats. 1919, p. 917). The commission found that petitioners were partially dependent upon their son for their support at the time of his death, and that the "annual amount" that he so devoted to their support was $400.

[1] Nowhere in the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Law is any rule or basis prescribed for the determination of what shall be deemed to be the "annual amount" devoted by a deceased employé to the support of his dependents, where, as here, the sums contributed to such support during the year preceding the demise of the injured employé have not been constant, either in amounts or times of payment. In the very nature of the case, the determination of what is such "annual amount," when, as here, the support contributed by the injured employé has fluctuated considerably during the year preceding his demise, must largely rest in the sound discretion of the commission, based upon the evidence before it.

[2] The deceased employé, Lynn Popst, was injured while in the employ of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. During the greater portion of the year immediately preceding the accident he had been in the service of the United States navy. After his discharge from the navy he was unemployed for a considerable period. While in the navy he had contributed a much smaller sum to the support of his parents than during the comparatively short period that he was in the employ of the gas and electric corporation. Petitioners, who are dissatisfied with the amount allowed them by the commission in its award for partial dependency, say that the commission's method of computing the "annual amount" contributed by their son to their support was incorrect. But the commission did take evidence upon the subject, and it made its finding upon such evidence. Under the circumstances, the "annual amount" was not capable of any mathematically exact measurement. The conclusion of the commission that, at the date of their son's death, $400 was the annual amount contributed by him to his parents' support, was the determination of a question of fact, based upon evidence adduced before and considered by the commission.

Without intimating that the method of computation adopted by the commission was erroneous or unreasonable, our conclusion is that this court has no power to set aside the award or to remand the case for further proceedings.

"The findings and conclusions of the commission on questions of fact shall be conclusive and final and shall not be subject to review." Subdivision (c), § 67, of the Act; Stats. 1917, p. 876.

"Our authority, with respect to the commission's conclusions on questions of fact, goes no further than to permit the annulment of an award where the commission's finding of a fact is without any evidence whatever to support it. Where there is a conflict in the testimony, or where opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn, the commission is the final arbiter." Walker v. Industrial Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 738, 171 Pac. 954, L. R. A. 1918F, 212.

See, also, Williams v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Sup.) 177 Pac. 989; San Francisco-Oakland, etc., Rys. v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Sup.) 179 Pac. 386; Frankfort Gen. Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150; Crosaro v. Industrial Acc. Co., 38 Cal. App. 758, 177 Pac. 489.

What was said by the New York Supreme Court in Rhyner v. Hueber Bldg. Co., 171 App. Div. 58, 156 N. Y. Supp. 904, is worth quoting here:

"The appellant contends that the method of computing the deceased's wages was incorrect. We think the conclusion reached by the commission was correctly worked out. Of course, we are unable to say what mental processes the commission employed in arriving at the figures given in their decision; but it seems to us that, under the evidence, the figures given might, very properly, have been the result of the method of computation pointed out in subdivision 3 of section 14. But here again a finding of fact, based upon evidence, is presented to us, and we are powerless to criticize, modify, or revoke. It is not well for this court to fall into the habit of discussing the facts, even for the purpose of showing that the findings of fact are reasonable and meet with our approbation. We cannot, except by usurpation, invade the realm of facts; for it was the clear intent of the Legislature that 'the decision of the commission shall be final as to all questions of fact.' Of course, if there are no facts, and the decision is arbitrary, unfair, and unreasonable, a question of law arises, and we may right the wrong. Matter of Lizzie Gardener v. Horseheads Construction Co., 156 N. Y. Supp. 899, handed down herewith. But it is wholly improbable that the commission will make any such decision. The commission is the sole judge and the 'final' judge of the facts, and this court is not only forbidden to trespass upon the jurisdiction of the commission in this field, but, by section 20 of the act, it is circumscribed, even, in its review of questions of law. It was the purpose of the Legislature to create a tribunal to do rough justice—speedy, summary, informal, untechnical. With this scheme of the Legislature we must not interfere; for, if we trench in the slightest degree upon the prerogatives of the commission, one encroachment will breed another, until finally simplicity will give way to complexity, and informality to technicality."

The petition for the writ is denied.

OHIO ELECTRIC CAR CO. v. DUFFET et al. (Civ. 3449.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 23, 1920.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=242(2)—Defendant may not question merits of judgment against debtor.

In an action against a wife to hold her as involuntary trustee for property received from her husband, a judgment debtor, without consideration, the wife and other defendants cannot argue the merits of the legal questions decided by the judgment against the husband.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=295(4)—Judgment prima facie evidence of creditor's claim as against grantees of debtor.

Where a judgment creditor attacks his debtor's conveyance as fraudulent, his judgment against the debtor is prima facie evidence of his claim as against the grantees of the debtor.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=297—Execution returned nulla bona prima facie shows insolvency.

When it appears that an execution has been issued and returned nulla bona, there is a prima facie showing of insolvency on the part of the judgment debtor for purposes of suit attacking an alleged fraudulent conveyance to his wife.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=297—Insolvency of grantor proved prima facie by return of execution nulla bona.

In suit to hold a wife as involuntary trustee of property received from her husband without consideration, in view of all the circumstances in evidence, return of execution against the husband nulla bona made out a prima facie case of his insolvency at the time of the transfer to defendant wife.

5. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=104(2)—Husband's conveyance to wife held void.

Under Civ. Code, § 3442, conveyance by a husband to his wife without consideration, after demand had been made on him for payment of an indebtedness past due, and a month before action was commenced against him on the demand, was fraudulent and void as to existing creditors, including the creditor which had made demand.

6. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=182(5)—Equity could follow trust funds in hands of debtor's wife.

A creditor, injured by a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor to his wife, which chose to treat the wife as a trustee of the property, holding for the debtor for the benefit of his creditors, had the right to follow the trust property, regardless of its form; it being immaterial whether the property was in the form of the house originally transferred, or had been converted into improvements on another house owned by the wife, so that judgment decreeing lien on the property in which the funds had been invested was proper.

7. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=268—Plaintiff creditor properly permitted to ask declaration of lien on defendant wife's property.

In suit against a wife by her husband's creditor to hold her as involuntary trustee of property received from her husband without consideration, the trial court properly permitted plaintiff creditor to file supplemental complaint asking that a lien be declared in its favor on the property of the wife for the amount received from the sale of her husband's property and invested in hers, the amended complaint having contained a prayer for general relief, so that the supplemental complaint did not state an entirely new cause of action and ask different relief.

8. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=181(1)—Grantee cannot validate void title by changing form of property or filing declaration of homestead.

Where a husband's conveyance to his wife was void under Civ. Code, § 3442, as fraudulent to his existing creditor, the wife could not make her void title good by changing the form of the property, nor by filing a declaration of homestead covering it, and securing its exemption in her bankruptcy proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by the Ohio Electric Car Company against Josephine Duffet and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Parker & Parker, of Pasadena, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff for $1,261 and interest in an action to recover from Josephine Duffet, one of the defendants, the net amount which she had received from the sale of certain real property which had been transferred to her without consideration by her husband, at a time when it is alleged he was indebted to the plaintiff company and at a time when he was insolvent. The plaintiff also asked by the prayer of its supplemental complaint to have its judgment declared a lien upon real property owned by said Josephine Duffet because of the fact that the funds so received by her had been invested in improvements upon said real property. This order was also included in the judgment.

It appears from the record that George E. F. Duffet, the husband of Josephine Duffet, together with one Le Sage, had guaranteed to hold the Ohio Electric Car Company harmless from any loss or damage suffered by it by reason of the nonperformance of the terms of a certain contract by the Washington Street Electric Garage Company. This contract was for the sale and purchase of automobiles. The Washington Street Electric Garage Company was a fictitious name used by the daughter and son-in-law of George Duffet in the conduct of their business. The persons doing business under this fictitious name failed to meet their obligations under the contract with the plaintiff, and were sued, together with Duffet and Le Sage, for the amount due under the contract for goods sold and delivered. Judgment was secured in this action (No. B–32522 in the superior court for the county of Los Angeles) against all of the defendants named therein, including George Duffet. The record in this action was introduced in evidence in the present action to establish the plaintiff's claim and the indebtedness of George Duffet.

[1, 2] The appellants object to this judgment as evidence against Josephine Duffet. The argument advanced is that, although the question of whether or not George Duffet was indebted to plaintiff is res adjudicata between him and the plaintiff because of this judgment in case No. B–42522, nevertheless the defendant Josephine Duffet may require proof of these facts as against her, and is not bound by this judgment. Upon this theory appellants seek to argue the merits of the legal questions decided by said judgment No. B–42522. We find no merit in this contention. In the present action Josephine Duffet is not sued individually; she is sought to be held as an involuntary trustee of property received from her grantor without consideration. The judgment against her goes no further than the amount of the property so received by her. Where a judgment creditor attacks his debtor's conveyance as fraudulent, his judgment against the debtor is prima facie evidence of his claim as against the grantees of the debtor. Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 386, 394. The record contains a copy of the execution issued in said action No. 42522, and a return thereon, showing that the sheriff was unable to find any property of the defendants not exempt from execution, and that the execution was returned wholly unsatisfied. This return bears date of May 12, 1917. The property was conveyed by George Duffet to his wife in August, 1916. This was after demand had been made upon George Duffet for payment of the indebtedness which he had guaranteed and which was then past due, and just a month before action was commenced against him upon said demand. This property was conveyed to said Josephine Duffet without valuable consideration.

[3, 4] When it appears that an execution has been issued and returned nulla bona, there is a prima facie showing of insolvency on the part of the defendant. Calkins v. Howard, 2 Cal. App. 233, 83 Pac. 280. It is said in Woolridge v. Boardman, 115 Cal. 74, 46 Pac. 868, that, although subsequent insolvency is not of itself foundation for an inference of insolvency at the date of a gift six months previous thereto, yet the subsequent insolvency, occurring within a short interval of time, without any considerable reverse of business through the happening of any casualty, is a fact pertinent to the inquiry whether the like condition did not exist at the time of the gift to the wife, and to illustrate the intent of the donor. In view of all the circumstances in evidence in the present case, we think the return of the execution nulla bona made out a prima facie case of insolvency at the time of the transfer, and this prima facie case was not met by any proof that the defendant George Duffet had any other property of substantial value at the time of the transfer.

[5] The matters heretofore discussed bring this case within the application of section 3442, Civil Code; the transaction was void as to existing creditors, and the plaintiff was such an one. Said Code section provides that such transfers shall be void as to existing creditors. It has been held (First Nat. Bank of L. A. v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64), that, so far as existing creditors are concerned, the title and ownership of the property conveyed with intent to defraud creditors remains in the fraudulent grantor as fully as though no transfer had been attempted, and the transfer being void as against them, a creditor may seize and sell the property under execution, and the sheriff's deed thereto transfers the legal title itself, and not a mere equity. Under such circumstances, then, in so far as this creditor was concerned, the property transferred was yet the property of its debtor. The creditor chose in this action to treat Josephine Duffet as a trustee of said property, holding for its debtor for the benefit of his creditors.

[6] In doing this it had the plain right to follow the trust property, regardless of the form in which it was found. It is quite immaterial in this equitable action whether the property was in the form of the house originally transferred, or whether it had been converted into improvements upon another house owned by Josephine Duffet. This being an equitable action, in which Josephine Duffet is sought to be held as a trustee, equity will follow the trust funds wherever they may be found. The judgment, therefore, decreeing a lien upon the property in which the funds had been invested, to the extent of such investment, was a proper exercise of equitable jurisdiction. Swinford v. Rogers, 23 Cal. 233, 236.

[7] In connection with this matter, appellants object to the action of the trial court in permitting the plaintiff to file a supplemental complaint asking that a lien be declared in its favor upon the property of Josephine Duffet for the amount received from the sale of her husband's property, and invested in her said property. It is contended that this supplemental complaint states an entirely new cause of action, and asks for an entirely different relief. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in permitting the filing of this supplemental pleading. The amended complaint contained a prayer for general relief, and under the well-known equitable rule a court of equity will do full justice in the premises, and render such relief as will fully settle the controversy between the parties wherever possible. Under the prayer of the amended complaint, we think a court of equity would have had power, not only to declare the money judgment against the defendant, but to go further and declare such judgment a lien upon her property under the circumstances in evidence here.

[3] The appellants further object to the creation of this lien upon the property, because Josephine Duffet, on November 26, 1918, while this action was pending, filed a declaration of homestead upon the property sought to be charged with the lien. The answer of defendants to the supplemental complaint, also set up the fact that the defendant Josephine Duffet had been adjudicated a bankrupt on January 23, 1919, and that in said bankruptcy proceedings the homestead had been set aside to her as exempt.

As we have stated, under section 3442, Civ. Code, and under the holding in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Maxwell, supra, and numerous other California cases, the deed conveying this property to Josephine Duffet was void, as to the plaintiff. It was void ab initio, and, as to plaintiff, Josephine Duffet never acquired any title to this property. By turning the same into money, and by reinvesting this money, she could not improve this condition. She could not make a void title good by changing the form of the property, and she cannot make a void title good by filing a declaration of homestead covering the property. In so far as her home represented the funds received from her husband, under the circumstances in this case, it was not a proper subject for inclusion in her declaration of homestead, and cannot be impressed with this character. In so far as this property is not her property, but is property belonging to another and impressed with a trust, it is beyond the protection of the homestead laws. It is not sufficient that if the property had remained in its original form, as a house belonging to the husband and the family had resided there, this might have been homesteaded. The fact remains that these necessary elements did not exist. This situation was considered in the case of La Point v. Blanchard, 101 Cal., at page 552, 36 Pac. at page 99, where it is said:

"The premises had not been selected as a homestead by a declaration by either husband or wife at the time of the transfer, and might have been attached by the creditors. It was not, therefore, property exempt from execution."

The money received by Josephine Duffet from the sale of the property transferred to her was used to pay off incumbrances and make improvements upon her homestead. It was said in Riddell v. Shirley, 5 Cal. 488, that a homestead may not be relieved of debts and charges against it by the disposition of all the other property of the debtor, leaving nothing for the satisfaction of other creditors. This language is quoted with approval in Bishop v. Hubbard et al., 23 Cal. 514, 83 Am. Dec. 132.

With reference to the setting aside of the homestead in bankruptcy proceedings, this money is recovered from Josephine Duffet, not from her property, but as and from the property of her husband—property which the record shows he had before his marriage. If the deed from him to Josephine Duffet was void, and title never passed, then this property could not be set apart to Josephine Duffet in bankruptcy proceedings dealing with her estate. The property is simply property outside of the scope of such proceedings. The mistake made by appellants is in basing their arguments upon the premise that this action is brought to recover as upon a debt owing from Josephine Duffet. This is merely an action to reach the property of the real debtor, George Duffet, and to brush aside the technical legal obstacles in the form of his conveyance, which interfere with the creditors' right in this regard. In Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 128 Pac. 407, it is said:

"A bill maintained by a judgment creditor to subject to the payment of his demand property fraudulently transferred by the debtor is not, strictly speaking, an action upon his judgment. It is really an action for equitable relief against the obstruction caused by a transfer, which hinders him in satisfying his claim by the ordinary process of law; that is to say, by an execution."

The other matters urged by appellants we consider to be without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; BRITTAIN, J.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. KOYER et al.
(Civ. 1683.)

1. Eminent domain ⟸25—Power to condemn for wharf does not include warehouse separate from wharf.

Though the erection of a warehouse on a wharf is reasonably necessary or incidental to the use of the wharf, that fact does not authorize a city to condemn a site for warehouse, situated several blocks from any wharf, under the power given it by Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, before its amendment in 1913, and by the city charter, to condemn lands for public wharves.

2. Eminent domain ⟸1—Power not grant by implication.

A grant of power of eminent domain, which is one of the attributes of sovereignty, will never pass by implication, and, when the power is granted, its extent is limited to the terms and the clear implication of statute.

3. Eminent domain ⟸1—Municipal corporation has no inherent power.

A municipal corporation has no inherent power of eminent domain and can exercise it only when expressly authorized by the Legislature.

4. Eminent domain ⟸25—Charter authorizing bonds for warehouses held not to authorize condemnation for warehouses.

The provisions of Los Angeles City Charter, § 262, authorizing the city to issue bonds for the purpose of erecting wharves and warehouses, and acquiring the necessary land therefor by purchase or condemnation, does not give to the city any power to condemn not already possessed by it, and therefore does not authorize condemnation of property having a warehouse site separate from any wharf.

5. Eminent domain ⟸9—Condemnation of property not "municipal affair," within control of charter city.

The exercise of the power of eminent domain for any purpose is not to be classed as a "municipal affair," within Const. art. 11, § 6, as adopted November 3, 1896, authorizing cities to adopt their own charters, but making them subject to general laws, except in municipal affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Affairs.]

6. Eminent domain ⟸9—Statute and charter amendment do not enlarge rights in pending proceedings.

The amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, in 1913, and of the charter of Los Angeles, so as to authorize condemnation of site for a warehouse, does not enlarge the power of the city to condemn warehouse site by proceedings begun by the issuance of summons before the amendments took effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against A. S. Koyer and others. From a judgment allowing condemnation of land, and denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant Koyer.

Andrews, Toland & Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Co.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and Clyde M. Leach, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to condemn lands for warehouse purposes. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company and A. S. Koyer appeal therefrom, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Appellants rely upon numerous alleged errors of the court in rulings upon evidence offered, and in the manner of conduct of the trial by the judge before whom the case was tried, and in other particulars, by reason whereof they contend that the judgment should be reversed. All of these matters may be dismissed from further attention, if it be held that, as claimed by appellants, the city at the time of the commencement of this action did not have the right to maintain any action for the condemnation of land for warehouse purposes.

The action was commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuance of summons on the 6th day of September, 1910. Pursuant to the verdict of a jury, judgment was entered on the 5th day of September, 1912, which was followed by the final judgment of condemnation entered on the 26th day of November, 1912. A motion for new trial was duly presented, and was denied by the court on the 28th day of September, 1914. The action was tried upon an amended complaint, which was filed on the 8th day of August, 1911. An amendment to the amended complaint was allowed and filed on the 28th day of August, 1912. The amended complaint alleged:

"That the public interest and necessity require that certain municipal improvements be made by the plaintiff, the city of Los Angeles, to wit, that public warehouses for facilitating and accommodating commerce and navigation in waters within the limits of said city, the same to be owned and operated by the said city, be constructed; and for that purpose it is necessary that the plaintiff take and condemn for public use for the purpose of constructing and operating public warehouses thereon" the lands described.

The amendment consisted of an additional paragraph which alleged:

"That the public interest and necessity require, and ever since prior to the 3d day of September, 1910, have required, that certain municipal improvements be made by the plaintiff, the city of Los Angeles, to wit: That public wharves for facilitating commerce and navigation in waters within the limits of said city be constructed, such wharves to be owned and operated by said city. That the plaintiff, the city of Los Angeles, proposes, and ever since prior to said last mentioned date has proposed, to construct such public wharves for said purpose on lands upon said waters and adjacent to and in the vicinity of the lands described in paragraph III of this complaint. That the aforesaid public warehouses to be constructed upon said lands are and will be necessary for the purpose of operating said public wharves, and said city intends to use said warehouses in connection with the operation of such wharves."

The evidence shows without conflict that the proposed warehouse location on the lands of appellants is on a bluff some 50 feet, more or less, higher than the nearest wharves of the city, and at a distance equal to several ordinary city blocks from those wharves. From this the necessary conclusion follows that the warehouse is not to be located upon any wharf or adjacent to any wharf of the city. Separate means of transportation from the wharves to the warehouse will be as completely necessary as if the warehouse was to be located many miles distant from the wharves. In other words, the warehouses are to be physically separate and distinct from the wharves and have no connection therewith, except that commodities delivered upon those wharves or destined thereto may be placed in the warehouse after delivery upon the wharves or prior to being sent thereto for transportation. The evidence further shows by undenied testimony of the city's witnesses that the proposed warehouses are to be general warehouses, irrespective of any special interest, and not conserving the interests of the city wharves alone.

[1] At the time of the commencement of this action it was provided in section 1238, Code of Civil Procedure, that—

"Subject to the provisions of this title, the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: * * * 4. Wharves, docks, piers, chutes, booms, ferries, bridges. * * *"

At that time this was the only provision of the general law, as expressed in our Codes or other statutes, showing or designating any uses by reason of which respondent makes claim that the right of condemnation might be exercised. The only other basis of authority relied upon by respondent is found in the provisions of the charter of the city of Los Angeles. The charter at that time contained the following provisions:

"Sec. 2. The said corporation shall have the power: * * * (7c) To acquire or construct and operate public wharves, docks, piers or moles upon the seashore, in connection with the transportation of passengers and freight between the ocean and the city, and to fix and collect charges therefor." Stats. 1909, p. 1291.

"Sec. 258. * * * The city of Los Angeles shall also have, throughout the whole of said city, * * * the exclusive power to acquire, construct, own, operate and maintain docks, wharves, piers, canals and seawalls. * * *" Stats. 1909, p. 1303.

"Sec. 262. For the purpose of opening, improving, constructing or maintaining streets, highways, or other means of public transportation, to navigable waters within the county of Los Angeles, and acquiring the necessary land therefor by purchase or condemnation, and for the further purpose of constructing and maintaining canals and waterways between such navigable waters and any such streets, highways, or means of transportation, and acquiring the necessary land therefor, by purchase or condemnation, and for the further purpose of constructing docks, wharves, and warehouses, within or without the city boundary, to be owned and operated by the city and acquiring the necessary land therefor by purchase or condemnation, the city of Los Angeles shall be authorized to incur an indebtedness, in addition to any amount now authorized by law, and to issue bonds therefor, to be designated as 'Harbor Improvement Bonds.'" Stats. 1909, p. 1305.

Referring to Clark v. City of Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 317, 116 Pac. 966, which case involved the validity of harbor improvement bonds intended to supply funds for the same harbor improvements in connection with which the city claims the right to condemn the property of appellants, counsel for respondent contend that the Supreme Court specifically held that under the charter provisions quoted above the city had the power to construct and maintain warehouses. In the proceedings leading to the election held to authorize the issuance of the bonds, the resolution of the council had declared as one of the purposes of the proposed improvement that it was intended to construct "docks, wharves and warehouses" upon or adjacent to the city water front bordering upon navigable waters comprising a described portion of the harbor of San Pedro. The Supreme Court affirmed a judgment whereby the superior court refused to enjoin the sale of the bonds. Referring to warehouses, the court said that "warehouses are a necessary, or at least a convenient, adjunct to a wharf." And again: "Warehouses, as stated, are convenient parts of a wharf, being necessary, for the safe-keeping of goods thereon, while awaiting shipment." This was in line with the other decisions to which we are referred by respondent, which are to the effect that the maintenance of sheds, warehouses, and elevators on a public wharf does not create any new or additional servitude or burden upon property dedicated for wharf purposes, but they are simply a means of using the wharf and incidental to the use of the wharf for the very purposes for which it was dedicated or condemned. Belcher Sugar Refining Co. v. St. Louis Grain Elevator Co., 101 Mo. 192, 13 S. W. 822, 8 L. R. A. 801; Reighard v. Flinn, 194 Pa. 352, 44 Atl. 1080; Illinois & St. L. R. & C. Co. v. St. Louis & P. El. Co., 2 Dill. 70, Fed. Cas. No. 7,007.

[2, 3] To hold that a warehouse constructed upon a wharf must be regarded as a part of the wharf, or as an incident of its use, is by no means equivalent to a ruling that the power to condemn property for use as a warehouse at a location distinctly different and separate from that of the wharf is included in the power to condemn property for use as a wharf. We have been referred to no decision or other legal authority which carries this doctrine of implied power to the extent contended for by respondent.

"A grant of the power of eminent domain, which is one of the attributes of sovereignty most fraught with the possibility of abuse and injustice, will never pass by implication, and when the power is granted, the extent to which it may be exercised is limited to the express terms or clear implication of the statute in which the grant is contained. A municipal corporation has no inherent power of eminent domain, and can exercise it only when expressly authorized by the Legislature." 10 Ruling Case Law, p. 196, and cases there cited.

[4] But respondent insists that it has the right here sought to be exercised because of the power which it claims was vested in it by section 262 of its charter, which we have quoted. That section does not directly state that the city shall have power to condemn lands for warehouse uses. The thing directly authorized by the section is that the city shall incur indebtedness and issue bonds therefor, to be designated as harbour improvement bonds, which authorization is granted for certain designated purposes. One of those purposes is therein described as the purpose of constructing docks, wharves and warehouses, and "acquiring the necessary land therefor by purchase or condemnation." The method of acquiring land is not a necessary part of the described purpose. It was sufficient that the charter authorized the city to incur indebtedness for the purposes stated and it might then acquire land for those purposes by any lawful means of acquisition. Section 262, as we construe it, was not intended to assert a new power at that time not possessed by any person or corporation within the state, viz. the power to condemn land for warehouse purposes.

Moreover, appellants very reasonably argue that section 262, if its terms might be held to apply to all of the purposes contended for by respondent, was open to the objection that it was an attempt at special legislation, contrary to the provisions of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution of the state of California, which prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity, or in any case where a general law can be made applicable. We do not ignore the fact that the Constitution, as in force at the time of the commencement of this action, provided for the framing of a charter by a city "for its own government, consistent with and subject to this Constitution" (Const. art. 11, § 8), and that for many years the city of Los Angeles has had such a charter. It was further provided with respect thereto that such charters, "except in municipal affairs, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." Const. art. 11, § 6, as adopted November 3, 1896.

[5] But it is contended by appellants that the construction and maintenance of public wharves for facilitating commerce and navigation, and the construction and maintenance of warehouses "necessary for the purpose of operating said public wharves," as alleged in the complaint in this action, is a matter of much wider scope in its relation to the state at large and to the general public than is any merely municipal affair. Whether this be so or not, it is true that the exercise of the power of eminent domain for any purpose is not to be classed as a municipal affair. In city of Tacoma v. State (in the Supreme Court of the state of Washington) 4 Wash. 64, 29 Pac. 847, the principle to which we adhere was applied by denying to a city organized a freeholders' charter the right to create for itself a "complete code of condemnation proceedings" in the absence of a general law applicable to the exercise of the power in question by that city. The court said:

"But the exercise of the power of eminent domain is so high and peculiar a thing that nothing less than an act of the Legislature of a state can support it, and that act must not only confer the power, but prescribe the method by which it is to be done. This statement would apply were there no requirement of conformity to the general law, but with the requirement in the same act which confers the power the rule is doubly binding. Because the Constitution permits certain cities to frame charters for their own government is no sufficient reason for their assuming a branch of the sovereignty of the state which has no element of municipal government in it, and the provisions of the charter must therefore be held void. Says Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, p. 653: 'The right to appropriate private property to public uses lies dormant in the state until legislative action is had, pointing out the occasions, the modes, conditions, and agencies for its appropriation.'"

[6] By amendment of the charter of respondent city, in effect March 25, 1911, in subdivision 10 of section 2 thereof, it was provided, among other things, that the city shall have power to provide, by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise, and to own and maintain warehouses. This amendment, even if it were competent for the city to assume the power in that way, could add nothing to the powers possessed by the city, as of the time of the commencement of the action. An action of this character is commenced at the time when the summons is issued. City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 647, 57 Pac. 585. It was not until the year 1913 that section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended (St. 1913, p. 544), by inserting in subdivision 4 thereof the words "warehouses" after the words "Wharves, docks, piers."

Appellant A. S. Koyer has withdrawn his appeal from that part of the judgment affecting that part of his property described as "lot 11, block 92, of the town of San Pedro, except the westerly 30 feet of said lot 11." Subject to this withdrawal, by reason whereof the appeal of Koyer, as to that property is dismissed—

The judgment entered on the 5th day of September, 1912, against appellants, A. S. Koyer and Outer Harbor Dock & Wharf Company, and the final judgment of condemnation entered against them, are, and each of them is, reversed. The order denying the motion of said appellants for a new trial is reversed.

HANNAH et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (Civ. 3308; L. A. 6170.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 14, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Railroads ⊂⊃72(7)—Right of way deed held to convey title on condition subsequent.

Deed to a development company, conveying grantor's right, title, and interest in a 100-foot strip of land, "and to its successors and assigns for the purpose of a railroad and the uses incidental thereto," with proviso that, if any land should not be continuously used for railroad purposes, portions not used should be excepted from grant and revert to grantor, conveyed title, and not merely an easement; proviso constituting a condition subsequent.

2. Railroads ⊂⊃72(5)—Reversionary right of right of way grantor in deed on condition subsequent transferable.

The right of a grantor of a strip of land to a development company for railroad purposes to take advantage of breach of condition subsequent that any portion of the land which ceased to be used for railroad purposes should revert is a right capable of transfer by the grantor.

3. Railroads ⊂⊃72(5)—Successors of grantor held to be without interest in right of way conveyed on condition.

Successors of the grantor of a strip of land to a development company for railroad purposes, subject to condition subsequent that any portions which ceased to be used for such purposes should revert, have no estate or interest in the strip granted the company, unless the right of reversion reserved by the grantor has passed to them by virtue of their deeds from him, which is not the case where their deeds expressly reserve the strip.

4. Constitutional law ⊂⊃165—Railroads ⊂⊃82 (3)—Statutory provisions for forfeiture of right of way cannot be applied, so as to impair pre-existing contract.

If the provisions of Civ. Code, § 468, looking to forfeiture of a railroad right of way, may be enforced at the suit of private persons only, without prior action by the state establishing forfeiture of the railroad's right to operate, they cannot be applied in aid of a forfeiture claimed under a contract or condition created before enactment of the statute, as this would violate the constitutional inhibition against impairing contract obligations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Richard Henry Hannah and others against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment quieting title, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, and Frank Karr and R. C. Gortner, both of Los Angeles (W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

W. R. Garrett and Garrett & Coburn, all of Orange, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to quiet title. Judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and an appeal therefrom by the defendant.

On the 5th day of May, 1876, Alfred Robinson, trustee, being at that time the owner of all of the land described in the complaint, executed a deed of grant to the Western Development Company, a corporation, conveying all of his right, title, and interest in a strip of land 100 feet in width within and across the lands so owned by him, "and to its successors and assigns, for the purpose of a railroad and the uses incidental thereto." Following the description there were certain reservations and exceptions and the following proviso:

"Provided, also, that if any portion of the land herein described and set off for the purposes of a railroad and the uses incidental thereto shall not be continuously used for such purposes and uses, then such portions ceased to be so used shall be excepted from this grant and revert to the grantor."

There are nine causes of action stated in the complaint. The allegations of each are to the same effect, except as to the particular parcel of land involved in each claimed by the plaintiffs severally. The complaint was filed on the 4th day of January, 1917. The several plaintiffs claim title to the several parcels to which they assert ownership under a deed executed by Robinson, trustee, dated June 1, 1880, to a grantee through whom the plaintiffs derived their titles to the lands owned by them, on which titles they base their claim to the strip of land in question. The lands owned by the several plaintiffs (other than said strip of land conveyed by Robinson, trustee, to the Western Development Company and afterwards conveyed by that company to the defendant Southern Pacific Railroad Company) are immediately adjacent to sundry portions of said strip of land claimed by the defendant. The deeds under which the several plaintiffs derived their titles were made subject to reservations or exceptions of said strip of land. Instances of these numerous reservations are in form as follows:

"Also reserving a strip of land 100 feet wide for the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company;" "containing 20.61 acres, less 1.75 acres, right of way of said Southern Pacific Railroad 100 feet wide, 18.87 acres net;" "excepting therefrom a strip of land 100 feet wide containing 1.75 acres, being the right of way of said Southern Pacific Railroad Company;" "also reserving a 100-foot strip granted by Alfred Robinson, trustee, as a right of way for a railroad by deed recorded in Book 44, page 496, of Deeds, records of Los Angeles county, California."

It is alleged in the complaint that shortly after the execution of the deed from Robinson of May 5, 1876, "a railroad was constructed and completed on the strip of land therein described, and that a railroad track now exists thereon, and that said Southern Pacific Railroad Company claims and pretends to keep a railroad in full operation thereon; that for more than six months last past said defendant has not kept said railroad in full operation, as required by section 468 of the Civil Code of California, and by an act entitled 'An act to compel railroad corporations, or individuals owning railroads, to operate their roads,' approved April 15, 1880 (Statutes of 1880, page 43), over or upon" the strip or parcel of land of which ownership is in controversy in this action. It is further alleged:

"That for more than five years last past said defendant Southern Pacific Railroad Company has not, nor has any one, continuously used said portion of said strip of land for the purposes of a railroad, or the uses incidental thereto. That more than ten years ago said Southern Pacific Railroad Company constructed a railroad from a point in said strip of land described in paragraph four hereof, lying about due west of the center of the city of Anaheim, being northwesterly from the land of said plaintiffs above described, easterly to the central portion of said city of Anaheim, thence southerly and connecting with said strip of land described in paragraph 4 hereof, at a point southeasterly from the land of said plaintiffs above described, and ever since said time defendant has used the railroad so constructed, and has ceased and failed to use that portion of said strip of land described in paragraph 4 hereof lying between said two points therein connected with said railroad extending through the central portion of the city of Anaheim, as hereinbefore described."

It thus appears that the plaintiffs rely upon forfeiture by the railroad company of its rights in said strip of land, first, by a failure to comply with the requirements of the specified statutes; and, second, by failure to operate the railroad over said strip of land continuously, as specified in said deed of May 5, 1876. It should be noted here that by amendment made in the year 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 574) the provisions of the statute of 1880 were codified and added to section 468 of the Civil Code.

Appellant contends that Robinson, trustee, from and after the time of his deed to the Western Development Company, had no reversion or possibility of a reversion or any estate in said strip of land, but that he had only a right in the nature of a right of action in the event of a breach of the condition subsequent set forth in the deed to the Western Development Company; that upon such breach of the condition subsequent the title would be restored to the grantor, Robinson, trustee, only by forfeiture of the condition, and not by reversion; that this mere possibility was not coupled with any present interest in the land, and could not be transferred, since the entire title was vested in the grantee, the Western Development Company, and later in its grantee, the defendant herein, since a mere possibility not coupled with an interest cannot be transferred (Civ. Code, § 1045); that therefore the respondents have no estate in the strip of land in controversy. Appellant further contends that even if Robinson had a vested interest capable of transfer at the time when he made the deed under which plaintiffs claim title, the various reservations and exceptions above mentioned in the deeds, constituting the several chains of title through which the plaintiffs claim as successors to Robinson, show on their face that Robinson's interest in said strip of land was not conveyed to the plaintiffs. In this connection appellant contends that the trial court erred in overruling its objections to the introduction in evidence of the deeds constituting the basis of the plaintiffs' alleged titles. Respondents, on the other hand, contend that the deed of Robinson to the Western Development Company conveyed, not the fee, but merely an easement for a right of way; that Robinson remained owner of said strip of land, subject only to the easement, and therefore with full right to convey the title thereto; that in fact the deeds under which they claim do convey to them all of Robinson's title in said strip of land subject only to the granted easement.

[1] The deed of Robinson to the Western Development Company conveyed title to the land therein described, and not merely an easement. The proviso contained in the deed, and which we have quoted herein, constituted a condition subsequent. In Behlow v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 130 Cal. 16, 62 Pac. 295, the Supreme Court was called upon to decide this question upon a deed granting to a railway company a described strip of land containing this provision:

"The conveyance of these lands is made for railroad purposes only, and, if not so used, then it is to revert to the parties of the first part."

The court held that this grant—

"created in the grantee an estate in fee in the lands described in the complaint, determinable upon the nonperformance of the condition therein specified. This being a condition subsequent, its terms are to be strictly construed. 'Conditions subsequent are not favored in law and are construed strictly, because they tend to destroy estates.' 4 Kent's Commentaries, 129. Forfeitures are not favored in law, and conditions providing for the forfeiture of an estate are to be construed liberally in favor of the holder of the estate and strictly against an enforcement of the forfeiture. Civ. Code, § 1442. 'Conditions subsequent, especially when relied on to work a forfeiture, must be created by express terms or clear implication, and are construed strictly.' Washburn on Real Property, 447."

[2] Respondents insist that the deed and condition in the Behlow Case are radically different from those presented in the case at bar. So far as the effect of the condition is concerned as conveying the title upon a condition subsequent, we are satisfied that the Behlow Case is sufficiently similar to the Robinson deed to make that decision an authority applicable in the present instance. Nevertheless we are of the opinion that the right of Robinson, trustee, as grantor, to take advantage of a breach of the condition, was a right capable of transfer. That a grantor's right of re-entry or of repossession for breach of a condition subsequent is in this state a right which can be assigned or devised, either before or after breach of the condition, has been definitely settled by decision. Johnston v. City of Los Angeles, 176 Cal. 479, 168 Pac. 1047.

[3] But respondents have no estate or interest in the strip of land in controversy, unless the right of reversion reserved to himself by Robinson, trustee, has passed to the plaintiffs by virtue of the deeds under which they claim title as hereinabove stated. The reservations and exceptions contained in those deeds are such that no estate in the land constituting the right of way property was conveyed or purported to be conveyed to the plaintiff; and since the plaintiffs offered no other evidence than those deeds to sustain their claim of title, it follows that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding made by the court to the effect that the various plaintiffs are the owners of those portions of said strip of land claimed by them and described in their several causes of action.

Since it appears that, for the reasons above state, the judgment must be reversed, and that those reasons indicate that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action, an extensive review of the other grounds of appeal relied on by appellant is omitted. It is argued very forcibly by counsel for appellant that the statutory provisions now contained in section 468 of the Civil Code cannot be applied as a reason for enforcement of any right of forfeiture; that those requirements of the statute were not in existence until four years after the execution of the deed of May 5, 1876; that that deed constituted a contract establishing the sole terms and conditions under which the title then transferred might be defeated, and that the contractual obligations thus established cannot be changed and made more burdensome by any subsequent statute.

[4] Assuming, without deciding, that such statutory provisions looking to a forfeiture of a railroad right of way might in any case be enforced at the suit of private persons, or of private persons only, without prior action by the state establishing forfeiture of the company's right to operate the road, we think that such statutory provisions cannot be applied in aid of a forfeiture claimed under a contract or condition created before the enactment of the statute. To apply the statute as insisted upon by respondents would violate the constitutional right of protection against laws impairing the obligations of contracts.

Appellant contends that the evidence shows no forfeiture by appellant, either under the provisions of the deed from Robinson, trustee, or under the provisions of the statute. We deem it unnecessary to discuss these matters, or the other points relied upon, since, even if the operation of the railroad has been so defective as to constitute a breach of the condition upon which defendant's title is held, nevertheless the plaintiffs could not recover in this action.

The judgment is reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, we deem it proper to note that the statement in the opinion reading as follows, viz.:

"The reservations and exceptions contained in those deeds are such that no estate in the land constituting the right of way property was conveyed or purported to be conveyed to the plaintiff"

—is without error in so far as anything shown by the briefs is concerned. The claim that an examination of the record will show that this statement is erroneous as to several of the plaintiffs, that there was no difference in this respect between their deeds and the deeds of the other plaintiffs, appears to be made for the first time in the petition for hearing filed herein.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

1. Principal and agent ⟸155(4)—Agent, without authority, employing a broker, is liable as principal.

Under Civ. Code, § 2342, declaring that one assuming to act as agent warrants that he has the authority assumed, section 2343, declaring him responsible, as a principal, when entering into a written contract in the name of his principal, not believing, in good faith, that he had authority to do so, and section 3318, declaring the measure of damages for breach of such warranty, one as agent, knowing he had no authority, by written contract employing a broker to sell the principal's property, is liable as principal for the amount that the broker could have recovered of the principal, had the agent had authority.

2. Principal and agent ⟸155(4)—Agent, without authority employing a broker, held liable to broker as a principal.

Defendant, who as agent of the owner of land, but without authority, employed plaintiff broker to sell it, having accepted an offer of purchase, by a customer procured and presented by plaintiff, as performance of plaintiff's contract of employment, any variance in the terms of the offer from the terms given plaintiff will not avail defendant, sued on his liability as principal, under Civ. Code, §§ 2342, 2343, 3318; the landowner having repudiated the transaction as unauthorized, as it would not have availed the landowner, had defendant had authority as agent.

Action by C. C. Borton against J. J. Barnes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. C. Boynton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff seeks in this action to recover from the defendant the reasonable value of his services alleged to have been rendered under a written contract, entered into by the defendant, in the name of the J. D. Barnes Company, Incorporated. It is the theory of the plaintiff that the defendant assumed to act as an agent of the corporation, and entered into the contract in its name without believing, in good faith, that he had authority to do so, thereby rendering him liable to the plaintiff, as a principal, for his acts in connection with the transaction. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff is a realty broker, and the defendant is the secretary and general manager of the J. D. Barnes Company, Incorporated, a corporation. Purporting to act in such capacity, the defendant as such secretary, in the name of the corporation, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a written agreement, authorizing and employing the plaintiff to sell certain real property belonging to the corporation, for the sum of $90,000, subject to a commission of 5 per cent. Relying upon the representations of the defendant that he had authority to make the agreement, plaintiff found a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the land of the corporation, at the price designated in the contract. Plaintiff received from him a written offer to make such purchase and a deposit of $500, both of which he tendered to the defendant and the corporation. No objection of any kind was made. The defendant accepted the offer as full performance, by plaintiff, of his contract, and assured the plaintiff that he had earned, and would be paid, the commission of $4,500. He promised to at once call a meeting of the stockholders of the corporation and have the sale ratified. The defendant had no authority to enter into the contract, and the corporation disavowed and repudiated the transaction and refused to be bound by the agreement. The court found that the defendant entered into, and induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract, without believing in good faith, at any time, that he had authority from the corporation to make the agreement, and knowing that the corporation had not authorized its execution. Judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $4,500, the full amount of the specified commission.

[1] The appellant contended in the lower court, and with equal energy urges here, that the action, as tried, is one to recover real estate commissions alleged to be due from the defendant, J. J. Barnes, and that no cause of action was stated, or proved, for the reason that the contract does not contain apt words to charge him personally. Appellant has mistaken the nature of plaintiff's cause of action. The complaint was in three counts. At the trial the plaintiff waived the second and third causes of action, and we are only concerned with the averments in the first count, and the findings made in response to the issues thereby created. In addition to setting forth the facts, which we have only briefly summarized, it is alleged, and the lower court found, that in all matters connected with the carrying out of the said contract, the defendant assumed, stated, represented, and warranted to plaintiff that he had authority, as agent of the corporation, J. D. Barnes Company, Incorporated, to act for it, and by such assumption, warranty, and statements led the plaintiff to, and he did, carry out the terms of the contract. It is further alleged and found that the defendant negotiated the contract, and induced the plaintiff to enter into it, without believing in good faith that he had authority from the corporation to do so. The prayer of the complaint is to recover the sum of $4,500, the amount of the commission which would have been earned by the plaintiff had the sale been consummated, and which is averred to be the reasonable value of the expense necessarily incurred, and the reasonable value of the time and effort expended by plaintiff in carrying out the contract.

Appellant's position finds apparent support in a number of cases cited by him. The Legislature of this state, however, upon the adoption of the Codes, which took effect January 1, 1873, held to an entirely different view. It is now the statutory law of this jurisdiction that "one who assumes to act as an agent thereby warrants, to all who deal with him in that capacity, that he has the authority which he assumes" (Civ. Code, § 2342), and is responsible to third persons, as a principal, for his acts in the course of his agency, when he enters into a written contract in the name of his principal, without believing, in good faith, that he has authority to do so (Civ. Code, § 2343). The detriment, caused by the breach of such warranty, is deemed to be the amount which could have been recovered, and collected from the principal, if the warranty had been complied with, and the reasonable expenses of legal proceedings taken, in good faith, to enforce the act of the agent against the principal. Civ. Code, § 3318. The cases relied upon by the appellant as holding to a contrary doctrine, to that established by the Code sections, must be viewed in the light of the foregoing provisions, and in some instances may be distinguished on the facts.

Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 568, 89 Am. Dec. 64, was decided in 1866. It merely adhered to the rule that at common law the officers of a corporation are not personally liable on a promissory note of the corporation, made by them as such officers, in which the promise to pay is made by the corporation, and not by the officers personally. In its discussion the court said:

"Upon the question whether the plaintiff can make a case which will charge the defendants at common law, we intimate no opinion. The law as to when an agent who acts without authority renders himself personally liable is not in all respects fully settled, as will be seen by a reference to the authorities cited above; and it would be but idle speculation to discuss a case of which the special facts are not before us. We merely hold that they are not liable at common law upon the note as contracting parties, which is the attitude in which they are now before us."

Lander v. Castro, 43 Cal. 497, was also decided before the Code sections took effect. The court there held that an attorney in fact, who executed a note binding his principal to pay money, was not liable on the note, if he had no authority from the pretended principal, but said that "if liable at all for the money mentioned in the note, his liability depends upon other grounds." These two cases were followed in Wallace v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 19, 18 Pac. 788, 11 Am. St. Rep. 231, and Senter v. Monroe, 77 Cal. 347, 19 Pac. 580, and were referred to in Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 523, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127, all decided after the enactment of the Code sections. In each of the decisions cited from 77 California, wherein it was held that the defendants were not liable because the contracts did not contain apt words to charge them personally, it was distinctly stated that the plaintiff's remedy in such cases is an action to recover the money paid, on the value of the work, or labor, if any, performed for the defendant under the supposed contract, or special damages resulting to the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's wrong in undertaking to act for another without authority. In Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127, it was held that the plaintiff might recover a deposit, on sale of real estate, from an administrator of an estate who made himself personally liable for its return.

However unsettled the law, as to when an agent, who acts without authority, renders himself personally liable, may have been when Hall v. Crandall and Lander v. Castro were decided, it became settled law in this state when the Legislature enacted the Civil Code. In fact, it seems to have been the intention of the framers of the sections in question to set the matter at rest in this jurisdiction. That such was the objective of the code commissioners seems apparent from their comment on the section, as has been pointed out by the authors of the notes to the same section in Deering's and in Pomeroy's Annotated Civil Code of California. In enacting the sections the code commissioners and the Legislature adopted the rule of liability enumerated in the early New York decisions, which was later embodied in the form of a proposed statute by the Field code commission of that state. The identical statute was enacted, and is in force in North Dakota. It was decided by the Supreme Court of that state that, under the statute, it does not admit of doubt that a party in the position of the plaintiff here has a cause of action against the defendant, upon the contract as a principal, for the section quoted declares in express language that "one who enters into a written contract in the name of his principal without believing in good faith that he has the authority to do so"—and that is this case—"is responsible to third persons as a principal." Kennedy v. Stonehouse, 13 N. D. 232, 241, 100 N. W. 258, 260 (3 Ann. Cas. 217).

So far as we have been able to discover the above Code sections have been called to the attention of an appellate court of this state but once since their enactment, and that in a very recent case. Kohlberg v. Havens, 182 Pac. 467, 468. In that case the president of a corporation procured the services of the plaintiff in obtaining a satisfactory lease of a part of the corporation's realty. When the plaintiff sued the estate company for payment for his services, it denied the authority of the president to act as its agent in making the contract, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. He then brought an action against the president of the corporation, personally, for breach of warranty of authority. The contract of employment was not in writing, and the court held the action one properly founded upon section 2342, Civil Code, supra, the amount of the recovery being determined by section 3318 of the same Code, supra. In the present case the defendant assumed to act for J. D. Barnes Company, Incorporated, in securing the services of the plaintiff, and that in itself constituted a warranty of his authority to act as such agent. Kohlberg v. Havens, supra. He went further, and entered into a written contract in the name of his principal, knowing he had no authority to do so, which rendered him responsible to the plaintiff as a principal, for his acts in the course of his agency. Civ. Code, § 2343, supra; Kennedy v. Stonehouse, supra. Plaintiff therefore has the right to recover from the defendant the reasonable value of the services he performed under the contract, if otherwise entitled thereto, in the same manner as he could have done had the defendant been the real principal in the transaction.

[2] By the terms of the contract entered into by the defendant the plaintiff was authorized to sell certain "water front property bounded by Oakland Estuary on the north, by Clement street on the south, by Grand street on the west, and by Chestnut street on the east, and consisting of about eighteen (18) acres, located in Alameda, Alameda county, California," for $90,000, upon terms, with interest on the deferred payments. Thirty days was allowed for search of title, and for clearing the same of defects. The offer of plaintiff's purchaser is for property "bounded on the south by Clement street, on the west by Grand street, on the east by Chestnut street, and on the north by the United States bulkhead line, excepting the block, known as block 64, now used by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, it being understood that said property to be purchased contains eighteen (18) acres, and that I shall receive from the present owner all his right, title, and interest, if any, to property lying between the United States bulkhead line and the pierhead line in Oakland Estuary," upon the terms and conditions specified in the purported authorization of sale, with the proviso that "in the event that said title be found, within said time, not to be merchantable, or if said property is found to be deficient in acreage, then I may, at my option, terminate this contract of purchase and all payments made hereunder shall be immediately returned to me."

Appellant's contention is that the plaintiff has not alleged and proved that he secured a purchaser ready and willing to enter into a binding contract on the terms and conditions authorized by his employment. We do not need to analyze the authorization, and the offer of acceptance, in order to ascertain if appellant's construction of the two instruments is sound. Assuming the fact to be as appellant contends, as a matter of abstract law his contention is so far correct; but the advantage thus gained by him was lost when he failed to make any objection to the offer, on the part of the purchaser, at the time it was presented by the plaintiff. It was pleaded, and the lower court found, that the plaintiff produced a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase the land at the price set forth in the contract. This finding appears unchallenged.

Assuming, therefore, that the defendant, as the secretary and manager of the corporation, in the first instance, had the authority to enter into the contract with the plaintiff for the payment of the commission upon effecting a sale of the corporation's property, it may also be assumed that he would have the authority to accept or reject the offer of the intending purchaser when it was presented by the plaintiff. The offer being presented, a cause of action would at once arise in favor of the plaintiff and against the corporation for the amount of his agreed compensation. Consequently, when neither the corporation, nor the defendant, rejected the offer for the purchase of the property, upon the ground that it was not in accordance with the original contract for making the sale, it became a binding obligation upon the corporation, and it could not defend against plaintiff's claim upon the ground that he had not produced a purchaser ready and willing to enter into a binding contract on the terms and conditions authorized by his employment. Where property is sold by a broker "to a purchaser able, ready, and willing to take and pay for the property, and any of the terms of the contract as to payment, abstract or deed are unsatisfactory to the intending vendor, the latter should object to them on that ground and not refuse absolutely to sell; and * * * where he fails to make such objection under such circumstances, he will be held liable to the broker negotiating the sale of his commissions if he refuses to accept the purchaser." California Land Security Co. v. Ritchie et al., 180 Pac. 625, 628; Fiske v. Soule, 87 Cal. 313, 321, 25 Pac. 430; Smiley v. Read, 163 Cal. 644, 647, 126 Pac. 486.

The defendant in this case is in no better position than is the purported principal. Consequently, when the cause of action arose in plaintiff's favor against him, by reason of his deceit in securing plaintiff to enter into the contract, he is as much estopped in the premises as his principal would have been. He did not refuse to consummate the sale upon the ground that some of the terms of the offer were unsatisfactory. On the contrary, he made no objection to it, and accepted the offer from the plaintiff as full performance of his part of the contract. His explanation of his attitude in that regard is that he did not learn until some time later that the offer did not measure up to the contract he had entered into, in the name of the company, with plaintiff. Even if that be so, he did not then communicate any objection to plaintiff or to the purchaser. The offer was finally rejected upon the ground that the Barnes Company declined to consider it. This being the case, defendant should not be allowed to offer as an excuse for not complying with his contract, and as a defense to this action, the alleged unsatisfactory terms of the offer to purchase, accepted from the plaintiff. Where a party gives a reason for his conduct as to anything involved in a controversy, he cannot, after litigation has been begun, change his ground and put his conduct upon another and different consideration. Fiske v. Soule, supra; Montgomery v. De Picot, 153 Cal. 509, 515, 96 Pac. 305, 126 Am. St. Rep. 84.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEAKE v. HARRIS et al.
(Civ. 2153; Sac. 2957.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 29, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing, Aug. 27, 1920.)

1. Pleading ⟸122, 345(2)—Denials on information and belief disregarded, where party should have actual knowledge.

Denials in an answer on information and belief, with knowledge or means of knowledge of the truth or falsity of the allegations, whether affirmative or negative in form, may be disregarded, and where the answer fails otherwise to join issue with the material allegations of the complaint, judgment may and should be, on motion duly presented, rendered and entered on the pleadings.

2. Pleading ⟸345(2)—Insufficient allegation on information held immaterial, and not ground for judgment on pleadings.

In an action involving water rights, where the answer otherwise specifically denied the allegations of the complaint and averred that defendants claimed adversely to plaintiff as to a part of the waters, and that plaintiff was not entitled to more than 100 inches, held, that an allegation on information and belief that plaintiff had never used more than 100 inches of the water during certain seasons was immaterial, and it was not error to deny a motion for judgment on the pleadings, in that defendants should not have made such allegation on information and belief.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸152(10)—Intermediate order preserving opportunity for securing evidence from practical test, may be proper.

In an action involving water rights, the court had authority to make an intermediate order giving the parties an opportunity for the securing and presenting of evidence based on or growing out of a practical test of the use of the water by rotation, provided for in the order, which would enable the court to so frame its final decree on the findings made, or which it declared must be made on the evidence then before it, as to give to the parties the benefit, as far as the circumstances would permit, of their respective appropriations.

4. Evidence ⟸5(2) — Judicial knowledge of fact that 300 inches is too much water for 30 acres.

The court may almost take judicial knowledge that it is not a reasonable use of water to put 300 inches on 30 acres of alfalfa.

5. Waters and water courses ⟸152(11) — Award of use of water by rotation permissible.

In an action between appropriators of water involving relative rights, an award of the use of the waters by rotation is permissible, where there is not enough water for the concurrent use of it by all the parties.

6. Judgment ⟸252(1)—Award of use of water by rotation permissible under pleadings, though not expressly asked.

Where under the pleadings the important issue made was as to how much of the water of a creek, if any, each of the parties was entitled to take and use, the court could award the use of the waters by rotation, although the pleadings did not directly ask that an alternate use of the water be adjudged; it being within the power and discretion of the court to award to either all or less than their pleadings asked for.

7. Costs ⟸17—Action as to water rights involved title to land, entitling prevailing party to costs.

An action involving conflicting claims to water rights involved title to real estate, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5, the prevailing party was entitled to costs as a matter of course.

8. Costs ⟸61—Both plaintiff and defendant held entitled to costs in action involving title to real estate.

In an action involving title to water rights, where both plaintiff and defendant asked for affirmative relief, and each secured in part by the decree some of the relief for which he respectively asked, they were both entitled to costs under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

9. Waters and water courses ⟸40, 48—Riparian owners acquire or lose no rights by use or disuse of water.

A riparian owner has the right to the reasonable use of the stream on his own land, and this right is neither gained by use nor lost by disuse, but constitutes a part and parcel of the land and of the ownership thereof.

10. Waters and water courses ⟸42, 49, 130—Lower riparian owner cannot complain, except for unreasonable use by upper riparian owner.

A lower riparian owner cannot complain of the use of a stream by an upper riparian owner, except to show that the upper owner uses an unreasonable quantity of the stream, having regard to the needs of the lower owner, and consequently the lower owner cannot enjoin use by an upper owner, unless he alleges unreasonable use to his injury, and the lower owner can acquire no rights as against the upper owner, simply by using a certain amount of the water through a term of years.

11. Appeal and error ⟸1033(8)—No complaint of favorable judgment.

A party on appeal cannot complain of a judgment giving him a larger amount of water than he is entitled to.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Asa Peake, executor of the last will and testament of George M. Lowrey, deceased, against Margaret Harris and Walter Harris. From a judgment granting a part of the relief prayed for, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

H. D. Jerrett and James T. Matlock, both of Red Bluff, for appellant.

W. P. Johnson and W. A. Fish, both of Red Bluff, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff seeks injunctive relief and damages against the defendants for the alleged wrongful interference with a water right to which plaintiff claims to be entitled and for damage already sustained by the plaintiff by reason of such interference.

The dispute between the parties arises over the right to use of the waters of North Elder creek, in Tehama county. Said creek has its source in township 25 north, range 8 west, M. D. B. and M., and flows across defendants' land in section 21 to the lands of plaintiff in section 20. Plaintiff claims through an appropriation, made by one of his testator's predecessors in interest, in 1860, of 300 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure. Defendants' claim is based upon the fact that, in 1876, their ancestor, O. W. Harris, a homestead entryman, appropriated water from said creek for use on the lands now owned by defendants which are riparian to said stream, and that since that time he and they have made beneficial use to the water "to the extent of one-half of said creek during the summer months when the water is low, and at other times not less than 100 miner's inches of water."

The court found that ever since the year 1860 George M. Lowrey, his grantors and predecessors, have owned and claimed, and his estate does now own and claim, by right of appropriation and use, all the waters of North Elder creek as hereinafter stated and defined; that said North Elder creek has its source in the Yollo Bolly range of mountains, and has a natural course easterly to the low arid lands, and emptying into the Sacramento river, all in said county of Tehama, in the state of California, and said North Elder creek in its natural course flows through, over, and upon said tract of land of plaintiff, thereby causing said tract of land to be riparian to and irrigable therefrom, and making said tract of land fit for cultivation and for all other purposes for which an owner of land bordering on a running stream has a right to use the waters thereof; that George M. Lowrey, his grantors and predecessors, have constructed and maintained, at all times since said year 1860, dams, ditches, and other head works for controlling, regulating, conveying, and utilizing said water flow in said creek, to the extent of the appropriation to and upon said tract of land of plaintiff, and for the general distribution of the same over and upon said tract of land, and said works have been, and are now, except as and until interrupted and prevented by said defendants, as hereinafter stated, being used to divert, convey, distribute, and utilize the said waters of said creek, to the extent of George M. Lowrey's appropriation for the purpose of irrigating said lands, for watering cattle and stock, and for household and domestic purposes, thereon, and making said lands of beneficial use to the plaintiff; that during the summer months plaintiff's appropriation and needs exceed the natural flow of water in said creek, and that at the time of the filing of the complaint in this action there were but 30 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure flowing in said North Elder creek above plaintiff's point of diversion; that for two years last past the defendants have at times wrongfully and without right, by means of two ditches and a dam erected across said North Elder creek about one-half mile above plaintiff's head works and point of diversion, diverted said waters away from the natural bed of said creek and away from the plaintiff, and conducted the same by means of said ditch to and upon the land of defendants; that said water so diverted does not return to the said creek whence it is diverted by said defendants, but finds its way into the natural channel of a stream known as and called Middle Elder creek, and the said water now being conveyed by the said defendants' ditches to their said land at times comprises the entire flow of said creek, and leaves the plaintiff without water for the necessary irrigation of his land, and the purposes aforesaid; that the defendants are the owners of and entitled to divert a portion of the waters of said North Elder creek at the place of diversion, and have so used the waters upon the lands described in the answer, said creek in its natural course flowing through and upon the said last-mentioned land, and said land being riparian to said stream and irrigable therefrom; that in or about the year 1876 said O. W. Harris, the predecessor in interest in the land described in the complaint, constructed a dam in said creek and ditch leading therefrom at a place in the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of said section 20, said ditch being 3 feet wide and 1½ feet deep, and conducted water from said creek to and upon the land of said defendants; that said O. W. Harris and the defendants have used continuously each year since the construction of said dam and ditch the waters from said stream for household and domestic purposes, for watering stock and for irrigating said portion of said land, as aforesaid.

The court further found:

Finding XIII: "That during the times when there was plenty of water in said creek sufficient for the use of both George M. Lowrey and defendants, said O. W. Harris, in his lifetime, and since his death the said defendants, diverted the waters of said stream to the capacity of their said ditch, or thereabouts, and in sufficient quantity for use upon their said lands for the purposes above set forth, except in the summer in times of low water, and at such times they have not diverted any of the waters of said stream, except as herein stated."

Finding XIV: "That there is now planted and growing on said premises about 15 acres of alfalfa, and about 2 acres of orchard and garden; that defendants have upon said premises 6 horses, 45 head of cattle, 16 hogs, and about 7 dozen poultry."

Finding XV: "That said water to the extent that it has been used is necessary for the purpose of irrigating said land, and for watering stock, and for household purposes; that the well from which the defendants obtain their supply of water for household purposes is supplied from water in said creek, and if the water is shut off or does not flow in said ditch, said well will not furnish a sufficient amount of water for household purposes."

Finding XVI: "That in times of low water the amount diverted by defendants has not been sufficient for their needs, but they claim the right to divert at said times one-half of the waters flowing in said creek, which claim, as hereinafter stated, is without right."

Finding XVII: "As to the respective appropriations of waters of said creek by the plaintiff and the defendants, the court finds that the plaintiff's appropriation of the waters of said creek for irrigation and domestic purposes is prior in point of time and superior in right to the appropiation made by the defendants and to their rights to the waters of said creek; that at all times since the appropriation of said waters made by the plaintiff, as aforesaid, the plaintiff has only used the waters of said creek for irrigation for a part of the time and when needed, and his use of the waters for irrigation has been intermittent; that from the 1st of October to the 1st of May in ordinary seasons there has been plenty of water in said creek so that each could use one-half thereof without interfering or lessening the necessary use of the other; that during the period from May 1st to October 1st, during the dry season of the year, the plaintiff at times has required and used all of the waters of said creek for the irrigation of his crops, and then has ceased using it until the ground again became dry; that such use by the plaintiff for the irrigation of his lands of the waters of said creek during the dry, or summer season of the year, has not exceeded in point of time more than two-thirds of the days in a month at the outside, and when irrigating has needed and used all the waters flowing in said creek for the purpose of irrigation, and the use thereof made was reasonable and the amount used was necessary for the irrigation of his crops and orchard."

Finding XVIII: "That at all times since defendants' ancestor settled upon the lands above described he and the defendants and the plaintiff in this action have used the waters of said creek for the irrigation of their lands, and their said irrigation has been intermittent and alternating, the plaintiff using it when needed a part of the time, and the defendants using it a part of the time, but the plaintiff has at all times claimed, and has had in his ditch, even when not irrigating his land, water sufficient for the watering of his stock and for domestic purposes."

Finding XIX: "The court finds that the plaintiff, by prior appropriation and use, has the right, and has acquired the right, in the waters of said creek, as follows: The right to have flow down the creek and taken into his ditch from the 1st day of October to the 1st day of May in each year one-half of the natural flow of said stream. At all times he has the right to have flow down the stream and in his ditch, and this right is prior to any rights of the defendants, sufficient water for the watering of his stock and for household and domestic purposes, which the court finds is 15 inches continuous flow, measured under a 4-inch pressure. And the court finds that the defendants have the right and have acquired the right to the waters of said creek, as follows, to wit: The right to take out of said creek and use for irrigation and domestic purposes at all times between the 1st day of October and the 1st day of May in each year one-half the natural flow of said stream."

Finding XX: "The court finds that without detriment to the plaintiff's right or to the defendants' that a decree may be entered permitting the plaintiff to use the waters of said stream part of the time, and permitting the defendants to use the waters of said stream part of the time, reserving always to the plaintiff the right to enough water for stock and domestic purposes."

Finding XXI: "The court finds that the plaintiff's rights in and to said creek and the waters thereof from the 1st day of May each year to the 1st day of October each year are as follows, to wit: He has the right and is entitled to have sufficient water flow down the creek to fill his present ditch, even if it takes all the water in the creek to fill it, for the period of 8 days, beginning with the 1st day of May of each year, and not exceeding 200 inches at the point near his residence. At the end of 8 days the defendants have the right and are entitled to turn into their ditch enough water to fill it for 4 days; the plaintiff and the defendants to have the right to use it alternately thereafter 8 days and 4 days, respectively: Provided, however, that the defendants shall at all times permit as much as 15 inches of water flow down the creek past their dam and the intake of their ditch to furnish water to the plaintiff for stock and domestic purposes."

Judgment was rendered as follows: That plaintiff and defendants are each entitled to one-half the natural flow of said stream from the 1st day of October to the 1st day of May; that the plaintiff is entitled at all times to 15 inches continuous flow for household and domestic purposes; that between the 1st day of May and the 1st day of October of each year plaintiff has "the right to have sufficient water flow down the creek to fill the present ditch, even if it takes all the waters of the creek to fill it, for the period of 8 days, beginning the 1st day of May of each year, and not exceeding 200 inches at the point near the Lowrey residence, measured under a 4-inch pressure; that defendants have the right and are entitled to turn into their ditch enough water to fill it for 4 days thereafter," plaintiff "and the defendants to have the right to use it alternately thereafter 8 days and 4 days respectively, until the 1st day of October of each year." Judgment was also awarded plaintiff in the sum of $100 damages for the diversion of the waters of said creek. The appeal is by plaintiff from said judgment.

[1] It is first contended by appellant that the court erred in denying his motion for judgment on the pleadings. The motion was based upon the following allegation in the answer:

"Allege on information and belief that plaintiff and his predecessors in interest have never used on said land, through their said ditch or otherwise, more than 100 inches of the water from said creek measured under a 4-inch pressure for the irrigation of said land, or for any other purpose, and allege that during the summer months they have never used on said land more than one-half of the waters flowing in said creek at the place of diversion by the ditch of defendants as hereinafter set forth."

The position of the plaintiff is that allegations or denials made in a pleading on information and belief, where it is plain that there is knowledge or means of knowledge as to the truth or falsity of such allegations or denials, do not state issuable facts or tender an issue upon a material fact. The case of Le Breton v. Stanley Contracting Co., 15 Cal. App. 429, 114 Pac. 1028, is cited as in support of that proposition. The rule referred to is well settled and understood, and is that denials in an answer on information and belief, with knowledge or means of knowledge of the truth or falsity of the allegations, whether affirmative or negative in form, may be disregarded by the court (Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 52, 50 Pac. 1066), and where in such case the answer fails otherwise to join issue on the material allegations of the complaint, judgment may and should be, on motion duly presented, rendered and entered on the pleadings. Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 287. That rule, however, cannot be given application in this instance. It is, indeed, very doubtful whether it applies at all to a matter such as that to which the criticized allegation of the answer relates, for it is hardly to be supposed that such a matter is within the knowledge of the defendant, or that he has the means of acquiring knowledge of the fact. Unless a person be an expert measurer of flowing waters, it is not likely that he would know or could learn, unaided by an expert, how much water is flowing in a creek or a ditch, or the quantity of water which has customarily flowed in such creek or ditch for an extended period of years. But we think the allegation is, in view of the real issues made by the pleadings, wholly unnecessary and immaterial.

The complaint alleges that, ever since the year 1860, plaintiff, his grantors, and predecessors have owned and claimed, and that he "does now own and claim, by right of appropriation, 300 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, of the natural flow of that certain stream of water having its source in the Yollo Bolly range of mountains, known as and called North Elder creek," etc., and that said defendants claim adversely to the plaintiff "that they have the right to divert and use, above the point of plaintiff's diversion, the water of said North Elder creek to the extent of the whole flow thereof, during the summer months, when the water is low, and at the time that this plaintiff has need of the water of said creek, to the extent of his said appropriation, for the purpose for which this plaintiff is entitled to use the same, and claims, adversely to this plaintiff, that said right belongs to said defendants; that all of said claims of defendants are without right," etc.

[2] The answer specifically denies the foregoing allegations of the complaint, and avers that the defendants "have never claimed adversely, or at any time, the whole of the waters of the said creek, but allege that they claim, adversely to plaintiff, that they have the right to divert and use above the point of plaintiff's diversion the waters of said * * * creek to the extent of one-half of the flow thereof during the summer months, when the water is low, and at other times not less than 100 miner's inches of water." It is further alleged in the answer that the defendants have continuously appropriated and used for a beneficial purpose for over five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action one-half of the flow of the waters of said creek in the manner and at the times above indicated.

Thus it will be seen that the answer admits that the plaintiff is entitled to the use of a certain designated quantity of the waters flowing in said creek, but directly denies the allegation of the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the quantity of water claimed by him in his complaint and then sets up a claim and right of defendants to use one-half of the water of said creek, and thus it is clear that the issue as to the respective rights of the parties in the waters of said creek is squarely and directly made and tendered. Therefore, if the allegation in the answer, founded upon information and belief, that the plaintiff and his predecessors, etc., have never used on said (plaintiff's) land more than 100 inches of the waters of said creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, for the irrigation of his land, were entirely eliminated from the complaint, there would still remain the principal or all-important issue, directly raised by the pleadings, to wit: The question as to the respective rights of the parties, as to quantity, to the waters flowing in said creek. It follows that the denial of the plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings was proper.

The next assignment involves the action of the court in making what appears to be an intermediate order whereby it awarded to each of the parties the right to use the waters of the creek at different times during the summer months immediately following the making of said order. The opinion of the court, which embraced the order referred to, is in part, as follows:

"The evidence in this case shows that, for many years, both the plaintiff and the defendant have been using the waters of North Elder creek for purposes of irrigation. At low stages of the creek they have used the waters thereof alternatively, one party using all of it for a time, and then the other all of it for a time. * * * The case in its final decision must be controlled by the principles announced in such cases as Hufford v. Dye, 162 Cal. 147 [121 Pac. 400]. And on the facts of this case I am satisfied, following the principles announced by the Supreme Court, I have the power and should during the times of low water permit a use of the entire flow of the stream first by one party and then by the other. A use of the water in this manner during the present summer will throw light on the wisdom of the order I shall make, and if it is found not to work well in practice it can be changed on a final decision of the case. The case will be continued for a further hearing until after the summer months have passed, at which time evidence may be introduced showing how the order of the court has worked as to the use of the waters of the stream, and also as to how many inches of water properly and economically used is reasonably necessary for the irrigation of the lands of the respective parties, and evidence may be introduced on other features of the case."

[3] The contention of the appellant is that the court was without authority or jurisdiction to make an intermediate order such as the above. It may be conceded that the decision of the controversy could not be made to depend or rest alone upon the question whether the temporary order designating or specifying the respective rights of the parties in the waters in question would so operate in its practical application as to give to each of the parties an opportunity for using so much of said waters as might be necessary for the purposes of each; but it appears that, before making the order, the court had in effect found that the plaintiff and the defendants were each entitled to the use of said waters in certain indicated quantities, the former having a prior or superior right thereto by reason of his prior appropriation of the waters of said stream. Such a finding is implied from the statement embraced in the order that—

"The case in its final decision must be controlled by the principles announced in such cases as Hufford v. Dye, 162 Cal. 147 [121 Pac. 400]."

In that case it is said:

(1) "That one making an appropriation of the waters of a stream acquires no title to the waters but only a right to their beneficial use and only to the extent that they are employed for that purpose." (2) That where there are two or more appropriators of the waters the same stream and it is found, as here, that there is not water enough to permit a diversion of the stream and a simultaneous use of part by both or all the parties without injury, "the court may by its decree fix the times when, by rotation, the whole may be used by each at different times in proportion to their respective rights."

It was therefore proper for the court to postpone the further hearing of the case for the purpose, as was the express object of the order complained of, of facilitating the procurement of further and perhaps more satisfactory evidence upon that question than was before it up to the time that said order was made, as to how the waters of the creek could be so used by the parties as to preserve to them their respective rights thereto, as already found by the court. In other words, it was proper for the court to give to the parties an opportunity for securing and presenting evidence, based upon or growing out of a practical test of the matter, which would enable the court to so frame its decree upon the findings made or which it declared must be made upon the evidence then before it as to give to the parties the benefit, as far as the circumstances would permit, of their respective appropriations, keeping in view, of course, the prior and superior rights of the plaintiff. But even if the court was without authority to make so much of the order as authorized a practical test of how or in what way the waters might be used by both parties without injury to the rights of either, it certainly had the right to postpone the further hearing of the case for the purpose of securing additional evidence on "other features of the case" which were material and necessary for a proper decision of the controversy, and it may be added that, as to the practical test, the order in that respect is now, and was at the time of the final decision, functus officio, and is now without prejudice to the plaintiff so far as a decision on the merits is concerned, except perhaps as to any damage which he might have suffered to his rights from such test, which proposition could, if properly presented, have been considered by the court in its award of damages in the final decision.

It is next claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify findings Nos. 19, 20, 21, 22 and a certain portion of finding No. 17. The portion of the last-mentioned finding which it is urged was not so notified is to the effect that plaintiff has used only a portion of the waters of said creek for irrigation for a part of the time; that at times he has required the use of all the waters of the creek, but that in the dry season such use has not exceeded more than two-thirds of the days in a month.

We shall not attempt, nor is it deemed necessary, to reproduce herein the testimony, or even an extended résumé thereof, to show that the attack upon the findings above mentioned is without a substantial foundation for its support. The findings are given above. These facts are not disputed: That the land of the plaintiff and that of the defendants are riparian to and irrigable from North Elder creek; that the plaintiff and the defendants, through their respective grantors and predecessors in interest, each acquired by appropriation, the right to the use of the waters of the creek in question in the years 1860 and 1876 or 1877, respectively; that the plaintiff, in the year first named, appropriated 300 inches of the waters of said creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, it being claimed by the defendants, however, that the plaintiff never used or had use for more than 100 inches of said waters until after they (the defendants) had made and recorded their appropriation; that O. W. Harris filed with the county recorder of Tehama county, on the 20th day of March, 1877, a "notice of water right," reciting that he had appropriated "the water of North Elder creek * * * and diverted the same at a point on the S. E. quarter of the N. E. quarter of the N. W. quarter of Sec. 20, Tp. 25 N., R. 6 W., by means of a dam at said point where this notice is posted and ditch 3 feet wide and 1½ feet deep, conducting said water to the extent of 300 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, to and upon" the land above described, and "claims the water of said * * * creek by right of appropriation and continued annual use from 1876 to the present time and to the extent" above specified, "and he intends to claim and continue the use thereof and to divert the same at a point aforesaid for said purposes"—that is, for agricultural purposes; that said notice was duly signed and dated by said O. W. Harris, the predecessors of the defendants, and was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tehama county at the request of G. M. Lowrey, plaintiff's intestate.

[4] As to whether the court was justified from the evidence in apportioning the use of the waters of the creek between the contending parties in the manner indicated by its findings, and in ordering by its decree the use of the waters by the parties alternately—that is, in fixing the times when, by rotation, the waters flowing in the creek may be used by each at different times in proportion to their respective rights—it is sufficient to say: That we have carefully gone over and examined all the evidence, and that from such investigation it is clear that, in the low-water seasons, there is not a sufficient quantity or flow of water in the creek "to permit a diversion of the stream and a simultaneous use of part by both parties without injury," and that, since it is further clear from the evidence that both parties are entitled to the use of the waters of the creek, the plaintiff's rights being prior and superior to those of the defendants, the court was justified in finding that each was entitled to the use of the waters, in proportion to their rights, at different times, and was further justified by the evidence and the findings in that particular in fixing the times when and the periods during which the parties should each have the exclusive right to use said waters. It is made clearly to appear that the plaintiff's intestate, during his lifetime, not only never objected to the use of the waters of the creek by the defendants, so long as such use did not impair or materially interfere with his rights, but recognized the validity of the claim of the defendants to the right, by appropriation, to the use of the waters of the creek, by requesting the recordation of or causing to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tehama county the notice of the defendants or their immediate predecessor of their appropriation of a specified quantity of the waters flowing in said creek. Indeed, there is evidence which shows, as the court found, that the parties for many years have used the waters of the creek alternately or at different times, and thus in such manner that neither was injured, but obtained as much of the waters as were flowing in the creek during the irrigating seasons. The evidence further shows that the lands of the plaintiff requiring irrigation never exceeded in quantity over 30 acres, and, as the trial court declared in its written opinion, which is incorporated into the record here:

"The court might almost take judicial knowledge of the fact that it is not a reasonable use of water to put 300 inches on 30 acres of alfalfa, and no one can acquire title to 300 inches by so doing."

It may further be added that the evidence shows that no trouble or dispute ever arose between the parties or their respective predecessors in interest concerning the use of the waters of the creek until a few weeks prior to the date of the commencement of this action, when, it appears, one of the Lowreys went to the defendants and ordered them to desist in further diverting the waters into their ditches, said Lowrey claiming that there was not enough water for the concurrent use of it by both parties, but the defendants refused to comply with Lowrey's request, and some one within a few days thereafter destroyed the dam of the defendants.

But we need not further advert herein to the evidence. Our conclusion is that the findings and the decree most equitably adjust the rights of the parties upon the evidence disclosing the situation. It will be observed that the court not only finds and decrees that from the 1st day of May to the 1st day of October of each year the plaintiff shall be entitled to have sufficient water flow down the creek "to fill his present ditch, even if it shall require all the water in the creek to fill it for the period of eight days, beginning with the 1st day of May of each year," etc., but that defendants, who are found to be entitled to turn enough water into their ditch at the end of 8 days, covering plaintiff's right to fill said ditch, for 4 days, shall at all times permit as much as 15 inches of water to flow down the creek past their dam and the intake of their ditch to furnish water to the plaintiff for stock and domestic purposes. In other words, while the finding and the decree authorize an alternate use of the water by plaintiff and defendants for a period of 8 and 4 days, respectively, from the 1st of May to the 1st of October of each year, they also require the defendants, during their 4-day use of the water, to allow at the same time 15 inches of water to pass on beyond their dam and the intake of their ditch to the plaintiff for the latter's stock and domestic uses and purposes. The rights of the plaintiff appear thus to be fully preserved. Indeed, he could not have been awarded more than he has received without denying to the defendants any right to the waters of the stream whatsoever, and this the court could not have done without repudiating the evidence disclosing that for years each of the parties had been using the waters intermittently and alternately—one taking the exclusive use during the irrigating seasons for a certain few days and the other following with a like use.

[5] That such an adjustment of the rights of parties to the waters of a creek under such a situation as is presented here—that is, an award of the use of waters by rotation—is permissible as well between claimants of water by appropriation as between riparian proprietors, is established in this state by the case of Hufford v. Dye, supra, 162 Cal. 147, 160, 161, 121 Pac. 400.

[6] But it is argued by plaintiff that, since the complaint and answer do not directly ask that the alternate use of the water be adjudged, nor the complaint ask that the plaintiff be awarded 15 inches of water for domestic purposes during the periods when the waters are being used by the defendants, the findings and the judgment in those particulars are not within the issues made by the pleadings. We cannot agree to this view. The important issue made by the pleadings is as to how much of the water of the creek, if any, each of the parties is entitled to take and use; the plaintiff alleging and claiming that he is entitled under his appropriation to the use of 300 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and the defendants alleging and claiming that they are entitled to the use of one-half of the water flowing in the creek. The evidence was addressed to the question of how much of the waters, if any, the plaintiff was entitled to use, and whether he had a prior or superior right thereto, and the further question of how much, if any, the defendants were entitled to use, and no one will question the proposition that it was within the power or discretion of the court to award to either all or less than their pleadings claimed and asked for, according as the evidence warranted, and this practically is all that the court by its findings and decree has done. The adoption of the remedy or method of rotation was, according to the findings, the only way in which the parties could obtain what the court found that each was entitled to under the evidence. In other words, that course was the only one whereby the court's decree admeasuring to the parties the quantity of water to which they were entitled could be given practical enforcement or operation in view of the situation with respect to the quantity of water ordinarily flowing in the creek in low-water seasons, and therefore it was within the power of the court under the issues as well as necessary under the evidence to adopt that course.

The contention that the finding (No. 22) that the plaintiff is entitled to $100 only as damages for the wrongful diversion of the water by the defendants is not supported, since, as is the claim, the evidence shows that the damage sustained by plaintiff because of the said wrongful acts of defendants was greater than that allowed by the court is without merit. We shall not attempt to detail herein the evidence as to this. It is sufficient to say that our examination of the evidence has convinced us that it failed to disclose and very serious injury to the plaintiff as the result of the said acts of defendants, and we conclude, from an examination of the record, that the sum of $100 represents reasonably fair compensation for the detriment ensuing to the plaintiff from the wrongful diversion of the water by defendants.

[7, 8] It is lastly contended that the judgment, in so far as it adjudged that neither the plaintiff nor defendants should recover costs, is erroneous; it being the position of the plaintiff that, inasmuch as he was granted some relief, he should be allowed his costs. The specific contention is that the action, while in form for an injunction, is in fact and effect one for the determination of adverse or conflicting claims to water rights, and therefore involves the title to real estate, as to which character of actions our Code provides that costs are allowed of course to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 5. We think that the contention is sound, and must be sustained.

The action here involves the title to a water right which is an appurtenance to the lands described in the pleadings, and it has been held that such an action comes within the description of the actions mentioned in subdivision 5 of section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Hoyt v. Hart, 149 Cal. 722, 730, 731, 87 Pac. 569; Northern Cal. Power Co. v. Waller, 174 Cal. 377, 388, 163 Pac. 214, and cases therein cited. Both the plaintiff and the defendants, the latter having asked for affirmative relief in their answer, each secured in part by the decree some of the relief for which they respectively asked. The plaintiff, as well as the defendants, was therefore entitled to costs as a matter of right. F. A. Hihn Co. v. City of Santa Cruz, 24 Cal. App. 365, 141 Pac. 391; Schmidt v. Klotz, 130 Cal. 223, 62 Pac. 470; Hoyt v. Hart, supra.

The judgment, in so far as it adjudged that "each party to this action shall pay his own costs and expenses hereof," is reversed, with directions to the court below to allow costs to each of the parties. The remaining portion of the judgment—that is, the portion other than the portion relating to costs—is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in this court is denied. But in denying the same we think it is necessary to make a statement of the reasons therefor. The plaintiff's predecessors and the defendants' predecessors in interest each owned a quarter section of land having a common north and south boundary; plaintiff's lying east and defendants' west of the common line. The stream in controversy ran through both tracts from the west toward the east, first entering the defendants' land and then through the plaintiff's land. The result is that the plaintiff is the lower riparian proprietor and the defendants the upper riparian proprietors.

It appears from the findings that the plaintiff and his predecessors have diverted water from the stream and used it on said quarter section of land ever since the year 1860, claiming the right under an alleged appropriation and use, and that the defendants and their predecessors in interest have used the waters of the stream on their western quarter section ever since the year 1876. The court below found that by virtue of such use on the lower riparian tract the plaintiff had acquired a right thereto as against the claims of the defendants as owner of the upper tract to the extent of the plaintiff's continuous use; that this use did not include the entire time; that the stream was so small that a division of the rights could better be made by rotation of the use than by a division of the volume of the waters. Thereupon the court found, among other things, that from October 1 to May 1 of each year plaintiff and defendants were each entitled to one-half the natural flow of the stream, but that from May 1 to October 1 of each year the plaintiff was entitled to have the entire flow for 8 days and the defendants the entire flow for the next 4 days, and so on alternately during said irrigating season. In effect this was a finding that the plaintiff by his adverse use on the lower riparian tract had acquired, as against the defendants owning the upper riparian tract, the right to two-thirds of the waters of the stream.

[9, 10] There is nothing in the findings or in the complaint to show that the plaintiff or his predecessors in interest had ever actually claimed that their use was adverse to the riparian rights of the defendants' predecessors on the upper tract, or that such use by the plaintiff on the tract below in any way interfered with the use of the waters of the stream on the tract above, or that the natural conditions entitled plaintiff to more than his proportion measured by the area of his tract. The court below and the District Court of Appeal, as well as the respective parties, appear to have misapprehended the law with respect to the reciprocal rights of upper and lower riparian owners in the waters of a common stream. The decisions are unanimous to the effect that each of such owners has the right to the reasonable use of the stream on his own land and that this right is neither gained by use nor lost by disuse, but constitutes a part and parcel of the land and of the ownership thereof. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 77, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 520, 89 Pac. 338; Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 334, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 91, 94 Pac. 424. It is also settled that the lower riparian owner, the plaintiff being such owner, cannot complain of the use by an upper riparian owner except by showing that the upper owner uses an unreasonable quantity of the stream, having regard to the needs of the lower owner, and, consequently, that the lower owner cannot enjoin the use by an upper owner unless he alleges such unreasonable use to his injury. Swift v. Goodrich, 70 Cal. 195, 11 Pac. 561; Hargrave v. Cook, supra; Heilbron v. Land, etc., Co., 80 Cal. 193, 22 Pac. 62; Anaheim W. Co. v. Semi-Tropic Co., 64 Cal. 192, 30 Pac. 623. It follows from these principles that the lower owner gained nothing as against the upper owner by the mere use of the water upon his own land, since, as the above decisions hold, the upper owner was not concerned with the use made of the water after it passed beyond his boundaries. The plaintiff and his predecessors in interest could not gain any right against the defendants by the long-continued use of the water upon the lower tract of land.

[11] If the defendants were complaining of the judgment, we would be bound to hold that it was erroneous against them, so far as the findings purport to uphold it. But in this case the defendants are not appealing. The plaintiff contends that he has the right to more waters of the stream than is given him by the judgment and upon that ground he took the appeal. The District Court, having affirmed the judgment, he now asks for a rehearing at the hands of this court. From what we have said, it will be seen that the plaintiff has already secured a judgment for a larger amount than he is entitled to; consequently he is not entitled to another hearing of this case.

PEOPLE v. CARSON. (Cr. 733.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. August 2, 1920.)

1. Homicide ⟸253(1)—Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction of murder.

In a prosecution for murder of a street car motorman by defendant and another, after being ejected from the car, evidence held sufficient to sustain defendant's conviction of murder in the first degree.

2. Criminal law ⟸939(2) — Showing of diligence to produce witnesses insufficient.

In a prosecution for murder of a street car motorman by defendant and another, previously ejected from the car, showing of diligence in an effort to produce at the trial witnesses on account of whose newly discovered evidence new trial was asked held insufficient.

3. Criminal law ⟸404(4)—Objection to clothing found in defendant's home, because of remote discovery, went merely to weight.

In a prosecution for murder, objections to the use as evidence of exhibits consisting of certain clothing found at defendant's home five days after his arrest, on the ground that the time of discovery was too remote from the date of the crime, that defendant, at the time of discovery was not in control of the premises, etc., went merely to the weight of the evidence, and did not affect its admissibility.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃775(6)—Instruction on alibi held not improper.

In a prosecution for murder of a street car motorman by defendant and another, previously ejected from the car, instruction that, while the jury were not to hesitate at giving the defense of alibi the full weight to which it was justly entitled, when established, still they were to scrutinize the testimony offered in its support with care, was not objectionable as unwarrantably diminishing the weight of such testimony, etc.

5. Criminal law ⊂⊃927(2)—Necessary separation of jury insufficient ground for new trial.

Where, when the jury deliberating on a murder case were taken out to dinner, the first automobile was insufficient to carry them all, so that 11 jurors, with the deputy sheriff, occupied the first automobile, and the remaining juror, together with the clerk of court, sworn as an additional officer, occupied the second car, such separation of the jury was insufficient ground for new trial.

6. Criminal law ⊂⊃388—District attorney's removal of exhibit for experimentation affected only weight of testimony.

The conduct of the district attorney in taking away a revolver, an exhibit in the case, without leave of court, to experiment with ammunition before giving his testimony on second trial, affected only the weight, and not the admissibility, of his testimony.

7. Criminal law ⊂⊃1037(2)—Reversal will not be had for improper argument, in absence of objection and request for correction.

If no assignment of error is made when objectionable statements are made in argument by the district attorney, and no request is made that the court instruct the jury to disregard such language, reversal will not be had for such misconduct.

8. Criminal law ⊂⊃1158(3)—Decision concerning district attorney's conversations with jurors will not be disturbed.

Where affidavits in support of charges as to the district attorney's improper conversations with members of the jury trying a murder case were submitted on behalf of defendant, but they were directly denied by counter affidavits, the decision of the trial court concerning the matter on such conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Ernest Carson was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from the judgment, and order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

E. Burton Ceruti, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of murder of the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

At about 10 o'clock on the night of September 25, 1919, two men entered a street car, which was approaching the city of Los Angeles on its way from the city of Redondo. A controversy arose between these men and the motorman and conductor of the car, which resulted in the ejection of the strangers from the car. As the motorman was about to start the car these men, armed with revolvers, fired several shots, and as a result thereof the motorman, George E. Sleeper, was killed. The defendant and another man, who appears to have been the defendant's twin brother, were accused of this crime, and were tried separately. Counsel for appellant, in stating the questions presented on this appeal, admits that the circumstances of the killing were not in dispute, that no mitigating circumstances were offered, and that—"There was but one issue of fact, capable of the following legal distinction: (1) Identification of the defendant. (2) Alibi."

[1] Several witnesses identified the defendant, and testified that he was one of the two men on the car who were implicated in the above-mentioned transactions. The record leaves no doubt that their testimony is sufficient to justify the verdict, so far as the same depends upon the identification of the defendant. The testimony of other witnesses produced by the defendant, and tending to show that defendant was present at a dance held in another section of the city at the very time when Sleeper was killed, has no other effect than to produce a conflict in the evidence which identified the defendant as one of the men present at the time and place of the murder. It therefore must be held that the evidence is altogether sufficient to sustain the verdict.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence. The nature of this evidence is shown by the affidavits of Abraham Gipson and F. A. Lorentz, each of which states facts asserted to be known to the witness, which facts are in aid of the defendant's defense of alibi. From the affidavit of the defendant's attorney it appears that, prior to the trial, he had information that Gipson was on the Long Beach car which defendant claims brought him and other witnesses to the city that night; nevertheless Gipson was not subpœnaed by the defendant to testify in the case. The fact that defendant's attorney "learned that the said Abraham Gipson had been subpœnaed on the part of the prosecution," and that the prosecution failed to call for the testimony of that witness, furnishes no excuse for the defendant's failure to use the witness, if he desired to have his testimony in the case. There is not, with respect to either of these witnesses, any sufficient showing of diligence in an effort to produce them at the trial.

[3] Next it is contended that the court erred in overruling the defendant's objections to the admission in evidence of certain exhibits, consisting of a straw hat and the trousers of a black and white check suit, offered by the prosecution. These clothes, according to the testimony of witnesses, were discovered on the premises at defendant's home on the 22d day of October, 1919, five days after defendant's arrest. There is testimony tending to show that a hat and suit of clothes of similar description to these exhibits were worn by the defendant at the time and place of the killing of Sleeper. The objections to the use of these exhibits as evidence, such as that the time of their discovery was too remote from the date of the crime, and that the defendant was not in control of the premises at the time of their discovery, and that there was a possibility of other unknown persons having visited the defendant's home in the meantime, etc., all go to the question of the weight of the evidence and do not affect its admissibility.

[4] Appellant complains of that portion of the instructions concerning the effect of an alibi, wherein the jury were instructed that, while they were not to hesitate at giving to such defense the full weight to which when established it is justly entitled, "still you are to scrutinize the testimony offered in the support of an alibi with care." Exception is taken on the grounds that the language quoted unwarrantably diminished the weight of the testimony given for the defendant and interfered with the functions of the jury; that it was manifestly unfair and prejudicial to the defendant, whose sole defense rested upon an alibi; that it disturbed and modified the rule of evidence which requires that the defendant's guilt shall be established beyond a reasonable doubt. We think that the instruction is not fairly subject to these objections; in fact, it has been definitely approved by the Supreme Court. People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183.

[5] It is next suggested that appellant is entitled to a new trial because, as appears by affidavits filed on the motion for new trial, the jury was allowed to separate after the cause had been submitted and before the rendition of their verdict. It appears that after the cause had been submitted to the jury, and while they were still deliberating, they were taken out to dinner; that they were taken from the courthouse to the hotel in automobiles; that the first automobile was insufficient in size to carry all the members of the jury; that thereupon 11 of the jurors, together with the deputy sheriff sworn to take charge of the jury, occupied the first automobile, and the remaining juror, together with the clerk of the court (also sworn as an additional officer to assist in conducting the jury to and from said hotel), occupied another automobile, making the same trip. The uncontradicted affidavits of the clerk and of the juror are to the effect that while being so conveyed the said juror was at all times in the presence of the clerk of the court; that the juror at no time conversed with any person on any subject connected with the cause. It thus appears that there was affirmative proof on behalf of the people explaining the separation of the jury and showing that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. This being the case, the separation of the jury under the circumstances is not a sufficient ground for demanding a new trial. People v. Cord, 157 Cal. 567, 571, 108 Pac. 511.

[6] Appellant complains of alleged misconduct of Deputy District Attorney Fricke in obtaining possession of a certain Smith & Wesson revolver (which was an exhibit in the case), without leave of court, and without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, and making certain experiments with ammunition. As a result of those experiments Fricke gave testimony different from that which he had given at a former trial of this case. Appellant further charges the district attorney with misconduct in making certain statements to the jury in the course of his argument. As to the conduct of Fricke in taking away the revolver for the purpose of experiment prior to giving his testimony at the second trial, its only effect would have relation to the weight to be accorded to his testimony.

[7] As to the second matter, it is well settled that if no assignment of error is made at the time when objectionable statements are made in argument, and no request is made that the court instruct the jury to disregard the language of the prosecutor, a reversal will not be had for such misconduct. People v. Warr, 22 Cal. App. 663, 136 Pac. 304.

[8] It is claimed also that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in that, during the trial, the deputy district attorney held improper conversations with members of the jury; and particularly that on one occasion, while the jurors were in the corridor of the courthouse, he said to one of the jurors:

"It is very funny. People tell us one thing outside, and get in here and tell us a different thing."

Affidavits in support of these charges were submitted on behalf of the defendant. These were directly denied by counter affidavits. Under such conflicting evidence, the decision of the trial court concerning the matter will not be disturbed on appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 897.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 30, 1920.)

Homicide ⊂⊃329—Defendant held to have had opportunity to prove decedent's quarrelsome character.

In a prosecution for manslaughter, self-defense being set up, where the district attorney let down the bar as to evidence of decedent's character, defendant cannot be heard to complain that he was not given full opportunity to present his defense by offering evidence as to the bad reputation of deceased, justifying defendant in thinking at the time of the quarrel between them that deceased was going to attack him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

John H. Smith was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Kenneth M. Green, of San Francisco, and Harold C. Daulker, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was prosecuted for murder, convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. Upon the trial the killing was admitted, but defendant attempted to justify it on the ground of self-defense. The only ground for reversal presented by defendant on appeal is that the court committed prejudicial error in excluding certain testimony relative to the bad reputation of decedent, his reputation of carrying a gun, and defendant's knowledge thereof. This evidence was offered by defendant for the purpose of showing the state of mind of defendant at the time he shot decedent, and that he was justified in believing that he was in imminent danger from a criminal assault by decedent.

Defendant shot and killed James Branum, following a brief altercation over the amount of money won by decedent in a card game which the two were playing. The evidence is that decedent met defendant and one Brooks, a mutual acquaintance, in a saloon and invited them to his house to play cards. Defendant had known decedent about three months. At the time of the shooting, defendant and decedent were playing and Brooks was watching the game. Defendant testified that the first difference occurred between himself and decedent, when he discovered the latter cheating in dealing the cards, but no quarrel ensued; that they later got into a dispute over the amount of money which decedent had won; that they became excited, and both together rose to their feet; that decedent started to reach with his left hand for the money in dispute (which was lying on the table in front of defendant); that with that hand he grabbed defendant, at the same time reaching for his right hip pocket with his right hand; that defendant thought decedent was going to shoot him or cut him with something, because he had heard he had that reputation, and he pulled a gun which he had in his right hip pocket and shot Branum twice. Decedent did not, in fact, have any weapon in his possession.

Brooks, who was watching the game, was the only eyewitness to the affair, other than defendant. He testified that the shooting occurred about three-quarters of an hour after they arrived at decedent's house; that before the quarrel arose as to the amount of the bet the three were perfectly friendly. His version of the affair was as follows:

"Branum bet $1.50 on the card game, and he won, and Smith said: 'You only bet 50 cents.' Smith said, 'I will pay you 50 cents.' Branum said, 'You pay me a dollar, or you owe me nothing.' Smith had $2 or $3 in front of him, and he said, 'If I owe you a dollar, take it;' and Branum reached over to get his dollar; and when Branum reached to get his dollar Smith got up and said, 'Give me my dollar; give me my dollar.' Then Branum said, 'Didn't I win?' And he said, 'Give me my dollar,' and then he shot him."

Brooks further testified that both decedent's hands were on the table when he reached for the dollar; that decedent made no threat, neither did he see decedent make any motion or reach into any pocket before the shot was fired, although he was sitting with the two men at the table, facing them and watching the game; that when the shot was fired decedent was reaching towards Smith as if to get his hand on defendant's gun.

Appellant's whole case is based upon the proposition that "in cases of homicide, where the plea of self-defense is interposed, and the evidence before the jury leaves it in doubt whether the deceased was the aggressor, or where the circumstances attending the homicide render it doubtful or equivocal whether the defendant was justified in believing himself in imminent danger at the hands of deceased," an exception is made to the general rule and evidence as to the bad reputation of the deceased is admissible. People v. Lamar, 148 Cal. 564, 83 Pac. 993. His complaint is that he was not given an opportunity to present this evidence in his defense. The record does not support this argument made in his behalf.

In his effort to justify the homicide, appellant testified that he thought decedent "was going to shoot me or cut me with something—he had that reputation—the men had around him." After this testimony was offered, appellant's counsel stated:

"He now testifies that he heard that Branum was a dangerous man. That goes to the crux of the whole matter, and if I can substantiate that by creditable witnesses, which I will try to do, but, if I can't prove it, his statement will go out as self-serving."

Then the same witness was asked:

"Why did you think, when he made a motion of that kind, that he was liable to draw a deadly weapon?"

To which he gave answer:

"Well, by hearing that man was a bad man, that he would do anything but the right thing. * * *"

The only "corroboration" offered by appellant was the testimony of Lieutenant Goff, of the police department, to the effect that he believed the decedent was "a fighter and scrapper," because he fought the officer in July, 1918, when he arrested him for either keeping or visiting a house of ill fame. No other corroboration of the testimony of appellant relative to the general reputation of decedent was attempted. This was not because of any objection on the part of the district attorney, but apparently because such testimony was not available. This is indicated by the remarks of appellant's counsel when offering in evidence the record of the conviction of decedent in 1912 for an entirely unrelated offense:

"Since Mr. Berry [deputy district attorney] has let down the bar, I may as well offer the record of James Branum."

The bar having been let down, appellant cannot now be heard to complain that he was not given a full and fair opportunity of presenting his defense. An examination of the entire record shows that he was fairly tried and convicted, and that no error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARCHIBALD v. ARCHIBALD. (Civ. 2752.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1920.)

Divorce ⊂=165(3)—Denying without prejudice does not require reopening case.

Where the court at the trial of a divorce action found that plaintiff's testimony was not corroborated, and denied the divorce, his statement that the decree would be without prejudice, and that, if plaintiff enlisted and thereafter brought in corroborating testimony, the court would hear him, does not establish an abuse of the court's discretion in refusing to set aside the decree entered for hearing further testimony under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Arthur E. Archibald against Elizabeth M. Archibald for divorce. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside a judgment refusing him a divorce, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this suit for the purpose of securing a divorce. Service of summons was had by publication thereof, and the default of the defendant was duly entered. The case came on for hearing and the plaintiff failed to produce sufficient evidence corroborating his testimony, and the court made findings and judgment denying the decree sought. Several months thereafter plaintiff appeared and moved to set aside the judgment under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground that, as stated in his notice of motion, "said judgment was taken against the plaintiff to his surprise." At the time of the hearing of this motion the plaintiff offered in evidence the deposition of a witness taken subsequently to the first hearing had in the case, which deposition contained sufficient testimony to afford corroboration of the facts testified to by the plaintiff.

The contention made by plaintiff's counsel at the hearing of the motion, and as expressed in the affidavit submitted, was that he had understood the trial judge at the hearing to say that he would allow the case to remain open for the introduction of further testimony. Upon the record presented we cannot conclude that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion. It appears that at the first hearing, after the plaintiff had introduced testimony on his part, the court called attention to the fact that corroborative evidence was lacking, and proceeded to announce what his findings would be, stating the terms of the same, and ending with the statement:

"From the foregoing findings the court concludes that plaintiff is not entitled to a decree of divorce. Let judgment be entered accordingly."

These declarations of the court were undoubtedly for the purpose of furnishing the reporter with the substance of findings to be prepared in the case, and in fact formal judgment was immediately entered denying a decree to the plaintiff. The statement of the court from which plaintiff's counsel derived his understanding that a continuance was to be allowed, appears in the record immediately following the point where the court dictated its findings, the statement being as follows:

"Now, I will say this to you: If the plaintiff enlists in either the Canadian or American army, and is able to make proper proof by testimony of persons other than the parties, in corroboration of the allegation of the plaintiff as to desertion, I will entertain his action, and this action will be without prejudice to the commencement of such case. If, as I say, he enlists and goes into the army. If he actually enlists, and shows that, and then if he can, by deposition or otherwise, prove his case, I will be glad to hear it and advance it."

At the hearing of the motion from the order denying which this appeal is taken, the judge explained his position, and further interpreted the language he had used at the former hearing in the following way:

"The court did not state that any other evidence could be taken in the cause which has been decided, but only if the man enlisted, this action will be without prejudice to the commencement of another one and the court will hear this other evidence in that case. That is all."

Quite plainly, on the record so made, no abuse of discretion is shown, and when that is said the function of this court on appeal ends.

The order is affirmed.

HAMILTON v. SAN FRANCISCO, N. & C. RY. et al. (Civ. 3444.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=901—Appellant must show error.

Appellant must show error in the action of the court in sustaining general demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend.

2. Railroads ⊂=344(5)—Pleading must allege special facts showing why high speed was negligent.

Where it is alleged that defendant's train was negligently operated at an excessive rate of speed, special facts must also be alleged to show why the high speed was negligent in the particular case.

3. Negligence ⊂=111(1)—Pleaded in general terms.

Negligence may be pleaded in general terms, without stating the facts constituting it.

4. Railroads ⊂=344(5)—Pleading held to raise issue of negligence on part of train crew.

In an action for death of plaintiff's wife, a passenger in a taxicab stalled on railroad's tracks, allegation that the train which struck the taxicab was negligently operated, so that those charged with its management did not see the taxicab, held sufficient to raise the issue of fact whether or not there was negligence on the part of the train crew.

5. Negligence ⊂=111(3)—Pleading must show cause of injury.

It must be alleged that the negligence averred was the cause of the injury of which complaint is made.

6. Railroads ⊂=344(7)—Pleading negligence causing injury held sufficient to support judgment.

Allegation of complaint that, by reason of accident due to negligence and carelessness of defendant railway and defendant taxicab operator, plaintiff's wife was struck by a train, etc., as against general demurrer, held to contain sufficient facts to support judgment for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by J. B. Hamilton against the San Francisco, Napa & Calistoga Railway and Eugene Petit, doing business under the name and style of the California Taxi Service. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hankins & Hankins and James A. Himmel, all of San Francisco (Peter L. O'Keefe, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

John T. York, of Napa, for respondent San Francisco N. & C. Ry.

L. G. Harrier, of Vallejo, for respondent Petit.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining, without leave to amend, a general demurrer to the second amended complaint for damages for the alleged negligence of the defendants as joint tort-feasors, which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's wife. The complaint was in two counts. On January 7, 1918, at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, Mrs. Hamilton was a passenger for hire in an automobile operated by the defendant Petit, doing business and sued herein as California Taxi Service. In taking her to her destination the machine was driven along a driveway which crossed the tracks of the electric railway operated by the other defendant. The rails of the track were some 6 inches above the roadway of the crossing. The automobile was driven onto the tracks, and, striking the raised rails, was stalled on the track. An electric train, running at the speed of about 35 miles an hour, struck the automobile and dragged it about 300 feet. The gasoline and oil in the machine were ignited, and Mrs. Hamilton was severely burned. She died as a result of her injuries. It was alleged that the automobile was negligently driven upon the track, that the track was maintained with the raised rails above the crossing in a negligent manner, and that the train was operated negligently, both in regard to its speed and in approaching the crossing without sounding any whistle or bell, as well as in such a manner that those charged with its operation kept no lookout for obstructions upon the track.

[1] Upon such an appeal this court is practically in the position of the trial court. While it is the rule that the appellant must show error, where a general demurrer has been sustained without leave to amend, the brief of the respondent in support of the ruling is really an argument intended to sustain the demurrer.

[2, 3] The brief of the respondent railway rests on certain propositions of law. It is contended that, because in the absence of a statute limiting the rate of speed of trains, rapidity of movement is not negligence as a matter of law. Larrabee v. Western Pacific, 173 Cal. 743, 161 Pac. 750. Where it is alleged that a train was negligently operated at an excessive rate of speed, special facts must also be alleged to show why the high speed was negligent in the particular case. It is alleged that the injuries to Mrs. Hamilton were caused by the negligently excessive speed, coupled with the other acts alleged to have been done. Negligence may be pleaded in "general terms, without stating the facts constituting such negligence." Stephenson v. Southern Pacific, 102 Cal. 147, 34 Pac. 619; Fisher v. Western Fuse Co., 12 Cal. App. 740, 108 Pac. 659, and cases therein cited.

The respondent next contends that the plaintiff's wife and the defendant Petit at the time of the collision were mere licensees in the use of the driveway, and that the railway company could be held liable only under a showing of wanton or willful injury, under the rule that a licensee takes subject to ordinary perils. Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206. There is nothing in the complaint from which it may be determined as a matter of law or of fact that the driveway was not a public highway, or that the plaintiff's wife was a mere licensee.

[4] It is further contended that the doctrine of last clear chance does not apply, because it is not alleged that the respondent's employés saw the automobile on the tracks. There is nothing in the complaint to indicate that the plaintiff relies on the doctrine in question. It is alleged that the train was negligently operated in such a manner that those charged with its management did not see the automobile. The issuable matter of fact was presented as to whether or not this allegation was true. If it should be shown on the trial, for instance, that the motorman had left his station at the front of the train for some purpose of his own, meanwhile permitting the train to run at a high rate of speed, without regard to the safety of any one on the track or in the train, the negligence of the act could not be doubted. There may be other facts which support a verdict based on negligence in the operation of the train at high speed without keeping such a lookout as ordinary prudence would suggest. Whether there was negligence in this respect or not can only be determined from the evidence. The allegation of negligence was sufficient to raise the issue of fact.

[5, 6] It is true it must be alleged that the negligence was the cause of the injury of which complaint is made. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29. In each count it is alleged that "by reason of the accident, due to the negligence and carelessness of the defendants herein as aforesaid, the said Isabella H. Hamilton was struck by said train," etc. As against general demurrer, this allegation contains sufficient facts to support a judgment. The demurrer should have been overruled. Schaake v. Eagle Can Co., 135 Cal. 472, 63 Pac. 1025; 67 Pac. 759; Groom v. Bangs, 153 Cal. 457, 96 Pac. 503; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308; Bergen v. Tulare Power Co., 173 Cal. 714, 161 Pac. 269.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

EDWARDS v. GUARANTY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 3209.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 30, 1920.)

1. Banks and banking ⇐140(1)—Refusal to cash check gives payee no cause of action against bank.

A bank occupies the position of debtor to its depositors, and a check drawn against an account is only a direction to pay the amount to the payee; no contractual relation with him or legal obligation to him being created by signing of the check, and a refusal to cash not giving him a cause of action.

2. Gifts ⇐18(1)—Transfer of personalty effective only on delivery.

Under Civ. Code, § 1147, a gift is a voluntary transfer, without consideration, of personal property, and becomes effective only on delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift.]

3. Banks and banking ⇐140(1)—Bank, which refuses to cash gift check, not liable to payee.

Where a check was drawn as a gift, and the payee presented it to the drawee bank the day before the drawer's death, and the drawee bank refused payment, it was not liable to the payee, who suffered no loss of "property" by its action in refusing to cash the check.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by W. S. Edwards against the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 190 Pac. 57.

F. A. Knight, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Lewis Cruickshank and Vincent B. Vaughan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. This appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant is taken on the judgment roll. The basis of the action was a check for $4,000, drawn on the defendant bank by one B. L. Liveson on February 28, 1917, payable to the plaintiff, and intended as a gift to him of the amount mentioned. On March 2, 1917, plaintiff deposited this check in his bank at Long Beach, and on the following day it was presented to the defendant bank for payment, which was refused. Liveson died on March 4, 1917, and the check was never honored by the bank.

The complaint, as originally framed, contained three counts: (1) Based upon the alleged refusal of defendant to pay the check without any cause or reason; (2) alleging that the defendant, for the purpose of defeating the gift and maliciously preventing the said B. L. Liveson from accomplishing his desire to give the money to plaintiff, and for the purpose of keeping the amount in the estate of Liveson in order that the defendant, as executor of his will, might receive larger fees for administering the estate, refused to pay the check, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $4,000; and (3) for money had and received from B. L. Liveson for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. The complaint also contains an allegation that the three causes of action arise out of the same transaction, and are connected with the same subject-matter. A demurrer was interposed to each cause of action set forth, and sustained as to the first two counts without leave to amend. Issue was joined on the third count, and, after trial, the facts were found in favor of the defendant, and judgment entered accordingly.

The sole contention of appellant is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second cause of action on the theory that, because the defendant maliciously prevented him from receiving the gift, plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of the attempted donation from the defendant as damages. In the case of Edwards v. Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, 190 Pac. 57, we held that, as the check involved in this controversy was not cashed prior to the death of Liveson, the attempted gift was not completed by delivery, and that therefore the payee could not recover the amount from the estate of the donor.

[1] A bank occupies the position of debtor to its depositors, and a check drawn against an account is only a direction to pay the amount thereof to the payee. No contractual relation with the payee, or legal obligation to him, is created by the signing of the check, and refusal to cash the check does not give rise to a cause of action in favor of the person to whom it is made payable. Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19.

[2] A gift is a voluntary transfer, without consideration, of personal property, and becomes effective only on delivery. Section 1147, Civ. Code. Until the purpose of the donor is carried into execution by a delivery of the subject of the gift, no interest vests in the donee. Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267. The mere privilege to be the recipient of a gift is common to all, and cannot be possessed or used to the exclusion of others; hence, it does not constitute property capable of ownership.

[3] Before the plaintiff can recover damages herein, he must allege and prove that the defendant has committed some unlawful act which has resulted in injury to the person or property of the plaintiff. The only allegation in the count under consideration is to the effect that defendant prevented plaintiff from becoming the beneficiary of Liveson's bounty; and it is thus made to appear that plaintiff suffered no loss of property by defendant's action in refusing to cash the check. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McCADDON et al. (Civ. 3223.)

1. Nuisance ⊂=84—Complaint under Red Light Abatement Act sufficient.

Complaint to abate nuisance under the Red Light Abatement Act, alleging that one defendant was the owner of certain hotel premises, that another defendant was in possession, and that divers acts of lewdness and prostitution had occurred and were occurring there, etc., held not vulnerable to the demurrer interposed.

2. Nuisance ⊂=65—Under Red Light Abatement Act, knowledge of owner is unnecessary.

A judgment for abatement under the Red Light Abatement Act, supported on findings that a nuisance, consisting of a place of assignation and prostitution, was conducted and maintained on the premises in question, regardless of the knowledge of the owner, is sufficient.

3. Jury ⟸14(12)—No right to trial by, in red light abatement action.

In an action for injunction to abate a nuisance under the Red Light Abatement Act, neither the Constitution nor the statute requires the submission of the issues to a jury; it not being error to deny a jury where the right was not granted at common law.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against Mrs. F. McCaddon and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

T. W. Duckworth, of San Bernardino, and M. O. Hert, of Colton, for the People.

THOMAS, J. This is an action brought to abate a nuisance under the Red Light Abatement Act (St. 1913, p. 20). It is alleged in the complaint that defendant Joseph Ingersoll was the owner, and the reputed owner, of the premises known and described as the Chambers Hotel, in the city and county of San Bernardino; that the defendant Mrs. F. McCaddon "was and now is" in possession of the said premises; that divers acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution "now occur and continuously since the 27th day of September, 1917, have occurred, and now are and during all of said times have been committed, in said building * * * by divers persons unknown to plaintiff"; that said premises were by the defendant Mrs. F. McCaddon used "for the purpose of lewdness, assignation and prostitution"; that the defendant Joseph Ingersoll had the means of knowing the alleged acts occurring and permitted in said building; and that the acts alleged constitute and are a nuisance, because whereof the said building—Chambers Hotel —"is a nuisance, being knowingly maintained as such." It further appears from the complaint that certain furniture and fixtures owned by the defendant Jane Doe Cassidy were, during all of the times mentioned therein, used by the defendant McCaddon in aiding and abetting said alleged nuisance.

Demurrers were interposed by the defendants Ingersoll and McCaddon, both of which were overruled. The defendant Ingersoll answered admitting that he was the owner of the building in question, but denying all other material allegations of the complaint. The other defendants did not answer. Defendant McCaddon claims error in the court's action in overruling her demurrer. The facts in reference thereto are as follows:

Mrs. McCaddon was served with summons and complaint on October 27, 1917, and filed her demurrer thereto on February 23, 1918, copy of which demurrer, however, was never served on plaintiff's counsel, the district attorney. The demurrer having been filed after the time allowed by law, and without leave of court, she was required by the court to argue her demurrer at the trial, which she refused to do, whereupon the court overruled the same and ordered that she answer the complaint forthwith, which action she likewise refused to take. The complaint was not vulnerable to the demurrer interposed. There was no error in any of the rulings referred to.

There was conflict in the evidence as to every material allegation with reference to the alleged nuisance, which conflict the court resolved in favor of the plaintiff; and, judgment being entered in favor of the plaintiff, defendants appeal therefrom.

Four points are urged by appellants for a reversal of the judgment: (1) Error of the court in overruling defendants' demurrers; (2) that the findings do not support the judgment, particularly as to the defendant Ingersoll; (3) that the court erred in denying defendants a jury trial; and (4) insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment.

We consider each point to be without merit.

[1] As to the first point urged, we think the complaint not vulnerable to the demurrers interposed; hence the rulings thereon were correct.

[2] Points 2 and 4 need no discussion. The fact that the court did not find that Ingersoll had knowledge, etc., that such nuisance was being conducted on his premises, we think is immaterial. A judgment supported on findings that such nuisance was conducted and maintained on the premises in question, regardless of the knowledge of the owner thereof, is sufficient. Such knowledge on the part of the owner, under the act, is unnecessary. People v. Barbiere, 33 Cal. App. 770, 166 Pac. 812; People v. Casa Co., 35 Cal. App. 194, 169 Pac. 454; People v. Bayside Land Co., 191 Pac. 994; People v. Smith, 191 Pac. 996.

[3] As to the third point, the rule is too well established to need discussion here. This being an action for an injunction, neither the Constitution nor the statute requires the submission of the issues to a jury. It is not error to deny a jury in any case where such right was not granted at common law. Cassidy v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 266, 28 Pac. 234; Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 843; People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 25 Pac. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75; Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 578, 35 Pac. 317; Santa Cruz Co. v. Bowie, 104 Cal. 286, 37 Pac. 934.

Judgment affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1920.)

1. Rape ⊂⊃35(2)—Prosecution must prove alleged force where age is not alleged.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to rape, where the district attorney elected to rely upon the charge of a forcible attack without alleging the age of prosecutrix, he must prove the element of force, though prosecutrix was under the age of consent.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃678(1)—Prosecutor must elect as to assault on which he relies.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to rape, where the evidence showed three separate acts by accused on the same day which would answer the charge in the indictment, it was error to refuse defendant's request to require the district attorney to elect the particular act upon which he would rely for conviction.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1168(2) — Failure to require election held prejudicial.

The failure to require the district attorney to elect the act on which he would rely for conviction was substantial error, depriving defendant of a fair trial, where the only instruction as to evidence of other offenses limited such evidence to proof of intent, and the jury were not even told that they must all agree upon one particular act before they could convict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Anastacio Ruiz was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order reversed.

W. T. Kendrick, Jr., and V. H. Kendrick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals from the judgment of imprisonment entered against him, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The information charged an attempt by force to commit the crime against a female person not the wife of the defendant. The evidence showed that the prosecutrix was a child of the age of 11 years, but as the district attorney elected to rely upon the charge of a forcible attempt, without alleging the age of the prosecutrix, the element of force was a material ingredient to be established by the evidence. Leaving out of consideration the substantial error which was committed to the defendant's prejudice in the course of the trial, it might be said that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction.

[2] The error to which we refer is illustrated by the fact that the district attorney was permitted to prove several distinct and separate acts of the defendant committed on the same day, either one of which might have been included within the charge made by the indictment. After the first alleged act was shown, defendant demanded that the district attorney select the particular act upon which he relied, which the district attorney did not do, and the court failed in its instructions to point out the particular act of the three shown as being the one at which the charge in the indictment was directed. The testimony of the prosecutrix was that she, at the invitation of defendant and with the consent of her father, accompanied defendant on a ride in his buggy; that her young brother also made one of the party; that defendant required the young brother to get out of the buggy, and drove some distance away; that he observed that the brother was looking after the buggy, and continued to drive for five or ten minutes, when he stopped, took the prosecutrix in his arms from the buggy, placed her upon the ground and unfastened her clothing; that the young brother then approached and announced that he was going to tell the father of the prosecutrix, upon which the defendant got up, took the prosecutrix with him and drove five or ten minutes further; that he then stopped and took the prosecutrix out of the buggy and placed her on the ground again. It was at this point in the narrative of the occurrences that the defendant objected to the proof of any further occurrences, and asked that the district attorney be required to elect as to which attempt he relied upon under the charge made. After some discussion, at the end of which the district attorney declined to make an election other than to say that he did not rely upon the particular occurrence then being shown and to insist that he had the right to prove all of the occurrences as part of the "res gestae," the prosecutrix was then allowed to proceed with her testimony, which was to the effect that substantially the same acts were repeated by the defendant as had been committed at the prior occurrence. The prosecutrix proceeded to testify that the two again got into the buggy and drove for another space of five or ten minutes, and that the defendant again took her out of the buggy and placed her upon the ground, lifting her clothing, which acts were all that she remembered that he performed upon this last occasion.

[3] The court gave only one instruction touching the matter of the proof of other acts than that intended to be charged, telling the jury that evidence of other assaults or efforts to have sexual intercourse on the part of the defendant and of improper familiarity was receivable to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant, etc., and as having a tendency to render it more probable "that the assault with intent to commit rape, charged and relied on in the information, was committed at the time and place charged * * * and for no other purpose." The several and distinct acts of the defendant were all committed on the same day and might each have referred to the charge contained in the indictment. The instruction of the court was valueless as indicating to the jury which particular attempt it was required to determine had been sufficiently made out. What is said in People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, is particularly applicable here. The court declares:

"Each of these acts was a separate offense, and the defendant could be tried for either, and separately for each of them. The jury were not even told that they must all agree that some specifically described act had been performed. A verdict of guilty could have been rendered under such an instruction, although no two jurors were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or at all, of the truth of the charge, as to any one of these separate offenses."

In People v. Castro, in the same reports and volume (133 Cal.) at page 11, 65 Pac. 13, the court was considering the matter of the requirement that prosecuting officers shall elect which of several acts they propose to rely upon, and said:

"And even conceding that the failure to make such election at that time did not constitute error because of the want of demand upon the part of the defendant to make the election, still, when the case went to the jury, the court, in some form, should have directed their minds to the particular act of intercourse which it was incumbent upon the state to establish by the evidence, before a verdict of guilty could be returned against the defendant."

There is nothing in the decision in the case of People v. Simon, 21 Cal. App. 88, 131 Pac. 102, which at all aids the case of the respondent here upon this point, for that was a case where the different acts were all a part of one main transaction which eventuated in the accomplishment of the single crime charged.

Other errors assigned by appellant do not call for extended discussion. It was sufficiently shown by the evidence that the acts alleged to have been committed were so committed in the county of Los Angeles, and it was fairly shown by the circumstances in evidence that, even though there was no express assertion to that effect given by any witness, the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. The error which we have first given attention to, however, was substantial; it must be said that because of it the defendant was deprived of a fair trial, and that its effect in this case is to produce a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are reversed.

CREAMERY PACKAGE MFG. CO. v. BENNETT. (Civ. 3459.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 28, 1920.)

1. Contracts ⟸198(1)—Items for cheese vats furnished for creamery held proper charges under contract.

Under a contract for the purchase of creamery machinery and its installation, with such new materials and apparatus as might be necessary to complete the plant, to be furnished on a cost plus 10 per cent. basis, special items sought to be recovered by the contractor on account of cheese vats invoiced at $210, and labor for installing them, held proper charges.

2. Contracts ⟸74—Defendant liable for machinery ordered for creamery, irrespective of ownership.

Defendant, who ordered machinery for a creamery from plaintiff, was liable for the price, irrespective of who actually owned the controlling interest in the creamery, whether defendant or others; consideration for a contract being valuable, whether it move to the other party bound or to a third party.

3. Contracts ⟸171(3) — Contractor entitled to sue for certain items in single action despite form of contract.

Where defendant ordered certain machinery for a creamery, specifying the items, with what new materials and apparatus might be necessary to complete the plant, though in the contract the signatures of the parties appeared before the contractor's offer to furnish such additional supplies, the contractor could sue for the price of the specified machinery and the additional items in one action, not being required to bring a separate suit for the additional items and the cost of labor in installing them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the Creamery Package Manufacturing Company against R. F. Bennett. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Adams, Adams & Binford, of Los Angeles, and Henry A. Jacobs and G. B. Blanckenburg, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him in an action for the agreed price of certain machinery and labor to install the same. The action is based upon a written contract which is set out in the complaint. This contract calls for goods to be shipped to Chowchilla Creamery, Chowchilla, Cal., at a price of $1,775. It also contains an agreement to pay—

"$6 per day and traveling, hotel and other reasonable expenses, for an expert machinist to superintend and to assist in the setting of said machinery," etc.

This contract is signed by plaintiff, by its agent, and by the defendant. The contract is in a form that opens like a book, and consists of two sheets, or four pages. The first two pages contain the stipulations above set out, and the agreement is signed upon printed lines for the signatures appearing about the middle of page 2. Upon the third page, which, as stated, is formed merely by folding over in book form a single sheet of paper upon which the first two pages appear, there is a specification of the articles ordered, together with the prices of each. These items appear in a column headed:

"Complete List of Articles Covered by Attached Contract; Catalogue Price List; Net Selling Price."

The total of the sums charged for the respective articles is $1,775, corresponding to the amount called for by the body of the contract. The items over which the dispute arises were furnished under the following paragraphs, which appear upon this third page directly under the enumeration of the articles purchased:

"The company will furnish an experienced ice machine and creamery erecting engineer to install the above machinery and to overhaul and rebuild the complete creamery equipment, using as much of the old equipment as is possible, at the rate of $6.00 (six dollars) per day with traveling and living expenses extra.

"The company will furnish such new materials and apparatus as are necessary to complete the plant and not specified above on the basis of cost plus 10% (ten per cent.).

"The company will furnish plans and specifications for the purchaser to work from in building cold storage room."

The defendant admits liability for $1,775, the agreed price of the specific machinery mentioned in the contract, together with the charge for labor in installing said machinery. The dispute is over additional items admittedly furnished by the plaintiff and installed upon the orders of Mr. Bennett, personally, or the manager of the Creamery Company, as a part of the equipment of the plant. Mr. Bennett was in touch with the entire time of the construction of the plant, and does not contend that he was not aware at all times of the items of material and labor which entered into the construction of the plant, or that he made any objection thereto.

[1] The special items with reference to which a modification of the judgment is urged are cheese vats, invoiced at $210, and labor for installing the same. The argument of appellant with reference to these items is that the defendant intended merely to contract to rebuild the plant in the same manner in which it had been equipped before the fire which destroyed it, that cheese vats were not a part of the equipment of the old plant, and that therefore Bennett never contemplated becoming liable for such items. The record does not show the exact amount that was charged for labor in installing these cheese vats, as the labor charges were made by the day, and no record was kept of the precise time consumed with each part of the work. However, it is our opinion that under the facts in evidence here, this item is a proper one under the omnibus clause above set out, under which the plaintiff agreed to furnish additional materials, and apparatus necessary to complete the plant on a basis of cost plus 10 per cent. There was no limitation restricting the items to such as had been in the plant previously. The exhibits used in the trial are not included in the record presented to us. From the testimony, however, concerning these exhibits, it appears that these special items were ordered by the defendant himself and the order was introduced in evidence in the trial court. The situation is the very simple one of an offer by the plaintiff, accepted by the defendant in placing his order.

[2] The question of whether the goods were for the Chowchilla Creamery Company, or for Mr. Bennett personally, is not material. The contract calls for goods to be delivered to the Chowchilla Creamery Company, for which Mr. Bennett agrees to pay. The offer to furnish additional items is made with reference to this contract; it is added upon the same paper therewith, and the orders were given by Mr. Bennett, personally, in many instances under this offer. It is quite immaterial under such circumstances whether Mr. Bennett desired these goods for himself personally, or for his friends or for strangers, and it is of no importance, therefore, who actually owned the controlling interest in the Chowchilla Company. The ruling of the court, therefore, refusing to admit evidence concerning these matters, was proper. A consideration for a contract is equally valuable, whether it move to the other party bound or to a third party.

The only other contention made by the appellant is that, although the defendant may have been liable for these additional items ordered and received by him upon an implied promise to pay, yet such liability arises from a new and different transaction than the one embraced in the written contract, because in the contract the signatures appear before this offer to furnish additional supplies, and the signatures conclude the contract; that therefore the matters appearing after the signature are no part of said contract. The precise point urged in relation to this is that the present suit is upon a written contract; that the transactions between the parties other than for the machinery at $1,775 and the price of labor for installing the same cannot be sued upon in this action, but a separate action must be brought to recover for such items.

[3] We cannot agree with the appellant in this contention. Defendant does not maintain that the contract admitted into evidence has been changed since he signed the same. It is clear that the entire writing was considered by the parties as one contract, and that they intended to append their signatures to the contract as an entirety. The third page is made a part of the document contained on the first and second page, by reference thereto in the words: "Complete list of articles covered by attached contract." The entire writing is upon but one sheet of paper, folded over to form the two pages. In so far as the contract merely contains an offer by the plaintiff to furnish certain items, it is to be construed in connection with the written orders given from time to time in acceptance of this offer, which, together with the document before us, constitute the written contract. These orders are not before us, but from the testimony appearing in the record they were before the trial court, and they were signed either by the defendant personally or by Mr. Prince, as manager of the Chowchilla Creamery.

The record shows that Mr. Bennett was personally aware of all materials that went into the plant, and was personally familiar with the work of reconstruction as it proceeded. He permitted the plaintiff to furnish the various articles upon orders signed by Mr. Prince without protest, and he cannot now deny the authority of the manager to attend to some of the minor details of the ordering for him. If, as appellant contends, there was no actual agency upon the part of the manager of the company to give orders for Mr. Bennett in connection with this contract, nevertheless, as to this plaintiff, there was an ostensible agency by which defendant is bound. The record contains the testimony of the agent of the plaintiff company that the defendant told him:

"Mr. Prince was the manager of the creamery company and that any changes that he suggested in restoring the plant to accede to his wishes."

He also testified that Mr. Prince was constantly at the plant of the creamery company and apparently in charge of the same and of the construction work.

There are no other matters argued by appellant which require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: BRITTAIN, J.

PEOPLE v. SILVA. (Cr. 526.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 28, 1920.)

1. Larceny ⇐55 — Circumstantial evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction.

Circumstantial evidence, which merely established defendant's opportunity to steal a purse, and the possibility, though not probability, of his placing it where it was found, held insufficient to sustain a conviction for grand larceny.

2. Criminal law ⇐562—Opportunity insufficient to convict, unless opportunity by others is excluded.

Evidence that defendant had an opportunity to commit the crime is insufficient to sustain a conviction, unless it also excludes the opportunity of any other person.

3. Criminal law ⇐1159(3)—On appeal conflicting evidence must be considered most favorably to verdict.

On review of verdict rendered, where the evidence was conflicting, the evidence must be considered most favorably in support of the verdict.

4. Criminal law ⇐552(2)—Circumstantial evidence must exclude innocence.

Circumstantial evidence to justify conviction for a crime must not only be consistent with the hypothesis that accused is guilty, but must also be inconsistent with the hypothesis that he is innocent.

5. Criminal law ⇐792(2) — Instructions on guilt of accomplice held not supported by evidence.

Where the evidence showed that another person besides defendant and prosecuting witness was present when a pocketbook was stolen, but had no tendency to establish joint action by defendant and such other person, it was error to instruct the jury in the language of Pen. Code, § 31, as to guilt as principals of persons present and aiding and abetting the commission of the offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Louis Silva was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Reversed.

S. Luke Howe and R. B. Hibbitt, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was by information charged with, and by the jury convicted of the crime of, grand larceny in the superior court of Sacramento county, and appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The specific charge stated in the information is that the defendant stole the sum of $480 from one John Glavich, in the city of Sacramento, on the 29th day of December, 1919.

[1] The principal point upon which the defendant relies for a reversal is that the evidence does not support the verdict, and in the outset it is just as well to announce our conclusion to be, after a careful examination and study of the evidence, that the contention of the defendant that there was not legal justification for his conviction is well taken. The consideration of this point will require rather an extended review herein of the evidence. In doing this we shall, except in a few instances, narratively state the facts as they were shown by the evidence.

One Lena Casella, a female, was, in the month of December, 1919, the owner of and conducted a lodging house at 1017½ Second street, in the city of Sacramento. On the 24th day of December of said year, said John Glavich, a resident of Sutter City, in Sutter county, went to Sacramento, and on that day hired a room in the lodging house of Mrs. Casella. Glavich, when he hired the room in said house, had in his possession approximately the sum of $600, in currency, which he carried in a leather wallet or purse in the hip pocket of his pantaloons. During the four or five days immediately preceding the 29th day of December, 1919, the time at which the defendant appeared upon the scene, Glavich had remained in his room almost constantly, and on all those days he and Mrs. Casella diverted themselves by drinking more or less intoxicating liquors; the latter furnishing the liquors and the former paying for the same. While to a greater or less extent Glavich was, during all this time, under the influence of intoxicants, he was at no time or on no occasion in such a condition of inebriety as to render him insensible to what was going on or what he did. Up to the time that the defendant had found his way to the Casella lodging house, Glavich had expended about $100 of the sum of which he was possessed when he first appeared at and secured lodgings in the Casella apartments.

On the 29th day of December, 1919, about the hour of 6 o'clock p. m., or a trifle later, the defendant, as already stated, went to the Casella lodging apartments. Here it is to be said that there is no testimony in the record, other than that of the defendant himself, showing the circumstances under which or the reason for which the defendant visited said lodging house on the occasion mentioned, and we must therefore rely solely upon his testimony for information as to those matters.

The defendant, whose home was in Sonoma county, was, at the time of the alleged larceny here complained of, and had been for some time previously, employed at the Sisters' Hospital, in the city of Sacramento. He testified that, on the day and at the hour above stated, he left said hospital for the purpose of calling on an acquaintance by the name of Jack Mosher, who, on a previous occasion, had told him that he (Mosher) was rooming at the Casella place, and who had invited the defendant to come to the said lodging house and pay him a visit. The defendant had never been in Mrs. Casella's apartments prior to the evening on which the alleged larceny was committed, and had never previously met Mrs. Casella. On arriving at the lodging house on the evening referred to, he entered the apartments, and met Mrs. Casella, and inquired for Mosher. Mrs. Casella informed him that, although Mosher had a room in her house, he was not at that time in his room or about the place. The defendant was then invited by Mrs. Casella to accompany her to her kitchen and there have a "drink" with her. He accepted, and, going in to the kitchen, he there met Glavich for the first time; the latter then being a stranger to him. The defendant remained at Casella's for some time, and with the landlady and Glavich had a number of drinks of intoxicating liquors.

We return now to the testimony presented by the people. Glavich testified that, just before the defendant appeared at the lodging house, he took the pocketbook containing his money from his pocket in the presence of Mrs. Casella. He further testified that he did not exhibit the pocketbook after the defendant went into the kitchen, nor at any time while the defendant was present did he take the purse from his pocket. He also stated that he did not know whether or not the defendant knew that he had any money on his person. The witness said that neither he nor Mrs. Casella or Silva left the room after Silva entered it. At some point of time between the hours of 8 and 10 o'clock, Glavich continued, he placed his hand in the pocket in which he had always carried the pocketbook, and then discovered that it was missing, and thereupon, addressing Mrs. Casella, asked her to return to him the pocketbook. She denied having it, or knowing anything of its whereabouts. He then asked the defendant if he had his money, to which the latter answered in the negative. He thereupon said to both Mrs. Casella and the defendant that he intended going after an officer for the purpose of having the defendant arrested, and, suiting his actions to his words, left the lodging house and soon returned with two police officers, who asked both Mrs. Casella and the defendant if either had the money of Glavich or knew where it was, and they replied that they neither had his money nor knew anything about it or its whereabouts.

The complaining witness was asked if he did not testify at the preliminary hearing of the charge that the last time he saw his pocketbook was about 5 o'clock of the day on which the defendant appeared at the lodging house, and he replied that, while he had no recollection of so testifying on the occasion named, he might have done so, and that if he did it was the truth, as (he continued) the circumstances occurring on the day he lost his purse were fresher in his mind when the preliminary hearing was held than they were at the time of the trial.

F. W. Cameron, one of the police officers to whom Glavich made the complaint of having been despoiled of his money, and who accompanied Glavich to the lodging house to investigate the complaint, testified in substance as follows: That he and another officer went to the lodging house to investigate the complaint made by Glavich, and found Mrs. Casella and the defendant in the kitchen. Glavich, he said, at that time accused Mrs. Casella of having taken his money. He did not then charge the defendant with taking the money, or of knowing anything about it. The officer asked both Mrs. Casella and the defendant if they or either of them had taken the money, and each strenuously denied having done so, or having any knowledge of where his money was. The two officers thereupon searched every room in the place, and then Officer Cameron, with a flashlight, went to the toilet, accompanied by the defendant, and "searched around" in there, but found no trace of the pocketbook or the money. The defendant remained outside, but near the toilet, while the officer was in there making the search; but, immediately upon the officer leaving the toilet, the defendant entered it, leaving the door open, so that the officer could see him or his form sufficiently to enable him (the officer) to observe his movements while in there. After the officer and Silva returned to the kitchen, the former asked Glavich if he thought Silva had his money, to which question Glavich replied, "I don't know." The officer then asked Silva if he had any objection to being searched, to which the defendant answered, "Why no; search me" and the officer thereupon searched the accused, but did not find the pocketbook or money. Immediately thereafter the officer returned to the toilet, and finally found the purse in the bowl, "underneath the water. I had to look pretty close to see it," continued the officer. "It started to go down, in the flow that flushes off, and the water was dark, you know, and I had quite a time to see it." The purse contained four $20 bills. The officer, after finding the purse, immediately returned to the kitchen and exhibited the wallet to Glavich, who readily identified it as the purse he had lost and which had contained his money. The defendant, when the purse was shown to Glavich by the officer, addressed the latter, saying:

"You went with me to the toilet; you know I didn't throw anything in there."

The officer testified that the condition of the light about the toilet was such that, although he stood near the toilet and the door leading into it was open when the defendant was in there, he could not "detect any of his [defendant's] actions." The foregoing facts are taken from the testimony in chief of the officer. On cross-examination, he testified:

"Q. Mr. Cameron, when you went back up there, the first thing this man did was to accuse the woman of taking his money? A. Yes. Q. Said she was the one that robbed him? A. That is right. Q. And then you went out—you searched the premises, and you did not find anything? A. No. Q. Searched the kitchen and searched the bedroom, I suppose? A. Yes. Q. Did not find any money? A. None; none at all. Q. And later on you searched the defendant, and you did not find any money on him? A. No. Q. Of course, Mrs. Casella was a woman? A. Yes. Q. And you did not make the thorough search of her that you did of the defendant? A. No. Q. And she might have had the money on, and you not find it? A. Oh, I suppose it could have been concealed about her person. Q. Yes. Well, in other words, being a woman, you did not make the careful search of her that you did of the defendant? A. As a matter of fact, we did not search her. Q. Did not search her? A. No. Q. All right. Now, when you went back to the toilet with Mr. — Oh, by the way, the water in the bowl was muddy, was it not? A. Yes; it was slightly muddy, but the—but not more than that the bowl or that the porcelain bowl was discolored, was all dirty; it was hard to see. Q. It was difficult to see, because of the dirty bowl and the fact of the muddy water? A. The water, and the bowl— Q. (interrupting). The water and the bowl were somewhat the color of this, were they not (referring to the pocketbook in evidence)? A. Yes; something like that. Q. Yes. Now, you went with Mr. ———, the defendant, to the toilet? A. Yes. Q. When you found it, as I understand you to say in your testimony, that you had to look pretty close to find it, when you went back there? A. Yes. Q. You had to look pretty close into the bowl, and the flash of your light down there, before you found it? A. Yes. Q. Now, it was in the pipe part; that is, that leads from the bowl, was it not? A. Yes; Q. Covered by the water? A. It had started to go down. Q. Started to go down, covered by the water? A. Yes. Q. And you couldn't—by just flashing your light around casually, you couldn't see it, but you had to look very carefully? A. Yes; I got the light right down into it. Q. Now, when you went into the toilet first, Mr. Cameron, the defendant, was right there with you? A. Yes; he stood at the door. Q. And you simply went, by reason of the fact that he was standing there, and hurriedly looked around; you did not make as careful a search of the bowl at that time as you did later, when you found it? A. No; I didn't. Q. Yes. Now, when you found it, it had the appearance of having been flushed that far, did it not, as though the cord had been pulled; and the pocketbook had been forced down into the pipe? A. Yes. Q. And did you hear this defendant flush the toilet while he was in there? A. No; no; I didn't. Q. He did not flush the toilet? A. No. Q. For all you know, the pocketbook might have been in the water when you first examined the toilet? A. Well, it might have been. Q. All right. The defendant never at any time—I mean the complaining witness never at any time accused the defendant of taking his money? A. No; he didn't."

Recross-examination:

"Q. You did not see Mr. Silva at any time lean over while he was in the toilet, as though he was pushing anything down in the toilet? A. No. Q. He stood up all the time, didn't he? A. Yes; he stood up."

It was stipulated that the transcript of the testimony presented before the committing magistrate at the preliminary examination of the charge showed that at said hearing Glavich testified that the last time he saw his purse on the 29th day of December was about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and that he did so testify at that time. The defendant, testifying for himself, denied having taken Glavich's purse or money or both. He stated that in the time intervening between the departure of Glavich from the lodging house and his return with the officers, Mrs. Casella left the kitchen and went to some other part of the lodging house, returning, however, before Glavich returned. There is no contradiction of this latter statement.

There has now been given herein an epitomized, but a full and fair, statement of all the testimony which was presented to the jury in the case. No important fact or circumstance has been omitted therefrom, and from that statement it will readily be observed that there are but two circumstances from which any possible theory may be deduced that the defendant took the purse from Glavich, to wit: (1) The opportunity incident to his presence in the room with Glavich for some hours; (2) the visit by the accused to the toilet under the circumstances above indicated. Indeed, the testimony really furnishes but one consideration by which the verdict can be upheld, and that is the fact that there was available to him, the accused, some opportunity to commit the crime by reason of the fact that he was with Glavich in the room for several hours. As to the circumstance of opportunity, though, it is plain from the evidence that Mrs. Casella's opportunity for taking the money was infinitely superior to that of the accused. As against her, the evidence, it will be noted, shows these circumstances: That Glavich had been with her almost all the time for a period of five days; that he roomed at her house, drank with her, and paid for the drinks; that she had seen his pocketbook in his hand, and had seen him take some money therefrom. She, in short, knew that he was fairly well supplied with money.

Now, with respect to the circumstance of the defendant's visit to the toilet, in the absence of which circumstance it is probable he never would have been charged with the crime, these facts appear, having been testified to by the police officer: That the latter went to the toilet accompanied by Silva; that the officer first entered the toilet and made a superficial examination thereof, merely casting his eyes into the bowl; that it contained water having a muddy or murky appearance—of a color, indeed, similar to that of the missing pocketbook; that thereafter the defendant entered the toilet, the door thereof remaining open while he was in there, and the officer at the same time standing near the door, in a position from which he observed the form of the accused; that the latter did not, while in the toilet, stoop or pull the cord that would flush the bowl; that, in fact, the defendant did not flush the bowl; that he (the officer) subsequently returned to the toilet, and made a more thorough examination of the bowl, and therein, by the aid of his flashlight, and placing his hand in the bowl, found the purse underneath the water, and in the pipe at the joint where the pipe was connected with the bowl, said pipe serving as a conduit for carrying into a cesspool anything flushed into it from the bowl. The officer stated, as will be observed, that he looked "more closely" into the bowl the second time he was in the toilet than he did the first time he was in there. He further stated it as his opinion that the bowl must have been flushed to have put the purse in the position in the pipe in which he found it.

It seems very clear to our minds that the most that can reasonably be said of the testimony thus reviewed is that it is sufficient only to generate a mere suspicion that the defendant might have committed the crime of which he was convicted. There is no testimony that any one saw the defendant near enough to Glavich to enable him to have abstracted the purse from the pocket of the complaining witness. Indeed, there is no testimony that the defendant knew that Glavich had a considerable sum of money on his person, or that he had any money at all, or, if he did have money, where on his person he carried it. Moreover, when Glavich left the lodging house for the avowed purpose of securing an officer and having the matter of the loss of his money investigated by the officer, the defendant remained in the lodging house until Glavich returned with the officers, and in no manner acted like a man who had committed a wrong or a crime. Furthermore, it is a fact of some significance that Glavich, upon returning to the lodging house with the officers, accused Mrs. Casella of taking the purse and the money, but made no such accusation in the presence of the officers against the defendant; and parenthetically we may suggest that Glavich, knowing all the circumstances, occurrences and situations connected with the presence of himself, Mrs. Casella and the defendant in the kitchen preceding the time he missed his purse, his opinion then as to who took his money constituted a circumstance of no little force.

But, however that may be, it is to be noted that the strongest circumstance against the defendant is the finding of the purse in the bowl of the toilet after he had been there; but that circumstance loses much, if not all, of its force as applied to the defendant when these facts are considered: (1) That the officer did not make a very thorough search when first he went into the toilet; (2) that the water in the bowl was of a dark or murky appearance—in fact, the color of the purse, the officer said—and it is very plain that the purse could not have been seen by a mere glance into the bowl, even if it were floating upon the surface of the water, and much less readily could that have been done with the purse underneath the water and partly in the pipe; (3) that the defendant, according to the positive testimony of the officer, neither flushed the bowl while in the toilet nor stooped, which would have been a necessary movement, and indeed the only way, other than by flushing the bowl, that he could have placed the purse in the position in which it was found by the officer.

But, as above stated, the whole case against the accused rests upon the mere fact that he had a possible opportunity for committing the crime—not, however, even the opportunity that was available to Mrs. Casella.

[2] In People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 63, 46 Pac. 896, 897, the Supreme Court, after recounting certain circumstances which were proved, and which it was maintained by the people were of an incriminatory character of such force as to support the verdict, had this to say:

"If the evidence had stopped there, it is clear that there could have been no conviction; for the opportunity to commit an offense can have no weight, apart from other circumstances, unless it excludes all reasonable opportunity for its commission by another, and standing alone, is insufficient to sustain the conviction."

See, also, State v. Suitor, 43 Mont. 31, 114 Pac. 112, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 230.

[3] In considering the evidence, we have not been unmindful of the rule that, in all cases, the evidence, even though conflicting, must be considered and resolved favorably to the finding of the jury. Here, however, there is no conflict in the evidence, and, as stated, it tends only, so far as the accused is concerned, to show that there was available to him a possible opportunity for committing the crime.

[4] Where, as is certainly true here, all the circumstances proved, taken together, are as compatible with innocence as with guilt, a situation sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt arises. U. S. v. Hart (D. C.) 78 Fed. 868.

"In order to sustain a conviction on circumstantial evidence, all of the circumstances proved must not only be consistent with each other, but consistent with the hypothesis that the accused is guilty, and at the same time inconsistent with the hypothesis that he is innocent, and with every other rational hypothesis except that of guilt." 16 Corpus Juris, p. 763; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 421, 431, 24 Pac. 1006; People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 335, 341, 38 Pac. 945.

Of course, that rule has application to those facts only which are essential to a conviction, but in this case the facts or circumstances relied upon for a conviction and upon which, indeed, the verdict must rest, if it may stand at all, are not, as we have pointed out, incompatible with the hypothesis of the innocence of the accused.

Our conclusion is, as is manifest from the foregoing discussion, that the evidence upon its face is wholly insufficient to sustain the verdict. No man's liberty should be taken from him upon such a showing. It certainly cannot be said with justness that the evidence is such in probative power or persuasive force as to produce in any fair-minded person, who has not been confused by or has not misapprehended and misapplied the law as it was stated to the jury by the court, an "abiding conviction, to a moral certainty," of the truth of the charge as against the defendant.

[5] The complaint is made that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant by giving to the jury the following instruction:

"All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be a felony or misdemeanor, or whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense or aid and abet in its commission, or not being present have advised and encouraged its commission, are principals in the crime so committed."

The instruction is in the language of section 31 of the Penal Code, and of course states the law correctly; but we do not think that it should have been read to the jury under the circumstances of this case. The necessary implication from the instruction, in the light of the situation as it was developed by the evidence, was that there was evidence tending to show that the taking of the purse and money of Glavich was the result of the joint acts of Mrs. Casella and the defendant. Save and except the bare fact that the defendant had been present in the kitchen with Mrs. Casella and Glavich, there is absolutely no evidence tending in the slightest degree to establish a confederation between Mrs. Casella and the defendant for the purpose of stealing the money of Glavich, and that fact alone could not justly be made the predicate for such a theory as the instruction exemplifies; and we doubt not that the instruction influenced the jury to a very great extent in reaching the conclusion evidenced by their verdict. We may add that Mrs. Casella was not a witness in this case, nor is there anything in the record indicating whether she was arrested on the charge or what became of her.

But, be that as it may, as has been declared, the verdict, in our opinion, does not derive sufficient support from the evidence, and the judgment is, therefore, reversed.

LEWIS v. REED. (Civ. 3292.)

1. Insurance ⟸587—No change of beneficiary without required written assent of officer.

Beneficiary of life policy providing against any term or condition being varied, except by written agreement of president or secretary, cannot be changed by mere notice to change, at least where it does not appear that insurer had sufficient time after notice and unreasonably neglected to take the requisite action thereon.

2. Insurance ⟸207(2) — Condition of policy making it void, if assigned, waived by insurer paying insurance.

Condition of a life policy, that if it be assigned it shall be void, is waived by insurer, though refusing to pay to the assignee, paying the insurance to insured's administrator.

3. Insurance ⟸203 — Life policy can under statute be assigned, notwithstanding provision of policy.

Civ. Code, § 2764, declaring that life policy may pass by transfer, impresses a rule of public policy on that class of contracts, so that an assignment is valid, notwithstanding contrary provision of policy.

4. Witnesses ⟸133—Testimony of assignee of life policy, suing insured's administrator for the insurance, held competent.

The assignee of a life policy, suing insured's administrator, to whom insurer paid the insurance, as for money received into his hands without lawful right, and for which he should account to plaintiff, was entitled to show by his testimony all that he did under his contract with deceased, making payments to deceased, assuming obligations, and paying premiums, in order to sustain his assignment as valid and on sufficient consideration; it not being a case of seeking to enforce a claim against the estate, but to recover money not belonging to the estate and in which it had no interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Paul P. Lewis against Edwin Reed individually and as administrator. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. M. Gordon, of San Diego, for appellant.

Hamilton & Lindley, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment entered in favor of defendant—respondent.

Respondent's intestate (one Smith) during his lifetime became the owner and possessed of three certain policies issued by a life insurance company. By the terms of these policies the insurer agreed to make certain endowment payments in the event the insured lived to a certain age, and, in the event of his death, contracted to pay a certain fixed sum of money. The aggregate amount payable under the three policies as a death claim is the sum of $790. The insured being in poor health, and the plaintiff being his friend and being willing to assist the former, who was without funds, in securing medical attention and in the discharge of other needful obligations, the insured delivered the policies to plaintiff and executed a note to the insuring company, directing that the plaintiff be named as the beneficiary under the policies, and later executed what we construed to be an assignment of death benefits under the insurance to the plaintiff. The notice to change beneficiaries was deposited with the local agent of the insurer, but at the home office no action was taken to make the substitution in the interest of the plaintiff. It does not appear as to how long prior to the death of the insured the notice to change beneficiaries was deposited as mentioned, and it does not appear that any notice was given of the written assignment made by the insured to the insurer. The insurer died in August, 1919, leaving no heirs. The insuring company refused to pay the amount of the policies to the plaintiff, but did pay the full amount thereof to the defendant, who had been appointed administrator of Smith's estate. The trial court determined that the substitution of the plaintiff as beneficiary under the policies had not been made, because the same had not been consented to by the insurer, and that the interest of the insured had not passed by assignment to the plaintiff.

[1] Upon the evidence which the record before us discloses, we agree that the first finding made by the court, to wit, that the action taken by the insured in attempting to have substituted the plaintiff as his beneficiary was not effectual. Our conclusion, however, based upon the evidence, is that the assignment as made was effectual, and that all of the death benefits passed to the plaintiff, notwithstanding that the insurer had no notice of such assignment until after the death of Smith. Each of the policies contained a term providing that no conditions or terms of the policy should be varied, "except by written agreement signed by the president or secretary of the company." Accompanying this condition was the further term that superintendents, their deputies, and assistants should have no power to "make, alter, or discharge contracts." To permit a substitution of an individual in lieu of the executors or administrators of an insured's estate certainly would work a material change in the contract, and one which, under the terms of the policy, required the assent of the insurer in the manner prescribed before becoming effectual.

"The provisions of a life policy as to the manner of changing the beneficiary must be complied with, at least, substantially so, for in such case the change can be made effective only by following the policy provisions and by conforming to the manner or mode specified in the contract. So where a policy of life insurance provides that a change of beneficiary shall be made by indorsement in writing and shall not take effect until indorsed on the policy by the home office, no act of the insured can effect such a change in the absence of such indorsement." Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.) vol. 2, § 740a, and cases cited by the author.

This is not a case, as shown by the record, where, after notice to change a beneficiary has been given in sufficient form, the insurer neglects unreasonably to take the requisite action upon the request. It cannot be told from the record before us as to when the notice to change the beneficiary was deposited with the local agent; hence it may well have been that sufficient time had not elapsed within which to transmit such notice to the home office and obtain the necessary indorsement by the required officials before the death of the insured occurred. The trial judge was correct in holding that the attempted change of beneficiary was without effect in accomplishing that result.

[2, 3] Now, as to the matter of the assignment made: Two of the policies contained this term:

"If this policy be assigned or otherwise parted with, * * * or if any premium shall not be paid when due, this policy shall be void."

The third policy, in its terms relating to the assignment thereof, contained the following condition:

"Any assignment or pledge of this policy, or of any of the benefits thereunder, shall be void and of no effect."

Looking first to the term quoted as contained in policies which we shall call Nos. 1 and 2 for convenience (the provision being the same in each), it is noted that the penalty provided for assignment is that the policy shall be void—in other words, that all rights of the insured or the beneficiaries thereunder shall lapse. There are two answers to be made to the contention that by reason of this condition in the policy the plaintiff acquired no right to the money collected thereunder:

The first answer is that the company waived that condition by not insisting upon the penalty; the money was paid and the insurer thereby affirmed the contract as one which still retained its binding force as to it. The second answer, and the one which applies with conclusive force to the third policy as well, is that under the statute of this state the right is preserved to the insured to assign his policy of insurance, and that right cannot be taken away by a term of the contract which attempts so to do. Generally speaking, it may be stated as a well-recognized rule that a person may waive the conditions of a statute designed solely to secure to him a personal privilege where no question of public policy enters into consideration.

Section 2764, Civil Code, provides that—

"A policy of insurance upon life or health may pass by transfer, will, or succession to any person, whether he has an insurable interest or not, and such person may recover upon it whatever the insured might have recovered."

The section following provides that no notice of transfer is necessary to preserve the validity of a policy upon life or health, unless expressly required thereby. No one of the policies here considered contained any requirement that notice should be given of assignment of it. The question as to whether an insured under a life policy, which was made payable in case of death to his estate, could legally assign his interest, and especially to one not having an insurable interest in his life, has been the subject of some debate. Irrespective of statutory conditions, however, it has latterly become well settled that such an assignment may be made. In Grigsby v. Russell et al., 222 U. S. 149, 32 Sup. Ct. 58, 56 L. Ed. 133, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 642, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 863 (a case similar to this one in a part of its facts), the Supreme Court of the United States, by Justice Holmes, said:

"So far as reasonable safety permits, it is desirable to give to life policies the ordinary characteristics of property. * * * To deny the right to sell except to persons having such an interest is to diminish appreciably the value of the contract in the owner's hands."

It would seem that the statute of this state was designedly adopted to set at rest any question as to the assignability of a life insurance policy and also to affirm the right to make such assignment to a person having no insurable interest in the life of the insured. We think that by the statute a rule of public policy is impressed upon the character of contracts treated of, and that allowing terms of an insurance contract to contradict the right so given may not be permitted.

"Statutes are often passed to protect persons against the effects of certain types of contract. The purpose of such statutes would be defeated if their effect could be avoided by contract; and accordingly it is held that if such is the legislative intent, covenants attempting to avoid the provisions of such statutes are void." Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 355.

The last-named author, in the paragraph cited, has enumerated many cases illustrating his text and cites the cases in his footnote. See, also, Griffith v. Life Insurance Co., 101 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 113, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96, and, as to assignability under the statute, Gilman v. Curtis, 66 Cal. 116, 4 Pac. 1091; McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 183 Pac. 373.

[4] From the evidence presented to the trial judge it appears that it was the intention of the insured that plaintiff, under his assignment, should collect and have the full amounts mentioned in the policies in the event of the insured's death. Plaintiff testified as to payments made by him pursuant to his agreement and as to obligations assumed, also as to payment of premiums on the policies. Portions of this testimony were stricken out by the court. The ruling of the court in this regard was erroneous. Plaintiff was entitled to show all that he did under the contract in order to sustain his assignment as valid and upon sufficient consideration. The case presented was not one where the plaintiff was seeking to enforce a claim against the estate of Smith, but rather to recover money which did not belong to the estate and in which the estate had no interest. As declared by the complaint, defendant Reed received into his possession the money without lawful right, and should account to the plaintiff therefor.

The judgment is reversed.

WISNOM v. McCARTHY et al. (Civ. 3088.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 28, 1920.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊂=60(1) — Courts may dismiss for failure to prosecute diligently.

It is an inherent right of courts to dismiss a suit for failure to prosecute it with due diligence.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊂=63—Dismissal as to a defendant for failure to prosecute diligently held proper.

Dismissal of suit by a domestic engaged by a doctor and his wife as to the doctor for plaintiff domestic's failure to prosecute it against him with due diligence, when he might have been easily found in his office at all times, held not an abuse of the trial court's discretion.

3. Husband and wife ⊂=19(4)—Husband liable for expenses of household prior to and after desertion of wife.

Where services rendered a doctor and his wife were necessaries of life for persons in their economic and social position, and such services were partly rendered while they were living togther, and partly after the doctor had deserted his wife without cause, and was not furnishing such necessaries for her, the doctor was liable for such services as expenses of the household.

4. Husband and wife ⊂=151(5)—Wife liable for necessaries furnished while she and husband were living together.

Under Civ. Code, § 171, wife of doctor who deserted her held liable for at least the price of necessaries of life, including a domestic's services, furnished while husband and wife were living together.

5. Husband and wife ⊂=238(6) — Judgment against married woman for necessaries must be measured by statute.

The liability of a married woman, under Civ. Code, § 171, for necessaries furnished the household while she was living with her husband, being measured and fixed by the statute, it must necessarily be so measured and fixed by any judgment against her.

6. Husband and wife ⊂=239 — Dismissal of servant's action for wages as to husband did not affect wife's obligation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 414, dismissal as to defendant husband of a domestic servant's action for wages against husband and wife, she having worked for the couple prior to and after their separation, did not affect the obligation of the wife, under Civ. Code, § 171, to pay for necessaries furnished herself and husband while living together, she and her husband being jointly liable, so that the servant might have sued either, or, having sued both, might dismiss as to either.

7. Husband and wife ⊂=232(3) — Evidence held to show personal contract of employment of servant by wife.

Evidence held to show a personal contract on the part of defendant wife to pay a domestic servant in the household her wages after the separation of husband and wife, and a liability on the wife irrespective of the limited one possible under Civ. Code, § 171.

8. Limitation of actions ⊂=148(6)—Document signed by defendant wife in servant's action for wages admissible as statement of account.

In an action against husband and wife for wages due a domestic servant, the wife being jointly liable for the debt, incurred partly before and partly after separation from her husband, claimed account stated, prepared by plaintiff servant at the wife's direction and signed by the wife, held admissible against her as a statement of account, taking the claim out of the operation of the statute of limitation.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County, George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Minnie Wisnom against M. McCarthy, also known as Mrs. C. F. McCarthy, and Charles F. McCarthy, her husband.

From an order sustaining the demurrer of defendant Mrs. McCarthy to certain causes of action, and from an order granting her motion for nonsuit, and from an order of dismissal as to defendant husband, plaintiff appeals. Order of dismissal as to defendant husband affirmed, judgment as to defendant Mrs. McCarthy reversed, and order granting nonsuit as to her vacated, with instructions to permit her to state whatever defense she may have.

Wm. T. Eckhoff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Mrs. M. McCarthy, in pro. per.

Archer Kincaid, of Redwood City, for respondent Charles F. McCarthy.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining the demurrer of the defendant Mrs. C. F. McCarthy to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth causes of action set up in the second amended complaint, and from an order granting her motion for a nonsuit, and from an order of dismissal as to the defendant C. F. McCarthy, her husband.

The action was one to recover for domestic services rendered in the household of the defendants. The first count alleges that the defendants were, at all times mentioned therein, husband and wife; that the plaintiff performed work and labor for them in their household at the special instance and request of said defendants, and each of them, from March 1, 1910, to November 30, 1915, at an agreed rate of $35 per month; that the services were necessaries of life to persons in the situation of the defendants; that, thereafter, on January 26, 1916, plaintiff and defendants, desiring to state an account of their aforesaid transactions, agreed that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,135, and that an account showing such indebtedness was signed and delivered by defendant Mrs. McCarthy as her own act and as agent for her husband.

The second count states generally the same matters with reference to the defendants' employment of the plaintiff, and asks for $560, balance due for the reasonable value of services from May 1, 1914, to November 31, 1916. The general demurrer of Mrs. McCarthy was sustained as to this count.

The third count is for the agreed price of the services set out in the second count, and for the same amount—the only difference between the two counts being that one is for reasonable value and the other for the agreed price. The demurrer of defendant Mrs. McCarthy to this count was upon the ground that the cause was barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer was sustained.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth counts were based upon the same services, rendered from March 1, 1910, to July 31, 1914, recovery was sought under the theory of reasonable value and the theory of agreed price. The account stated was pleaded to avoid the bar of the statute. At the close of plaintiff's evidence upon the motion of defendant Mrs. McCarthy, a nonsuit was granted against the plaintiff as to the counts which had not been stricken out upon demurrer.

[1, 2] Before considering the correctness of this ruling upon the motion for nonsuit, we shall first dispose of the appellant's objection that the motion of the defendant Dr. C. F. McCarthy to dismiss the action as to him was improperly granted. Said defendant filed his said motion on the ground of lack of diligence and long and unnecessary delay in serving summons upon him, and because of laches, lack of diligence, and want of prosecution. In support of this motion he filed his affidavit, which stands uncontradicted in the record, to the effect that the action was commenced on August 24, 1916, and summons duly issued on said date; that summons was served upon defendant Mrs. McCarthy, who appeared and answered, and said action was set for trial and the trial was continued from time to time, and thereafter, on January 22, 1919, the action was tried and submitted to the court for consideration and decision; that summons in said action was never served upon defendant C. F. McCarthy until January 31, 1919; that the said C. F. McCarthy has been for many years a practicing physician, as was well known to plaintiff, and has been practicing his profession since March 23, 1916, in the Shreve building in the city and county of San Francisco, all of which facts were well known to plaintiff; that his name and office hours at all times appeared conspicuously on his office door; that affiant has been constantly in attendance at his said office on each day from 2 to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, except for a period of about seven days during the summer of 1918, and at all of said times could have been found at his said office and could have been served with summons; that his name and address at all said times appeared in the telephone directory, and that plaintiff and her attorney at all times have known his address, and that he could have been served with summons during his office hours on any day, except Sunday, during all of said time; that no effort was made to serve him with summons until after the trial, and that plaintiff has been guilty of inexcusable and unnecessary delay in serving said summons, and neither plaintiff nor her attorney has exercised reasonable diligence. There is no attempt made by plaintiff to controvert these allegations in the affidavit of C. F. McCarthy upon the motion to dismiss as to him. It is an inherent right of the courts to dismiss a suit for failure to prosecute it with due diligence. 9 R. C. L. 206; Witter v. Phelps, 163 Cal. 655, 126 Pac. 593. Under the uncontradicted facts, it would appear that the court has not abused its discretion in the present instance. Such action by the trial court under similar circumstances has been repeatedly upheld upon appeal. Grigsby v. Napa County, 36 Cal. 585, 95 Am. Dec. 213; Eldridge v. Kay, 45 Cal. 49; Lander v. Flemming, 47 Cal. 614; Linden Gravel Mining Co. v. Sheplar, 53 Cal. 245; Kreiss v. Hotaling, 99 Cal. 383, 33 Pac. 1125; Stanley v. Gillen, 119 Cal. 176, 51 Pac. 183.

[3] We shall revert now to the correctness of the ruling upon the motion for nonsuit, made by the other defendant, Mrs. McCarthy. After her demurrer to the first count had been overruled she filed an answer, denying that an account had ever been stated by her, either for herself or as agent for the defendant C. F. McCarthy; also setting up the defense of another action pending in San Mateo county, and that the present action was barred by the statute of limitations. The plaintiff pleaded and proved that the services were necessaries of life for persons in the economic and social position of the defendants; that they were partly rendered while the husband and wife were living together, and partly after he had deserted her without cause and was not furnishing such necessaries for her. Under such facts the husband would be liable for the expenses of his household. Title Ins. Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 492, 493, 111 Pac. 360.

[4] Also the wife would be liable for at least the price of the necessities thus furnished while the husband and wife were living together under the provisions of section 171, Civil Code. The scope and operation of this section has been carefully and thoroughly considered in the case of Evans v. Noonan, 20 Cal. App. 288, 128 Pac. 794. In that case the action was brought to recover for medical services furnished to the children of the defendants, who were husband and wife, and, upon appeal from the judgment, the liability of the wife was considered under section 171. Facts were stipulated in that case which are analogous to the facts in the present case. There the defendants were husband and wife, living together at the time of the rendition of the services. The medical services were necessaries for the minor children of defendants. They were furnished at the request of the husband and not at the request of the wife. The court held, in discussing section 171, Civil Code (20 Cal. App. at page 294, 128 Pac. 796):

"But whatever might have been the legislative motive prompting the enactment of the amendment, it is plainly manifest that the intention was thus to make the wife jointly liable with her husband for the payment of debts contracted by either or both for necessaries furnished to either or both while they are living together, restricting, however, the wife's liability by limiting the right to take her separate property in execution of a judgment for a debt so contracted to such of her separate property only as she may have acquired after marriage otherwise than by devise or succession. That the liability imposed upon the wife by the amendment was intended to be for debts which might be contracted by the husband alone for necessaries furnished to herself or her husband, or both, while they are living together, seems clear, not only from the language itself of the amendment, but also from the fact that the section before amended expressly foreclosed any right to take any of her separate property for the extinguishment of her husband's debts. The purpose of the amendment, in other words, seems to have been to authorize the doing of a certain thing to a limited extent which was theretofore altogether expressly forbidden."

[5] It is, of course, true that as the liability of a married woman, under section 171, Civil Code, is measured and fixed by the statute, it must necessarily be so measured and fixed by any judgment against her. Evans v. Noonan, supra, 20 Cal. App. 297, 128 Pac. 794. The procedure to be followed is discussed in said last-mentioned case, and it is said that, in any case where it is claimed that property levied upon is exempt from execution, the question whether the wife's separate property levied upon in execution of a judgment obtained against her for necessaries is or is not exempt under the section may be tried and decided in some appropriate proceeding after execution. This would necessarily be so because the issue could not arise except upon the taking of the property after execution.

[6] The dismissal in the present action, as to the husband, did not affect the obligation of the wife. Under the holding in Evans v. Noonan, supra, the defendants were jointly liable. Plaintiff might therefore have sued either, or, having sued both, she might have dismissed her action as to either. These rules regarding joint and several liability have always been recognized in California. Stearns v. Aguirre, 6 Cal. 176; Code Civ. Proc. § 414; Callahan v. Danziger, 32 Cal. App. 405, 163 Pac. 65.

We, therefore, reach a point where we must hold that a judgment under section 171, Civil Code, against Mrs. McCarthy would have been proper under the pleadings and proof, and the judgment of nonsuit as to her must be reversed.

As it is uncertain, from the facts before us, whether or not a judgment restricted in its application to conform to the limitations of section 171, Civil Code, would afford the plaintiff relief in the present action, it is appropriate for us to consider the evidence and admissions in the light of appellant's contention that the defendant Mrs. McCarthy should be charged for these services upon her own contract and irrespective of her husband's liability and irrespective of section 171, Civil Code. Section 158, Civil Code, permits a married woman to enter into contracts with third persons. The plaintiff entered the employ of the defendants in 1908. The contract of employment was made between her and Mrs. McCarthy. She was a housemaid, engaged in doing every branch of the domestic work. She was first paid $30 a month. In 1910 Mrs. McCarthy increased her wages to $35 a month, of which Dr. McCarthy paid $25 and his wife for a short time paid $10. Dr. McCarthy left his home in 1914, and there was a subsequent divorce. On leaving he sent his check to the plaintiff for $25, bearing the notation that it was for payment in full, and his messenger and attorney in fact then told the plaintiff that she was discharged. Mrs McCarthy told the plaintiff not to accept the check, and she immediately re-employed her. The plaintiff refused the check, and remained in the employment of Mrs. McCarthy until December 1, 1915. On January 26, 1916, Mrs. McCarthy approved a document hereinbefore referred to and relied upon by plaintiff to remove the bar of the statute of limitations.

Under section 158 of the Civil Code, Mrs. McCarthy had power to contract to pay for what she received, whether necessaries or not. As to the additional $10 a month over what Dr. McCarthy paid the plaintiff prior to the separation, which makes up $470 of the claim, Mrs. McCarthy undertook to pay this amount. When, at the time of the separation, Dr. McCarthy discharged the plaintiff, Mrs. McCarthy herself immediately re-employed her. The balance of the account is for wages earned after that event. In the cross-examination of the plaintiff, counsel for Mrs. McCarthy caused to be introduced as an exhibit on behalf of the defendant a letter from the plaintiff to Mrs. McCarthy, reading as follows:

"17 Ranelegh Bld.

"Dear Mrs. McCarthy: I would like very much if you could let me have all or part of the bill you owe me. I feel quite sure you must know how foolish it is to talk of making the Dr pay it. I couldent there is no case against him besides the bill is between you and I—I done without my salary to suit you not the Dr you know all about the bill just as well as I do. I done everything I could do gave my time and strength to help you it was for your convenience the bill it owe I needed the money very much many times but never so much as now Ive been sick more or less ever since I had Francis at the ranch I would never have been there only to help you out some time ago I met a friend of yours and she said you told her you were very much put out at my taking Francis to the ranch as you had plenty of money you had a monthly income from your uncle besides making 60 dollars per month by writing I never could forgive you for holding back my salary and allowing me to fret and worry all those years trying to help you out besides fretting about my own bill when you had plenty and could have paid me well It is over now and done with now and I will try to forget whether you were ever in need or not I dont know I do know I am the Dr says I have got to give up work entirely for from three to six months have a complete rest and treatment I am in a very serious condition it was no news to me I felt it coming but just fought against it always hoping things would be straightened out and my bill would be paid so I could take a month or two and rest. You know the bill has been running over seven years besides I spent 1 hundred twenty dollars trying to find out if the Dr could be made to pay it besides 4 per cent interest all those years the amount in case you have forgotten is twelve hundred forty dollars including three months we were at the ranch. Mrs. Ridges has got to be paid for Francis board I will be willing to do that out of my salary whatever is over wont be any too much for taking care of his throat poor little Francis I don't grudge anything I ever done for him but you people can afford to pay the little I am asking and understood I was to get.

"Now Mrs. McCarthy I am not asking too much of you to see after the bill I am very anxious to follow the Drs advice when one has no home or friends they cant afford to be sick for very long unless they go to the poor farm and I do pray that after all I have gone through that humiliation is not in store for me it is impossible for me to stop work until I fall down unless the bill is paid it means a lot to me who never could afford a second pair shoes always trying to save something for just such a time as this and now have to beg for what worked faithfully for. Annie."

[7] These facts, we think, show a personal contract on the part of Mrs. McCarthy, and a liability irrespective of the limited one possible under the provisions of section 171, Civil Code.

Before the enabling sections of the Code, liability for necessaries was enforced in equity against the separate estate of a married woman. Miller v. Newton et al., 23 Cal. 554. Our Code provisions now give statutory authority for this wholesome doctrine.

[8] The document introduced into evidence and relied upon as a statement of account, so as to take the claim out of the operation of the statute of limitation, was adressed to Dr. C. F. McCarthy and Mrs. C. F. McCarthy. It contained a statement of the amounts due for the various years, credits, etc., showing a total of $1,135. At the bottom of the page was written:

"The above prepared by my direction is O. K. Mrs. C. F. McCarthy, January 26, 1916."

The trial court held, upon Mrs. McCarthy's motion for a nonsuit, that this document did not constitute an account stated as to her upon the ground that she was not originally liable, and could not enlarge her obligation by stating that this account was correct in its amounts; that it was at all times only an obligation as to her husband, and her admission as to its correctness could not change this. In the light of the views herein expressed as to her joint liability for the debt, the document would be admissible against her as a statement of account.

The judgment as to defendant Mrs. McCarthy is reversed. The order granting the nonsuit is vacated, with instructions to the trial court to permit the defendant Mrs. McCarthy to state whatever defense she may have to the plaintiff's suit. If necessary, leave should be granted to the plaintiff to amend her complaint to correspond with the proof.

UNITED CANNERIES CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. SEELYE. (Civ. 3219.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1920.)

1. Sales ⟸82(2)—Payment should be made on delivery, where contract specifies no time.

Where a contract for the sale of fruit was silent as to the time of payment, the buyer must, under Civ. Code. § 1657, pay at the time of delivery; and this is particularly true, where the seller demanded that there be stricken from the contract provisions for payment after delivery.

2. Sales ⟸99—Refusal to pay on delivery warrants rescission; "fault."

Where the buyer of fruit failed to pay on delivery, as required and demanded, such failure constituted a "fault," within Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 2, and justified the seller's rescission or abandonment, which was made with the promptness required by section 1691.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series. Fault.]

3. Sales ⟸174, 343, 344—Failure of buyer to make payment held to warrant seller in refusing to make further deliveries; after rescission by seller, he might recover value of goods delivered.

Though a contract for the sale of a fruit crop was not formally rescinded, the failure of the buyer to make payment on delivery, which was demanded in accordance with the terms of the contract, warranted the seller in refusing to make further deliveries unless payment was made, and in attempting, as he did by counterclaim, to recover for fruit already delivered.

4. Sales ⟸174—Seller not liable for buyer's loss.

Where buyer refused to make payment at time of delivery as required by the contract, and the seller thereafter offered to carry out the contract under those conditions, the buyer cannot under any theory, equitable or legal, recover for damages sustained; the buyer alone being at fault, and equity following the law.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1052(8)—Admission of evidence harmless.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver a fruit crop, where plaintiff was under no theory entitled to recover, the admission of evidence of previous litigation between the parties, if erroneous, was harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Canning Company against O. L. Seelye, in which the United Canneries Company of California was substituted as plaintiff. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 183 Pac. 667.

Henry Goodcell, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

E. H. Jolliffe and Archie D. Mitchell, both of Ontario, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract to deliver fruit. The case was tried without a jury, findings and judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The action was originally commenced by the Southern California Canning Company, for which corporation plaintiff here was, by proper order, substituted; the former's rights having passed to the latter. The present plaintiff had nothing whatever to do with the making of the contract in question, or with any of the acts or transactions here involved. For convenience, therefore, the designation "plaintiff," as here used, will refer to the original plaintiff in the action.

From the record it appears that in the spring of 1914 plaintiff and this defendant entered into a contract whereby the former agreed to purchase, and the latter agreed to sell, defendant's yearly crop of peaches for a period of five years—1914 to 1918, both years inclusive. The contract says nothing as to the time when payment should be made. Defendant delivered the crops of 1914 and 1915 under this agreement. The fruit delivered in 1914 was paid for, but for that delivered during the year 1915 defendant received nothing. Plaintiff claims that there was some disagreement as to the amount due defendant under the contract for fruit delivered during that year. At the close of the season plaintiff tendered to defendant a given sum, which it claimed to be the full amount due for the 1915 crop; but defendant refused to accept the same, claiming, on the other hand, that a much larger amount was due. Thereafter defendant instituted an action against this plaintiff upon the contract in question for the sum claimed by the former to be due, upon the trial whereof defendant here recovered a judgment for practically the full amount claimed.

Having had this experience, and notwithstanding the same, it appears that defendant respected his agreement, and proceeded to act thereunder for the year 1916. At the time of the delivery to the plaintiff of the first load of fruit for that year, defendant also delivered to plaintiff a letter, which in words and figures, is as follows:

"July 25, 1916. The Southern California Canning Company, W. H. Braun, A. C. Harvey, Ontario, California—Gentlemen: Delivery is herewith offered you of the fruit covered by that certain contract entered into between you and the undersigned on the 30th day of April, 1914. You are hereby notified that demand is herewith made for payment for said fruit at the price mentioned in said contract. Payment is hereby demanded for the fruit delivered and for each load as it shall be delivered at your cannery as per said contract. Full payment for each load will be expected as it is delivered. Yours truly, O. L. Seelye."

The buyer of the fruit, after receiving this letter, paid for the fruit, at the close of each day's delivery, until the 28th day of July, 1916, upon which date it refused to pay as delivered. Thereupon this defendant, as was his legal right so to do, refused to make further deliveries, and the present action ensued.

[1] Before the execution of the contract referred to, it contained a clause reading as follows:

"Payments in settlement of this contract to be made one-third in 30 days, one-third in 60 days, one-third in 90 days, after completion of deliveries."

This clause was stricken from the contract for the reason that defendant told plaintiff's representatives that he would not sign any contract of that nature—that he would have to have his money in order to carry on his business—to which suggestion plaintiff, through its agent, Mr. Harvey, answered:

"You can have your money any time you want it, as the fruit is delivered. We have got lots of money to pay with, and you don't have to wait for your money."

The contract being thus silent on the matter of payment, regardless of the evidence referred to, the time of payment is, as a matter of law, fixed as at the time of delivery (Civ. Code, § 1657; Cole v. Swanston, 1 Cal. 51, 52 Am. Dec. 288; Veerkamp v. Hulburd, etc., Co., 58 Cal. 229, 41 Am. Dec. 265; J. K. Armsby Co. v. Blum, 137 Cal. 552, 70 Pac. 669; Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, 168 Cal. 23, 141 Pac. 623, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 784), and with such evidence explaining, not modifying, the contract, there can be no doubt with reference thereto. Confronted with this fact, we do not think the letter of July 25, 1916, adds to or detracts from the contract under consideration; it certainly is not a modification or variation thereof in any way. Under these circumstances we think the buyer of the fruit was legally bound to pay for the same at the time of delivery, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary.

[2] The refusal on the part of plaintiff to pay for the fruit as delivered, we think, constitutes the "fault" referred to in subdivision 2 of section 1689 of the Civil Code, which furnishes the basis of rescission (Lake Shore, etc., Co. v. Richards, 30 L. R. A. 33, and cases there cited in an elaborate note on the "Right to Rescind or Abandon Contract Because of Other Party's Default") that was promptly taken advantage of, as provided by the terms of section 1691, Civil Code, by this defendant. Indeed, in our opinion the existence of this fact alone is sufficient to support the judgment before us.

[3, 4] On the other hand, if we hold that the court erred in finding that the contract was rescinded, the facts in this case, as shown by the evidence, disclose such a breach of the contract as entitled defendant to treat the same as rescinded; and by so doing defendant might have brought suit, on the implied promise to pay, for the value of the peaches so delivered to and not paid for by plaintiff. Cox v. McLaughlin, 54 Cal. 605; Id., 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Porter v. Arrowhead Co., 100 Cal. 500, 35 Pac. 146; Golden Gate L. Co. v. Sahrbacker, 105 Cal. 114, 38 Pac. 635; San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton Co., 119 Cal. 272, 51 Pac. 335. In legal contemplation this is what the defendant here has sought to do by his counterclaim for the value of peaches so delivered, which position the court found to be supported by the evidence. Was the defendant entitled to his pay for the peaches so delivered under the contract? He was. There is no doubt about it. Hence, regardless of whether the court erred in finding that the contract was rescinded, plaintiff's conduct was such that it could not assert its alleged rights under the contract in question, while the defendant was legally justified in acting as he did.

The fact that the fruit was delivered without pay "when each load was delivered," or "at the end of each day's delivery," during the years 1914 and 1915, is immaterial. This was not by virtue of any provision in the contract, but by sufferance of the defendant; for, as we have seen, under the contract he was entitled to his pay upon delivery. With the experience of the former year, and notwithstanding the contract and the fact that a controversy had arisen during the pendency of which, among other things, there was an attack upon the person of defendant by one of the executive officers of the plaintiff corporation, it would have been strange indeed, not to say imprudent, had defendant acted otherwise than as he did. His action is worthy of universal imitation. It needs no argument, certainly, to convince one that the plaintiff cannot stand on the contract and at the same time repudiate a portion thereof. Having violated the portion which implies payment for goods delivered, as above set forth, it had no standing in the trial court. Notwithstanding this fact, this defendant, under date of August 2, 1916, wrote, and on August 3, 1916, mailed by registered mail, addressed to plaintiff, a letter, which, omitting the formal parts, is in words and figures as follows:

"You are hereby notified that the undersigned will continue to deliver the fruit from his ranch to you only while you pay for the same in accordance with the procedure outlined in my letter of the 25th ult., and the practice adopted by you in this regard immediately after delivery of the first and second day's delivery, to wit: Payment for all fruit delivered each day, upon delivery of the last load each day. As a matter of business you know that we cannot harvest and deliver the crop without money, and as yet we have received nothing for our last year's crop. Business prudence prompts our action in this matter."

This, we think, was but an offer to revive the rescinded contract, if it be so regarded. It was never accepted.

Having arrived at the foregoing conclusion, it is immaterial whether plaintiff was damaged in any sum, or at all. It certainly cannot be permitted to profit by its own shortcomings. It came short of its own legal obligation when it refused to abide by the terms of its own agreement. Equity follows the law, and hence is deaf to such a claim as plaintiff attempts to assert here. The record justifies us in holding that, as a matter of law, conceding a loss to have been suffered by plaintiff, it was not occasioned by any act or omission of this defendant. Notwithstanding the abandonment of the contract by plaintiff, defendant's letter of August 2, 1916, made it possible for plaintiff to avoid any loss if it had availed itself of the offer therein made. It cannot now be heard to complain.

[5] The next point urged is that the court committed certain errors of law, which, for our present purpose, may be considered together under one designation; i. e., the reception in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, of the judgment rule in an action brought the preceding year by this defendant against the plaintiff here for payment for the fruit delivered during that year under this same contract. Under the circumstances of the case at bar, we think the question raised immaterial. Even if such ruling be conceded to be erroneous, it is without prejudice, as must now be obvious.

It is also urged by appellant that the issues as framed do not present a case of rescission. In other words, it is claimed that rescission is not pleaded, and hence not in issue here. From what we have said, however, and in view of the conclusion reached, we do not think this point need be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. REYNOLDS. (Cr. 707.)

1. Criminal law ⟹814(17)—Refusal of request not supported by evidence is not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, accused was not prejudiced by the refusal of his request for an instruction that, if other persons were present at the time and heard no outcry, that circumstance could be considered in his favor, where there was no evidence that any other person was present.

2. Rape ⟹49(1)—Failure to make outcry not material where offense is statutory.

In a prosecution for a statutory rape, where the element of force is not involved, the fact that prosecutrix made no outcry is not material in defendant's favor.

3. Criminal law ⟹772(4) — Instruction authorizing conviction for act on any date within limitations proper.

Where there was no attempt to establish the offense by accused on any date other than that specified by prosecuting witness, though she did testify generally to other similar acts with accused, it was not error to instruct the jury that the date of the act was immaterial if it occurred within 3 years before the filing of the information.

4. Criminal law ⟹1137(3) — Accused cannot complain of instruction given at his request.

Accused cannot on appeal complain of an instruction designated in the record as defendant's instruction, from which the appellate court infers it was requested by him.

5. Criminal law ⟹1120(3)—Error in excluding impeaching question to one's own witness held not shown.

Where the trial court sustained an objection to a question asked by defendant of his own witness as to the witness' testimony at the preliminary examination, but there was no showing that such prior testimony was contrary to his testimony at the trial, error in sustaining the objection was not shown.

6. Witnesses ⟹388(7, 10)—Circumstances attending contradictory statement must be given to witness.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, authorizing a party to impeach his own witness by inconsistent statements, the impeachment cannot be made unless the statements are related to the witness with the circumstances of time, places, and persons present and he be given an opportunity to explain them, and if the statements are in writing they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them.

7. Witnesses ⟸380(5)—Right to impeach own witness depends on surprise.

The right of a party to impeach his own witness by contradictory statements appears to be confined to cases where he is taken by surprise as to the witness' testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

James Reynolds was convicted of rape, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

W. W. Judd, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted, as charged, of the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed about August 13, 1919, upon a girl of the age of 13 years. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

While defendant raises no question as to the sufficiency of the evidence produced in support of the verdict, he insists that the judgment should be reversed on account of alleged errors committed by the court in the course of the trial.

[1] Error is predicated upon the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, at the request of defendant, as follows:

"You are instructed that, if you believe from the evidence that at the time of the alleged rape other people were at the same time in the same house who might easily have heard her had she made an outcry and that she in fact made no outcry at the time the defendant was attempting to have connection with her, the failure on her part to make outcry might be considered with all the other evidence in determining the credibility of such witness and whether rape was in fact committed or not."

As appears from the testimony, the alleged rape was committed in July, 1919, the prosecutrix being unable to fix the day of the month, and we find no evidence that any person other than defendant and the prosecutrix was in the house at the time; on the contrary, the evidence of the latter negatives such fact. Therefore, since there was no evidence tending to prove the facts on which the instruction was based, defendant could not have been prejudiced by the refusal of the court to give the same.

[2] Conceding, however, that other persons were in the house and could have heard an outcry made by the prosecutrix, and that she made none, such fact could not affect the question of defendant's guilt, since by reason of her age it is immaterial whether she consented to the act or was forced to submit thereto. People v. Totman, 135 Cal. 133, 67 Pac. 51. The refusal to give an instruction to like effect in People v. Lee, 119 Cal. 84, 51 Pac. 22, was sustained by the court, which said there was no probative force in the fact that the prosecutrix made no outcry. In People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 76 Pac. 1116, the trial court refused to instruct the jury as follows:

"If [you] believe from the evidence that at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed the prosecuting witness made no outcry and didn't immediately complain to others, but concealed it for several months and then only told it by reason of threats and promises, then the jury should take this circumstance into consideration with all the other evidence in determining the credibility of such witness and whether a rape was in fact committed or not."

While not discussed in the main opinion, Chief Justice Beatty and Justice Shaw in concurring, upheld the refusal to give the instruction because it included the proposition first quoted therein, which, said the Chief Justice, "has no application to the statutory offense—concealment by a consenting female being a circumstance wholly lacking in the significance of the same fact in the common-law offense of rape."

Since the guilt of defendant could not be affected by the consent or nonconsent of the prosecutrix, we are unable to perceive how the question as to whether or not the prosecutrix made an outcry could be considered in determining her credibility, "and whether rape was in fact committed or not."

[3] Another error is based upon the fact that the court instructed the jury as follows:

"The date alleged in the information in this case is on or about August 13, 1919, and the prosecutrix fixes the date of the act testified by her as the ——— day of July, 1919. * * * The date of such act is immaterial if it occurred at any time within 3 years before the filing of the information" —and further told the jury that if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed an act of sexual intercourse upon the girl at any time within 3 years, they should find him guilty as charged. The instruction as given is identical with one considered in the like case of People v. Carmean, 23 Cal. App. 396, 138 Pac. 117, the giving of which was held to be proper. While an examination of the evidence shows that the prosecutrix testified that at other times during the year immediately preceding the act complained of she had had sexual intercourse with defendant, no attempt was made to establish the commission of the crime charged at any date other than in July, 1919. Indeed, the testimony was directed alone to the one act committed at the time fixed by the prosecutrix; and, as elsewhere instructed, the jury were told that evidence of like acts, other than that committed by defendant at the particular time fixed by the prosecutrix, was received and admitted for the purpose only of showing the disposition of defendant and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act of sexual intercourse alleged in the information was committed at about the time alleged therein; and further told the jury:

"There is but one matter before this jury and the court, and that is whether the defendant had sexual intercourse with the girl * * * on or about the time alleged in the information."

[4] Not only, in our opinion, was the instruction, considered in the light of the evidence, not erroneous, but it is designated in the record as defendant's instruction, from which we infer that it was requested by the defendant, in which case, even if erroneous, he is in no position to complain.

[5] Appellant also complains of error predicated upon a ruling of the court in denying him the right to impeach a witness called on behalf of defendant. This is predicated upon the fact that after the witness had answered a question, defendant's counsel said, "I want to read you the following question, which was asked you and answered by you at that time," referring to the preliminary hearing, to which opposing counsel objected upon the ground that it was not proper cross-examination, and the court interposed with the statement, "You can't ask the witness if he didn't testify a certain thing at a certain time; that is impeachment." Presumably the answer to which defendant's counsel had reference was one given by the witness at the preliminary examination. The record, however, is silent as to what this answer was, and for aught that appears to the contrary, it might have been identical with the answer given to the question asked at the trial; hence, if error, there is no affirmative showing that defendant was prejudiced thereby.

[6] Moreover, while section 2049, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a party calling a witness may impeach him by showing that he has theretofore made statements inconsistent with his present testimony (section 2052, Code Civ. Proc.), nevertheless, in order to do so, the statements must be related to him with the circumstances of time, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and, if so, permitted to explain them, and if the statements be in writing, as they were in this case, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them.

[7] Furthermore, such right appears to be confined to cases wherein a party is taken by surprise on account of the character of the testimony of the witness whom they have themselves called under an honest belief as to what his testimony would be. People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 Pac. 842. Since there is no disclosure in the record that the evidence was damaging to the defendant, or that he had theretofore given evidence or made statements contrary to his testimony, or that defendant was taken by surprise by the statements made, nothing appears upon which defendant could base a claim of right to impeach the witness in question. The record discloses no attempt made by defendant to impeach the testimony of the witness, and no ground for permitting such impeachment.

From all of which it follows there is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ROBERTS et al. v. ABBOTT et al.
(Civ. 3222.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 30, 1920.)

1. Deeds ⟸179 — Redelivery not reconveyance.

Redelivery of a deed does not amount to a reconveyance.

2. Deeds ⟸104 — Deed not conveyance of signers not mentioned as grantors.

A deed, signed and acknowledged by the persons named therein as grantors and by others as well, is not the deed of those not named as grantors, and their interest does not pass.

3. Deeds ⟸93—Intent must be ascertained from entire instrument.

Where there was a controversy whether an instrument was a present conveyance or an agreement to convey, the question must be determined by ascertaining the intention of the parties from the entire instrument.

4. Deeds ⟸28—Omissions of formal parts do not necessarily destroy validity.

The omission of any or all the formal parts of a deed does not destroy its validity, where enough appears on its face to show that those having an interest intend to convey it; it being sufficient if the matter written specifies the agreement and meaning of the parties.

5. Deeds ⟸6 — Instrument held a contract, and not a present conveyance.

An instrument, signed by persons not mentioned as grantors, reciting that the parties of the first part had bargained, sold, and delivered all the surface rights of a mining claim, was not a present conveyance, in view of the fact that it was signed by the buyer, a wholly unnecessary thing, and that subsequent portions clearly showed that the parties contemplated the necessity of the execution of further instruments.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action to quiet title by E. S. Roberts and another against F. J. Abbott and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the named defendant appeals. Reversed as to the appellant.

D. M. McDonald, of Los Angeles, Benjamin K. Warmer, and McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

J. P. Chandler, of Los Angeles, and Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to quiet title (1) to a three-fourths interest in a certain mining claim alleged to be owned by the plaintiff E. S. Roberts; and (2) to all the "surface rights" of such mining claim, alleged to be owned by the plaintiff Jeal. The lower court found for the plaintiffs, and judgment was accordingly entered against all the defendants. From the judgment, defendant F. J. Abbott alone appeals.

It is conceded at the outset, by all parties to this suit, that the title is derived either directly or through mesne conveyances from the plaintiff E. S. Roberts. We think all the points raised by appellant may properly be considered under one assignment; i. e., that the evidence does not support the findings. The court found, among other things, as follows:

"That on or about the 29th day of April, 1916, the defendant J. M. Rice, and the plaintiffs E. S. Roberts and John L. Roberts, bargained and sold and delivered to H. B. Watson all of the surface rights of the Greenhorn mining claim, for the consideration therein named, and the said H. B. Watson thereby became the owner of said surface rights. That subsequently the said H. B. Watson transferred and conveyed to numerous parties, certain lots located by the plat on the surface of said mining claim, and sold the same to the said parties for a valuable consideration, and that there are now, upon said surface rights of the said mining claim, about twenty (20) houses, which are occupied as residences, stores, and for other purposes, and about fifty (50) people occupy the same. That the plaintiff J. W. Jeal is the owner of six (6) lots upon the surface of said mining claim. That he is the owner of several buildings upon said lots, and that he is the owner particularly of a hotel building upon one of said lots, which building is now used by the plaintiff J. W. Jeal. That the said J. W. Jeal is now, and for a long time prior to the filing of the complaint herein has been, the owner of a number of water tanks located upon a part of the surface of said mining claim, which tanks are used as a water system from which there is distributed water to the persons living upon said lots upon said mining claim, and other persons, and that the said J. W. Jeal is the owner of and entitled to the possession of all of the surface rights of the Greenhorn mining claim, by virtue of mesne conveyances from H. B. Watson, except the lots which have been sold, as hereinabove stated, and also excepting lots 9 and 10 in block 6 of Atolia town site, as reserved by H. B. Watson in the deed given by said Watson to said Jeal of said town site, and was such owner prior to the filing of the complaint in this action. That the said defendants J. M. Rice and Sarah Rice and F. J. Abbott have no right, title, interest, or claim whatsoever in and to the surface rights of said Greenhorn mining claim, which were sold by H. B. Watson, and subsequently acquired by J. W. Jeal, as hereinabove stated, either by virtue of the mining location called the 'Lucky Rice,' dated the 20th day of July, 1917, or otherwise."

The bone of contention, so far as this appeal is concerned, is whether the instrument —Plaintiffs' Exhibit 8—is a conveyance, or only an agreement to convey, respondents holding that it is the former, while appellant insists that it is the latter.

[1] In considering the chain of title here we shall assume, for our present purposes, that the instrument is a conveyance in præsenti. (It may also be stated, in passing, that we do not here consider, for any purpose, the so-called "Lucky Rice" location.) The chain of title is as follows: E. S. Roberts conveyed an undivided one-half interest to J. M. Rice and J. L. Roberts on December 26, 1915—to each of them an undivided one-fourth. (This deed, although delivered by E. S. Roberts to J. L. Roberts at that time, was never acknowledged or recorded, but, in the year 1917, was handed back by said J. L. Roberts to said E. S. Roberts—which redelivery, however, could not, and did not, amount to a reconveyance of title.) On March 4, 1916, J. L. Roberts conveyed an undivided one-fourth interest to J. M. Rice and John Hendricks. On April 29, 1916, E. S. Roberts, J. M. Rice and J. L. Roberts executed Plaintiffs' Exhibit No. 8, by the terms of which they conveyed "all the surface rights" to H. B. Watson. On July 20, 1916, John Hendricks conveyed to defendant J. M. Rice an undivided one-eighth interest "in said mining claim." On July 24, 1916, J. M. Rice conveyed to Sarah Rice an undivided one-half interest "in said claim." On August 8, 1916, H. B. Watson conveyed to Geo. E. Hart an undivided one-half interest "in the surface rights," etc., of the same property. On December 2, 1916, H. B. Watson conveyed to J. W. Jeal all his right, title, etc., in and to said property, except lots 9 and 10, block 6. On March 14, 1917, (Geo. E. Hart conveyed to J. W. Jeal an undivided one-half interest "in all the surface rights" to this property. On September 15, 1917, J. M. Rice and Sarah Rice conveyed to F. J.

Abbott an undivided one-fourth interest in "all rights in said claim." And, finally, on the same date, the same persons—the Rices—conveyed all "remaining interests" in the said claim to F. J. Abbott.

At this point, when we come to analyze the various transactions, we find that, even on the assumption that the above-mentioned instrument, Exhibit 8, is a conveyance and not merely a contract to convey the various interests in the claim in question are as follows: Mining and mineral rights: E. S. Roberts and F. J. Abbott, each an undivided one-half interest. "Surface rights": F. J. Abbott, an undivided one-eighth interest, and J. W. Jeal, an undivided seven-eighths interest, in all except an undivided one-half of lots 9 and 10 in block 6, the other undivided one-half of which belongs to H. B. Watson.

[2] We shall now consider whether Plaintiff's Exhibit 8 is a conveyance or an agreement to convey. Appellant concedes (although we do not join in such concession) that if the exhibit under consideration is a deed the finding of the court is correct. It reads as follows:

"This indenture, made this 29th day of April, A. D. 1916, by and between H. B. Watson, of the town of Atolia, San Bernardino county, the party of the first part, and J. M. Rice and E. S. Roberts, of the same place, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of one thousand dollars, five hundred dollars ($500.00) of which is hereby acknowledged as having already been paid by H. B. Watson, party of the first part to the said parties of the second part, and the further payment of five hundred dollars ($500.00) additional on or before July 1, 1916, the said Rice and Roberts, parties of the second part, who are the mineral claimants and owners of that certain mining claim known and described in the county records of San Bernardino county and state of California, as the Greenhorn mining claim, and more particularly described in Book 40 of the Mining Records of San Bernardino county, and page 291, the same having been recorded by request of Clyde Darrow on February 6, 1905, have this day bargained, sold, and delivered to H. B. Watson, the party of the first part, all the surface rights and privileges as hereinafter mentioned and existing within the boundaries of said Greenhorn claim. For the purposes of organizing and completing a town site, known as Atolia town site.

"It is especially understood and agreed that this bargain and sale transfers only the surface rights within said area of the boundaries of said Greenhorn claim, which is to be utilized for laying out and surveying of a town site known and styled as the Atolia town site, which is to be subdivided into lots and blocks, for the erection of buildings, conduct of business, and all such public rights of way for electricity, car or buss lines, telephone, telegraph and water service corporations, etc., as may hereafter be entered into for city or town organization so as to engage in municipal, town or other corporate organization in keeping therewith.

"All mineral, mineral rights, and the privileges thereof beneath the surface, extracting and mining the same, are hereby reserved unto the parties of the second part, their heirs or assigns. Said mining operations are to be conducted with due regard to the surface owners and not to interfere with the possessory rights of residents who may purchase lots and engage in business thereon, buildings, street traffic, or maintenance of public thoroughfares, telegraph, telephone, sewers, or other public utilities.

"Upon final payment of the stipulated amount of five hundred ($500) dollars, on or before the 1st day of July, 1916, the undersigned mineral owners and claimants of the ground known as the Greenhorn mining claim hereby bind themselves to give a good and sufficient deed to all the surface space and rights appertaining thereto within the area and boundaries of said mining claim as originally located and described in said copies of record, to the said H. B. Watson, party of the first part, to have and to hold, his heirs and assigns, forever.

"A further covenant and agreement hereby made and understood is that said party of the first part hereby agrees to have said Greenhorn claim surveyed, platted, and to furnish the finances wherewith same shall be patented, so as to issue ultimate warranty deeds to purchasers of surface rights thereon. No liabilities shall be assumed by the parties of the second part in the establishment of said town site or any expense in connection therewith of any description whatsoever."

So far we have assumed the correctness of the conclusion of the learned trial judge in holding that this exhibit was a deed—a conveyance in præsenti. But under this assumption, as we have seen, "all the surface rights," etc., were not conveyed to H. B. Watson. It will be observed from the exhibit which we have just quoted that J. L. Roberts was not mentioned in the body of that instrument, but is one of those signing it.

"A deed signed and acknowledged by persons named therein as grantors, and by others as well, is not the deed of those not named in the body of the instrument as grantors." Cordano v. Wright, 159 Cal. 610, 115 Pac. 227, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1044.

Indeed, the fact is that J. L. Roberts had previously conveyed whatever interest he had therein to John Hendricks, and Hendricks does not join in this instrument.

[3-5] To determine whether such an instrument is in itself a conveyance or an agreement to convey, we shall have to inquire for and ascertain, if we can, from the whole instrument, just what the intention of the parties was.

"In determining the intention, the first rule is to ascertain whether the language imports a present conveyance, or whether, collecting all its parts, it contemplates a further assurance to pass the title." 8. R. C. L. § 8, p. 929.

Applying this rule, we are confronted first of all with language which appears to indicate a transfer in præsenti. However, we think, when the instrument is considered in its entirety, that this is more apparent than real.

Taking first the provision of the instrument under consideration by which the parties of the second part, after complying with certain prerequisites, "bind themselves to give a good and sufficient deed to all the surface space and rights appertaining thereto," etc.: To hold that the instrument itself is a deed conveying property to first party in præsenti renders the clause just quoted nugatory and of no force whatever; while to construe the exhibit as contended for by appellant is to give force to every part thereof. Secondly, we are confronted with the fact that the instrument not only contains the clause just referred to, but is signed by both parties. This is not only unusual in the case of a conveyance in præsenti, or a deed, but absolutely unnecessary. Notwithstanding the fact that "the omission of all or any of the formal parts of a deed does not destroy its validity, where enough appears on its face to show that those having an interest intend to convey it, and they join in selling the instrument, it being sufficient if the matter written is legally set forth in an orderly manner by words which clearly specify the agreement and meaning of the parties, and bind them" (8 R. C. L. 935), we are of the opinion that, taken as a whole, this instrument falls far short even of this condition. We hold, therefore, that Plaintiffs' Exhibit No. 8 is an agreement to convey, and not a conveyance in præsenti. Ellis v. Jeans, 7 Cal. 409; Estate of Goetz, 13 Cal. App. 198, 109 Pac. 145; Powell v. Hunter, 204 Mo. 393, 102 S. W. 1020.

After trial, but before the court made its findings, etc., leave was granted plaintiffs to amend the third cause of action set forth in their complaint, by striking out the following:

"That J. M. Rice, E. S. Roberts, and John L. Roberts entered into an agreement, whereby they agreed to sell all of the surface rights of the Greenhorn mining claim to H. B. Watson, for a consideration therein named, and plaintiffs allege that said agreement of sale is still in existence and is a valid and binding obligation"

—and inserting in the place and stead thereof the following:

"That J. M. Rice, E. S. Roberts, and John L. Roberts bargained and sold and delivered all of the surface rights of the Greenhorn mining claim to H. B. Watson for a good and valuable consideration, and that said H. B. Watson thereby became the owner of said surface rights." (Italics ours.)

This amendment was allowed on the theory that it was a compliance with the proof. The part italicized by us was found in Plaintiffs' Exhibit No. 8 itself. It is contended that the court erred in permitting this amendment to be made, with which contention we are inclined to agree, for the reason that, in the light of what has been said above, there was no legal evidence before that tribunal justifying the same. Though it be a fact that the words "bargained, sold and delivered" are present in the exhibit referred to, yet, when such instrument is taken as a whole, these words are not of such import, and cannot be construed in such a manner, that an agreement to convey can, by their presence alone, and irrespective of the remaining portions of the exhibit, be converted into a conveyance in præsenti.

As must now be obvious, the only persons interested in this appeal are the respondent Jeal and appellant Abbott. Nor are there any other rights or interests involved than the "surface rights," so called, in said property. As already seen, Jeal's claim of title to the surface rights is based solely upon the instruments executed by Watson to Hart, and by Hart to Jeal. It has already been shown that Watson held the property only under and by virtue of Plaintiffs' Exhibit No. 8, and that under that instrument he was not the owner and had no legal title to the property at the time such purported conveyances were executed by him—having only such rights as had been accorded him in the exhibit mentioned. Nor does the evidence disclose that he ever became the legal owner at any subsequent time. If plaintiff Jeal did not own the legal title to these "surface rights," etc., the question whether he has or has not paid all that was due under the contract becomes, we think, quite immaterial.

Taking either horn of the dilemma—construing the exhibit considered as a conveyance in præsenti or as an agreement to convey—the evidence, for reasons stated, does not support the finding.

The judgment, so far as appellant F. J. Abbott is concerned, is reversed.

SANTA BARBARA LUMBER CO. v. ROSS, Sheriff, et al. (L. A. 6103.)

1. Homestead ⟹43—Statement in wife's declaration that husband has not "made a declaration," sufficient.

Civ. Code, § 1263, requiring a wife's declaration of homestead to contain a statement "showing that her husband has not made such declaration," the purpose thereof being to show that the right of the family to a homestead had not been previously effectively asserted by the husband, and that they are not claiming two homesteads, is satisfied by a statement that he has not made "a declaration of homestead."

2. Pleading ⟹121(4)—Matters of record, denied for want of information and belief, are admitted.

Foreclosure of mortgage and sale thereunder, alleged in the complaint, being facts of record, may not be denied for want of information and belief, and, being so denied, instead of directly, must be deemed admitted.

3. Homestead ⟹31—Claim not invalidated by intent to mortgage.

The law expressly permitting the mortgaging of a homestead, a homestead may be claimed in property on which the claimants live at the time and continue to live, though at the time of making claim they intend to mortgage the property; there being no fraud in this.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by the Santa Barbara Lumber Company against James Ross, Sheriff of Santa Barbara County, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Defendants' appeal turns upon the exemption from execution of premises covered by a homestead declaration by Antonina Cicero, April 28, 1913, held valid by the trial court. By foreclosure of their deed, given as security, the plaintiff has succeeded to the rights of Carmelo Cicero and his wife, Antonina Cicero, in and to the premises claimed as a homestead. It is admitted by the pleadings that the husband and wife resided upon the premises, owned by them as tenants in common, at the time of the declaration of homestead by the wife, and up to the time of the trial had resided thereon continuously. Defendant Ott Hardware Company, having secured a judgment on April 9, 1915, against Carmelo Cicero for $1,031.25, claiming that the homestead declaration was fraudulent and void, directed the defendant sheriff to sell the premises in satisfaction of the judgment. He was proceeding to do so when this action was brought to enjoin the sale. Plaintiff's demurrers to defendants' answer and cross-complaint were sustained. The defendants declined to amend, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon proof of the allegations of its complaint. Defendants appeal.

[1] Preliminarily defendants claim that the declaration of homestead is insufficient in form, for the reason that it contains a statement that the husband "has not made a declaration of homestead," whereas the statute (Civ. Code, § 1263) requires that the wife's declaration of homestead must contain a statement "showing that her husband has not made such declaration." (Italics ours.) The purpose of this requirement is to show that the husband and wife are not, because of the wife's declaration, claiming two homesteads; that is, that the right of the family to a homestead has not been previously effectively asserted by the husband. The declaration was sufficient for that purpose and is admitted to be true.

[2, 3] The answer and cross-complaint admitted every requirement necessary to make the premises a homestead, excepting only that defendants alleged there was no intention on the part of the wife to claim the premises as a homestead. This allegation is supplemented by other affirmative allegations that the homestead was filed for a fraudulent purpose, namely, to prefer the plaintiff as a creditor over the defendant Ott Hardware Company, which on April 12, 1913, before the declaration of the homestead (April 28, 1913), had caused an attachment to be levied upon the property, and that the homestead was filed for the purpose of defeating this attachment. On May 12, 1913, the husband and wife made a deed to the plaintiff. Plaintiff alleges that this deed was in legal effect a mortgage to secure a claim owing by the husband and wife to it, and that subsequently this deed was foreclosed, and that the husband and wife still resided on the premises and had an equity of redemption therein. While the foreclosure and sale thereunder are denied for want of information and belief, the facts are of public record, and therefore must be deemed to be admitted by failure to directly deny the same. Mulcahy v.

Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 487, 35 Pac. 144; Mullally v. Townsend, 119 Cal. 47, 53, 50 Pac. 1066.

The claim of the appellants, then amounts to this: That at the time the husband and wife claimed the property as a homestead they intended to execute a mortgage thereon in favor of a creditor and for the purpose of preferring that creditor over the defendant Ott Hardware Company's claim. The allegations of fraudulent purpose and conspiracy between the creditor and the homestead claimants amount to nothing. The purpose of the homestead law is to exempt the home from execution. The homestead claimants have a right to execute a mortgage upon the homestead, and, both joining therein, the mortgagor can on their default foreclose the mortgage and secure title thereto. The attempt to do these things could not constitute fraud, for they are expressly permitted by law. In its last analysis the claim of the appellants is that a homestead cannot be claimed, if at the time it is claimed the parties intend to execute a mortgage thereon. This intent is not inconsistent with a bona fide claim of a homestead.

In view of the admissions in the pleadings that the husband and wife resided in their dwelling house upon the property at the time of the declaration of the homestead, and continued to reside therein for at least two years thereafter, the allegation that they had no intention to claim said property as a homestead does not raise an issue for the admissions of the pleadings concerning the actual residence established the necessary intention. It is not necessary for us to decide what the result would have been if immediately upon the filing of the declaration of homestead the claimants had conveyed the property without consideration, or in consideration of an antecedent indebtedness, and had thereupon surrendered the possession of the premises, intending so to do at the time the declaration was made and recorded. No such question is involved.

Judgment affirmed.

BIGGART v. LEWIS, County Auditor, et al. (L. A. 5196.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 11, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸224—Taxpayer can restrain illegal payment by county waterworks district.

A taxpayer and resident of a county waterworks district may sue to restrain an expenditure of the district funds which is not sanctioned by law.

2. Waters and water courses ⟸224—County waterworks district not liable for expenses of organization.

In the absence of a statute expressly authorizing such payment, a county waterworks district, organized under St. 1913, p. 785, is not liable for legal services rendered to procure its organization, whether it be considered a private or a municipal corporation, since neither of such corporations is liable for the acts of its organizers before it came into being.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸225 — Legal expenses for organization of district not "incidental" expenses.

The provision of the county irrigation district act that the petition for organization shall estimate the cost of the proposed improvements and of the incidental expenses in connection therewith does not authorize payment for legal services for organization, "incidental" referring to something which is subordinate to and dependent upon and follows the existence of another and principal thing, especially in view of other provisions of the act specifying the purposes for which funds can be applied which do not include organization expenses.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incidental.]

4. Waters and water courses ⟸225—Irrigation district not authorized to pay legal expenses of organization.

A provision of the county irrigation district act requiring the petitioner to furnish a bond to pay the cost of forming the district in case its formation is not affected, was merely intended to protect the county against the expenses of one or more elections on the question of organizing such district and does not authorize the district after organization to pay the legal expenses incurred in its organization.

5. Waters and water courses ⟸224—Waterworks district cannot pay expenses of organization.

A county irrigation district cannot after its organization adopt the acts of its organizers and pay for legal services in connection with its organization, in view of the statute which specifies and limits the purposes for which the funds of the district may be expended, which do not include the organization expenses.

6. Waters and water courses ⟸224—Rules for claims against counties apply to county irrigation districts.

Since a county irrigation district is governed by the county supervisors and is to some extent a county affair, the general rules and regulations which govern the supervisors in acting upon claims against the county proper, including Pol. Code, § 4041, giving them jurisdiction to allow only accounts legally chargeable against the county, apply to claims against the district in the absence of a more specific provision in the district act.

7. Counties ⟸206(1) — Courts can examine whether claim allowed was a legal charge.

While the adjudication of the supervisors in allowing a claim against the county is conclusive if they had jurisdiction of such claim, the courts can examine whether a claim presented and allowed by the supervisors was a legal charge against the county, of which they alone had jurisdiction under Pol. Code, § 4041.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by R. P. Biggart against Walter A. Lewis, as County Auditor, and others, to restrain the payment of a claim. Judgment for defendants on sustaining demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Milton K. Young, of Los Angeles, Byron Coleman, of San Francisco, and Lyndol L. Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. C. Shelton, A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Edward T. Bishop, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff in this action sought to restrain by injunction the defendants, Lewis and Hunt, respectively auditor and treasurer of the county of Los Angeles, from auditing and paying a demand purporting to have been allowed by the supervisors of said county in favor of the defendant Gibbon for services claimed to have been rendered by him in the promotion and organization of "Los Angeles County Waterworks District No. 3." Following an order sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend, judgment was rendered and entered for the defendants, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

Briefly stated, the pleaded effects of the plaintiff's case, in so far as they are pertinent to a discussion and decision of the points presented on the appeal, are these: Los Angeles County Waterworks District No. 3 was duly created by the board of supervisors of said county on November 16, 1914, and ever since has been in existence and operation under and by virtue of the provisions of an act entitled, "An act to provide for the formation, management and dissolution of county irrigation districts," etc. Stats. 1913, p. 785. The plaintiff was at all times involved in the subject-matter of the action a resident taxpayer within said waterworks district, and was the owner of certain designated property of the alleged value of $16,750, situated therein, which was subject, not only to the lien and incumbrance of the district's bonds, but also to the lien and incumbrance of any and all taxes and assessments which might, from time to time, be levied for the maintenance of the district. The defendant Thomas E. Gibbon, an attorney at law, presented, on or about the 6th day of June, 1916, to the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, a demand against the district which, as shown by an "amended claim" set forth in the body of plaintiff's complaint, was in the sum of $10,000. The claim was "for services rendered to Los Angeles County Irrigation District No. 3. (1) Negotiating and deciding upon the plans and specifications for the main distributing pipe lines for said district as to size of pipe, method of construction, length of pipe, and particularly the cost to be borne by said district of the Franklin Canyon, Glendale and Chatsworth main lines, which plans were necessary to ascertain the probable cost to the district of the proposed distributing system. Also negotiating and deciding whether the said district should include in its plans and specifications a portion of the cost of the Chatsworth reservoir. (2) Advice to freeholders concerning all matters arising by reason of the proposed organization of said district. (3) Checking and passing upon the description of external boundaries of said district and on the cost of same. (4) Preparation of the petition for the organization of said district and the issuance of bonds thereby." The board of supervisors on the 8th of January, 1917, by resolution purported to approve and allow said demand to the extent of and for the sum of $5,000, and ordered a warrant to be drawn upon the defendant Walter A. Lewis, as county auditor, requiring him to approve and allow said demand in the sum of $5,000, and, by the same resolution and order, directed the defendant John N. Hunt, as county treasurer, to pay said demand to the extent of the sum allowed thereon out of the funds of the district.

The plaintiff's complaint by appropriate allegations proceeded upon the theory that the demand of defendant Gibbon was not based upon the rendition to the district of any services contemplated by the legislative enactment permitting the formation of irrigation districts; that, inasmuch as none of the services which were made the basis of the demand are provided for in said legislative enactment, or elsewhere, the same are not and cannot be made a legal charge against the district; that therefore the purported and partial allowance of said claim was and is wholly illegal and void and of no effect. The plaintiff instituted the action on his own behalf and upon behalf of all of the residents, taxpayers, and freeholders within the district. The defendants' demurrers were general and based solely upon the ground of the insufficiency of the facts pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint to state a cause of action, and they were apparently sustained by the court below primarily upon the theory that the services upon which defendant claimed compensation were services rendered to the water district, or at least provided for by the act under which the district was organized, and that therefore the allowance of the claim by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county was a matter within its jurisdiction, and also upon the ground that, when passing upon and allowing the claim, said board was acting in a quasi judicial capacity and, as a consequence, its judgment of approval and allowance of the claim could not be reviewed and disturbed by a court of law.

[1] The demurrers were not well taken, and should have been overruled. It is conceded at the outset, as indeed it must be, that the plaintiff, as a taxpayer of and resident within the district, has the legal right to invoke the remedy of injunction to restrain the expenditure of the funds of the district if it can be said that such expenditure finds no sanction in the law, and, the case coming here as it does upon a judgment rendered upon an order sustaining demurrers to the plaintiff's complaint, the question of the legality of the claim, as well as the legality of its allowance by the board of supervisors, must be determined by the consideration of the scope and effect of the allegations of the complaint.

[2] The complaint specifically and affirmatively alleges, among other things, that the services claimed to have been rendered to the district by the defendant Gibbon, and which constituted the basis of his demand against the district, were not the services provided for or contemplated by the legislative enactment (Stats. 1913, p. 785), permitting and providing for the organization of the district; that said Gibbon did not in fact perform or render any services in connection with the district subsequent to its formation or at any time when it had a legal existence; that said defendant did not in fact perform any services for said district or for the use and benefit of said district. These allegations of the complaint are fortified by the recitals of the demand made upon the district by the defendant Gibbon, which was incorporated in the complaint. These recitals make manifest that the services rendered by the defendant Gibbon and for which the board allowed him compensation in the sum of $5,000 were performed at a time when the district was but a proposition—incipient and inchoate—and that the precise nature of said services consisted in the furnishing of aid in connection with the preparation and filing of the petition for the formation of the district. Consequently the complaint sufficiently shows, as against a general demurrer, that such services were performed at a time prior to the formal formation of the district into an organized and existing corporate legal entity.

It is well settled that a private corporation cannot be held liable for the acts of its promoters, nor be obligated by their conduct and contracts, in the absence of charter provisions providing therefor or of an adoption of such conduct or contracts by the corporation after it comes into existence. Mitchell v. Patterson, 120 Cal. 286, 293, 52 Pac. 589; Ehrich on Promoters, pp. 74–83. This is so upon the obviously correct theory that a corporation cannot, no more than can an individual, have agents or enter into contractual relations until it is actually in being as a thing apart from its procreators. Fletcher, Cyc. of Corporations, § 150. The rule in this behalf is perhaps more precisely stated and the reason therefor aptly illustrated in the case of Gent v. Ins. Co., 107 Ill. 652, 658, where it was said:

"That a corporation should have a full and complete organization and existence as an entity before it can enter into any kind of a contract or transact any business, would seem to be self-evident. This is unconditionally true, unless the act of incorporation authorizes the corporators to perform acts and enter into contracts to bind the company when it shall be organized. As well say a child in ventre sa mere may enter into a contract, or that its parents may bind it by contract. A corporation, until organized, has no being, franchises, or faculties. Nor do those engaged in bringing it into being have any power to bind it by contract, unless so authorized by the charter. Until organized as authorized by the charter there is not a corporation, nor does it possess franchises or faculties for it or others to exercise, until it acquires a complete existence. By its birth, so to speak, it for the first time acquires its faculties to transact its business and perform its functions."

The rule in this behalf has been held to apply to the conduct and contracts of promoters, who, after incorporation, became and constituted all of the stockholders, directors and officers of the corporation. Battelle v. Pavement Co., 37 Minn. 89, 33 N. W. 327. And it has been applied with equal force to public as well as to private corporations. Mitchell v. Patterson, supra. It is well settled that municipal corporations cannot, any more than can private corporations, exercise any power other than those which are conferred on them by the act under which they are incorporated, or such as are necessarily incidental to the exercise of their corporate rights, the performance of their corporate duties, and the accomplishment of the purposes for which they are created. Hood v. Mayor, 1 Allen (Mass.) 103. And it has been held that a municipality has no authority to appropriate money from the treasury of the municipality for the purpose of paying expenses incurred by individuals prior to its incorporation for legal advice or for the services of lawyers rendered in the procurement of the passage of an act permitting the incorporation, in the absence from the act itself of a grant of any authority for the payment of such expenses. Frost v. Inhabitants of Belmont, 6 Allen (Mass.) 152. In so holding the court said:

"The act of incorporation does not provide for the payment of any of these expenses, and it has never been the custom of the Legislature to make provision for the payment by towns newly incorporated of any part of the expenses incurred in procuring the passage of the act of incorporation. And the authorities cited by the plaintiffs establish the point for which they contend, that towns have no right under their general acts of incorporation, or under any of the statutes relating to the subject, to apply the money of the town to the payment of debts or expenses incurred by individuals prior to their corporate existence as a town, or to raise money for such a purpose. The town therefore had no authority to make any provision for the payment of any portion of these bills, because they are for expenses incurred before the town was incorporated." Frost v. Inhabitants of Belmont, supra.

It is thus apparent that the rule to the effect that acts of promoters performed prior to the existence of the corporation are not binding upon the corporation, unless made so by the act under which the incorporation took place or adopted by the corporation after it comes into existence, applies alike to private and public corporations. It is therefore immaterial, for the purposes of this case, whether the water district involved here comes within the category of municipal corporations or is to be considered as a mere special organization created by permission of the state as an agency of the state for the performance of work which the policy of the state permits and requires to be done. In either event, the district is a corporation, and this rule is applicable to all such bodies by reason of having its foundation in the fundamental theory of corporate existence, namely, that a corporation is a distinct and independent entity brought into existence solely by sanction of law and possessing only those powers ascribed to it by law.

[3] This then brings us to a consideration of the provisions of the act under which the water district involved here was authorized and created. The act under which said water district was created provides that the petition, which may and which must, of course, be presented to the board of supervisors for the formation of the district, shall contain the name and boundaries of the proposed district, a general description of the desired improvements, the construction, installation, etc., of the waterworks, and "an estimate of the cost of the proposed improvements and of the incidental expenses in connection therewith." Following the presentation of a sufficient petition for the purpose stated, the act authorizes the board of supervisors to proceed and provide by ordinance or resolution for the holding of a special election at which there shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the proposed district "the proposition of forming such district and incurring a debt by the issuance of bonds of such district for the purposes set forth in said petition." The ordinance or resolution calling such special election must also recite "the objects and purposes for which the proposed indebtedness is to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed improvement, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor," etc. There is nothing in these provisions of the act which empowers the board of supervisors to contract and pay for legal or other services rendered to the freeholders of the proposed district in the preparation and procurement of the petition for the ultimate creation of the district, or which authorizes the board to pay for legal or other services rendered to such freeholders in the preliminary promotion of the district. Fairly construed the provision of the act requiring the petition for the creation of the district to contain "an estimate of the cost of the proposed improvements and of the incidental expenses in connection therewith" has reference, as do the required provisions of the ordinance calling the election, wholly to such expenses as are generally and incidentally necessary to the construction and the maintenance and operation of the plant and business of the proposed district after it has actually come into being as a legal entity. The language of the requirement of the act that the petition shall contain an "estimate of the cost of the proposed improvements and of the incidental expenses in connection therewith" does not in and of itself, nor when read in conjunction with other provisions of the act, indicate, as counsel for respondents contend, that the Legislature intended that the district when finally formed should pay the cost of legal advice and the expenses of preparing plans and specifications, or any other expenses incidental to the mere promotion of the district. As employed in the act, the word "incidental" must be taken in its usual and ordinary meaning and, therefore, as having reference to something which is subordinate to and dependent upon and follows the existence of another and principal thing. Webster's Dictionary; McFarlan Co. v. Potter, 21 Ind. App. 692, 51 N. E. 737. More precisely, an incident is defined to be "a thing which either usually or naturally and inseparably depends upon, appertains to or follows another that is more worthy." Bouvier. In short, a distinguishing and dominating characteristic of an incident is to be found in the fact that it always and necessarily appertains to a pre-existing and principal thing, and manifestly the pre-existing and principal thing dealt with by the act in question is the probable cost as a whole of the proposed improvement when finally formulated into a going corporate concern. This being so, the "incidental expenses in connection therewith" contemplated by the act must be those detailed expenses which naturally and necessarily appertain to and follow the estimate of the whole cost of the proposed improvements, and, being so, the conclusion is inescapable that it was no part of the legislative intent when enacting the act in question to provide for the payment for services performed in the preparation and presentation of a petition for the formation of the district. This conclusion is fortified, if need be, by a consideration of the provisions of the act permitting and prescribing the procedure for the formation of the district. Thus, the ordinance for the calling of a special election following the presentation and approval of the petition is not required to make reference to the petition other than to recite that the election shall be called for the purpose of submitting the proposition of forming the district "and incurring a debt by the issuance of bonds of such district for the purposes set forth in said petition." While the ordinance itself must also recite "the objects and purposes for which the proposed indebtedness is to be incurred," it is not required, in so far as the cost of the enterprise is concerned, to do more than set out "the estimated cost of the proposed improvement" and "the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor."

[4] Furthermore, the act provides that the money raised from the sale of bonds "shall be applied exclusively to the purposes and objects mentioned in the ordinance or resolution ordering the holding of the bond election, as aforesaid." It will be noted that "incidental expenses" incurred prior to the formation of the corporation are not called to the attention of the voters nor recited as among the purposes for which the money raised from the sale of the bonds may be expended, and, as the act provides that such money must be applied to certain designated purposes and objects and no others, then it would seem inevitably to follow that the board of supervisors are without power to expend the money raised from the sale of the bonds for the payment of expenses not designated by the act. This conclusion is not impaired by anything contained in those further provisions of the act which require to be filed with the petition for the formation of the district an undertaking in double the amount "of the probable cost of forming such district," obligating the sureties thereon to pay such cost in the event "that the formation of such district shall not be effected." True, the latter provisions of the act were apparently intended to guard against a liability on the part of the county for the "cost of forming such district" only in event of the failure of formation. Obviously, if no bond were required to cover this cost, the burden of the election, and perchance repeated elections for the same purpose, if the formation of the district failed to carry, would fall upon the county, and, having such a contingency in mind, the Legislature therefore placed the burden of the cost of forming the district, through the medium of the required undertaking, upon the promoters of the district only in the event of the failure of the formation of the district. And it may well be that the legislative intent contemplated that the burden of such cost, if the proposition carried, should be ultimately borne by the district when finally formed. However, it does not follow from this that the Legislature thereby indicated an intention that the funds of the district when organized should be resorted to for the payment of expenses incurred by individuals prior to the formation of the district. While the act does not specify the items of the "probable cost of forming such district," nevertheless there is a manifest and decided difference between the "cost of forming the district" and the "cost of proposed improvements" necessary to the operation of the district, and, when limited, as is the undertaking, specifically to the "cost of forming," it can only cover and control, it seems to us, such cost as would be necessarily and naturally incurred in putting in motion the procedure requisite for the formation of the district after the preliminary step of filing the petition has been taken; such expenses, for instance, as the cost to the county of calling and holding the required election for the submission to the voters of the proposed district of the question of forming the district.

It follows inevitably from this interpretation that the statute under which the district involved herein was organized did not bind the district to pay the expenses incurred by promoters in connection with the preparation and filing of the petition for the formation of the district.

[5] Furthermore, not only were the acts of the promoters in incurring such expenses not binding upon the corporation in and of themselves, but those acts could not be adopted by the corporation after it came into existence, for, as previously stated the statute specifies and limits the purposes for which the funds of the district may be expended, and such specification is totally devoid of any provision for the payment from said funds of expenses in connection with the petition for organization. Payment of these expenses from the funds of the district is therefore ultra vires as to the district, and an act or contract which the corporation is not legally permitted to perform cannot be ratified or adopted by such corporation, whether the corporation be private or municipal. Fletcher, Cyc. of Corporations, vol. 1, § 153; McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 3, §§ 1255, 1256. The claim of defendant Gibbon was consequently not a legal charge against the district.

[6] It will be noted that the water district in question is referred to constantly throughout the act authorizing its creation as a "county" water district, and, in this behalf, it will be further noted that the board of supervisors is made the governing body of the district after the district is created, and that the funds of the district are deposited in the county treasury to the especial account of the district and the disbursement thereof is under the control of the board of supervisors. It will thus be observed that the management of the district is, to some extent at least, a county affair, and, therefore, in the absence of more specific provision in the act, the same general rules and regulations which govern the board of supervisors in acting upon claims against the county proper must cover and control the allowance of claims against the district. The board of supervisors has jurisdiction to allow only such accounts as are "legally chargeable against the county" (Pol. Code, § 4041), and, therefore, in dealing with claims against a water district, it can have jurisdiction only to examine, settle, and allow accounts "legally chargeable" against the district.

[7] A court of law is not precluded from reviewing an allowance by a board of supervisors for the purpose of ascertaining whether the allowance of the claim was within the jurisdiction of such board. It may be conceded "that when passing upon the correctness of the claim in controversy the board of supervisors was sitting and acting as a quasi judicial body, and that therefore its conclusion that such claim should be allowed and paid was an adjudication which * * * would ordinarily be final and conclusive. * * *" Jacks v. Taylor, 24 Cal. App. 667, 671, 142 Pac. 121, 122. This, of course, is the settled and general rule in this state, but the rule presupposes jurisdiction in the board to allow the claim at all. In other words, the mere presentation of the claim was not sufficient in and of itself to clothe the board with jurisdictional power to allow it, nor did the order for its allowance in itself operate to prevent a consideration of the question by the courts as to whether or not the board did, in fact, have jurisdiction to allow the claim, and the mere fact that the claim was allowed by the board did not invest the claim with a validity which it did not theretofore possess. Jacks v. Taylor, supra. The question here raised of the power to attack the validity of an allowance of a claim by a board of supervisors is similar to the question considered in the case of Walton v. McPhetridge, 120 Cal. 440, 444, 52 Pac. 731, 733, where the court said:

"The case at bar is not one merely involving the findings of fact by a board with respect to a claim clearly chargeable against the county and within the jurisdiction of the board to allow or reject. In such a case the conclusion of the board is final, and the auditor has no discretion to disregard it. Here the question is not one of fact, but whether or not the claim is in its nature one which the board had jurisdiction to allow. The mere introduction of the written claim which appellant presented to the board, with the indorsement of allowance, does not make a prima facie case. It does not show upon its face that it is a claim chargeable against the county; and, when viewed in the light of the complaint, the contrary appears."

The claim of defendant Gibbon being in its inception and by its very nature an unauthorized and therefore illegal charge, its allowance by the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction and illegal. Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 372, 35 Pac. 153, 556; Linden v. Case, 46 Cal. 171; Los Angeles County v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 525, 35 Pac. 153, 556; Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 151, 38 Pac. 682; Kelley v. Sersanous, 5 Cal. Unrep. Cas., 485, 46 Pac. 299.

Concluding, as we do, that the claim in question was not a legal charge against the district, and therefore was beyond the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors in allowing claims against the district, it will be unnecessary for us to discuss the question as to whether or not the complaint, in the face of a general demurrer, sufficiently alleges that the claim was not presented to the board within the time required by law.

The judgment is reversed.

183 Cal. 636

Ex parte DANIELS. (Cr. 2261.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 10, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇐592(1) — Traffic regulations inconsistent with general law invalid.

While Const. art. 11, § 6, gives supremacy to municipal legislation where the municipality is acting under charter in municipal affairs and the charter of Pasadena (article 8, § 10, subsec. 27, St. 1901, p. 906; St. 1913, p. 1466) authorizes regulation of traffic upon streets, the matter is not a municipal affair in which, by the Constitution, chartered cities are given a power superior to that of the Legislature, but such power is subject to the general law of the state, and if municipal regulations are inconsistent therewith they are void.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐592(1) — Where Legislature does not act, it cannot forbid municipality from regulating traffic.

Where the Legislature does not enact traffic regulation, it cannot validly forbid municipalities from acting in the matter.

3. Constitutional law ⇐48—Statute should be construed so that it will be both valid and effective.

A statute as the motor vehicle law should be given such a construction that it will be both constitutional and effective, provided this can be done without doing violence to the language used.

4. Municipal corporations ⇐592(2) — Ordinance as to speed of vehicles void as conflicting with general law.

Under the Motor Vehicle Law, as amended in 1917 and 1919 (St. 1917, p. 382, St. 1919,

p. 223), declaring that the speed limit fixed shall be exclusive of all other limitations fixed by any law, and that local authorities shall have no power to maintain any ordinance or regulation in conflict, which after declaring that specified speeds were unreasonable under described circumstances and prescribing a maximum of 20 miles per hour, prohibited the operation of motor vehicles at unsafe and unreasonable speeds, and declared a violation of the act to be a crime, the question whether the operation of a motor vehicle was at unreasonable speed, there being no direct inhibition, is for the jury, and so a municipal ordinance, fixing a maximum speed of 15 miles per hour, is void because conflicting with the general law, and in attempting to constitute the judgment of the local authorities for that of the jury as to whether the speed was unreasonable.

5. Criminal law ⊂⊃13 — Motor Vehicle Law, which made question of unreasonable speed for jury, not uncertain.

The Motor Vehicle Law, which declared the operation of a motorcar at unreasonable speed a crime, and left the question of unreasonableness for the jury, is not invalid for indefiniteness.

6. Habeas corpus ⊂⊃95—Questions not presented will not be determined.

On habeas corpus to secure release from custody under a charge of violating municipal ordinance regulating the speed of motor vehicles, where it was contended the ordinance was void because conflicting with the general Motor Vehicle Law, the validity of a provision of the general law not presented will not be determined.

Shaw, J., and Angellotti, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by Earle M. Daniels for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to W. F. McIntyre, Chief of Police, to secure the release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violating an ordinance of the city of Pasadena, regulating the speed of automobiles. Petitioner discharged.

David R. Faries and Ivan Kelso, both of Los Angeles, John W. Stetson, of Oakland, Martin T. Forrest and Earle M. Daniels, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Jesse E. Stephens, Asst. City Atty., and James G. Leovy, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

WILBUR, J. Petitioner was charged with the offense of driving an automobile within the limits of the city of Pasadena on the 28th of April, 1919, in violation of a municipal ordinance of the city of Pasadena, prohibiting a greater rate of speed than 15 miles an hour at the place in question. It is stipulated that the Motor Vehicle Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 382), then in force, permitted the driving of a motor vehicle at a speed not exceeding 20 miles an hour at that place, and that the petitioner was not exceeding that limit. The Motor Vehicle Act of 1917 not only fixed the maximum rate of speed there at 20 miles an hour, but expressly prohibited municipalities from fixing as a maximum a lesser rate of speed. Motor Vehicle Law, St. 1915, p. 397, § 22, subd. (d), as amended by Stats. 1917, pp. 382, 406. If there is a conflict between this statute and the municipal ordinance, the question as to which controls is to be determined by the provisions of the state Constitution. When this case was originally presented it was conceded by the parties that there was a conflict between the city ordinance and the Motor Vehicle Act, and that the sole question involved in the case was whether the municipal ordinance should prevail over the statute because the matter of the regulation of traffic upon the streets of cities was a municipal affair within the meaning of the Constitution, which gave supremacy to cities acting under charters in municipal affairs. Section 6, art. 11. The court having tentatively arrived at the conclusion that the regulation of street traffic within municipalities was not a municipal affair, was impressed with the fact that the attempt of the Legislature to prohibit the enactment of municipal ordinances regulating speed might be an unconstitutional interference with the regulatory powers granted by the Constitution itself to municipalities by article 11, § 11, of the Constitution, which provides that—

"Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

That matter not having been touched upon in the original presentation, the case was placed upon the calendar for reargument, and additional briefs were submitted upon this question. The respondent upon reargument took the position that the ordinance was not in conflict with the state law, and therefore claims that, even conceding that the matter of traffic regulation is not a municipal affair, the ordinance is nevertheless valid as an exercise of police power not in conflict with general law. Since the argument of this case several matters have been presented to us bearing upon the questions involved. In Ham v. County of Los Angeles (App.) 189 Pac. 462, the appellate court, division 2, second district, determined that a county ordinance fixing a speed limit at 5 miles an hour on bridges was not in conflict with the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 639). An application for hearing in this court was denied. 189 Pac. 462. In Mann v. Scott, 182 Pac. 281, it was held that there was no conflict between the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913, which required that a motor vehicle be operated with due care and caution when it overtakes a street car which has stopped on a city street to take on or discharge persons, and be brought to a full stop if reasonably necessary for the safety of the passengers, and a municipal ordinance which required that the vehicle in all cases be stopped at a distance of 10 feet in the rear of the stopped car. It was held that the municipal ordinance merely imposed new and additional regulations in furtherance of the general purpose of the law. In Helmer v. Superior Court of the County of Sacramento, 191 Pac. 1001, decided by the appellate court of the first district, it was held that the regulation of street traffic was not a municipal affair within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and this court, having reached the conclusion that it was not a municipal affair, denied a petition for transfer to this court. In view of these decisions it will only be necessary for us to briefly indicate our reasons for the conclusion that the regulation of street traffic is not a municipal affair within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution, which gives supremacy to the city in municipal affairs. It is the usual practice throughout the United States to delegate to municipalities power to regulate street traffic within the municipality. This practice is followed by the city of Pasadena, whose charter expressly authorizes such control. Charter of Pasadena, art. 8, § 10, subd. 27; Stats. 1901, p. 906; Id. art. 13, § 1; Stats. 1913, p. 1466.

[1] The streets of a city belong to the people of the state, and every citizen of the state has a right to the use thereof, subject to legislative control. People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 223, 232, 37 Pac. 203, 26 L. R. A. 659; Elliott on Roads and Streets, §§ 25, 505, 543, 544, 1112, 1115; Dillon on Mun. Corps. (5th Ed.) vol. 3, § 1122. The right of control over street traffic is an exercise of a part of the sovereign power of the state. Elliott on Roads and Streets, sections cited supra. While it is true that the regulation of traffic upon a public street is of special interest to the people of a municipality, it does not follow that such regulation is a municipal affair, and if there is a doubt as to whether or not such regulation is a municipal affair, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the legislative authority of the state. The rule is that—

"Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 587, 84 Pac. 41, 42, citing Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 157, 38 Pac. 682; Dillon on Mun. Corp. §§ 89, 91.

See sections 237, 239, Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.); Gassner v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 82, 84, 116 Pac. 73; Oro Electric Corp. v. Railroad Comn., 169 Cal. 466, 477, 147 Pac. 118; Hayne v. San Francisco, 174 Cal. 185, 186, 162 Pac. 625; City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 175 Cal. 575, 166 Pac. 333. In dealing with a conflict between state and local legislation on the subject of street traffic the Supreme Court of Oregon in State ex rel. v. Port of Astoria, 79 Or. 1, 10, 154 Pac. 399, 402, thus expressed the rule:

"While the prime purpose is to ascertain and give effect to the intention as expressed in the language employed, yet the two sections now being considered are designed to grant attributes of sovereignty to specified local subdivisions; and, such grant being a limitation on the power of the Legislature, it should be strictly construed, as was properly held in Thurber v. McMinnville, 63 Or. 410."

The same rule of construction has been applied in dealing with the powers of municipalities in those states which recognize that municipalities have certain inherent powers, and there great reluctance has been expressed to interfere with the legislative assumption of authority in a case where the rights of a municipality were so difficult of ascertainment, "because of the manifest impossibility of indicating any distinct boundary to the powers which may lawfully be exercised by the Legislature in matters of local concern; an embarrassment much more serious than can possibly exist in most cases where a distinct and specific inhibition of the Constitution is supposed to be disregarded. * * * Under such circumstances, with no unmistakable signs to guide us between the domain of state and local powers, it becomes us to exercise more than the usual caution not to refuse the sanction of judicial authority to legislation which is supposed to have exceeded a boundary so difficult to locate and define." People v. Common Council of Detroit, 29 Mich. 108. See, also, People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103; People v. Common Council of Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202; Indiana Ry. Co. v. Calvert, 168 Ind. 321, 324, 80 N. E. 961, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 780, 11 Ann. Cas. 635. Under the Constitution of Oklahoma it has been held that in municipal matters the charter supersedes the general laws of the state in conflict therewith (Owen v. Tulsa, 27 Okl. 264, 111 Pac. 320; Lackey v. Grant, 29 Okl. 255, 116 Pac. 913; Mitchell v. Carter, 31 Okl. 592, 122 Pac. 691; Oklahoma Ry. Co. v. Powell, 33 Okl. 737, 127 Pac. 1080; In re Simmons, 4 Okl. Cr. 662, 112 Pac. 951), but that such charter cannot conflict with the general laws of the state (State ex rel. Burns v. Linn, 49 Okl. 526, 153 Pac. 826, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 139). Notwithstanding this holding that the charter powers of the city are supreme in municipal matters, in Ex parte Shaw, 53 Okl. 654, 157 Pac. 900, it was held that the state law regulating traffic controlled local ordinances in conflict therewith. In a recent case the Supreme Court of Oregon has held that the ordinances of municipalities are supreme under the Constitution of that state and supersede the state legislation on that subject within the municipality. The Constitution of that state, however, is so different from ours that that decision is not authority for the construction of our Constitution. We, therefore, conclude that the regulation of traffic upon the streets of a city is not one of those municipal affairs in which by the Constitution chartered cities are given a power superior to that of the state Legislature, but that such power is subject to the general laws of the state, and if inconsistent therewith are invalid.

[2-4] We will now consider whether or not there is such a conflict. The Legislature which met in January, 1915, added the following clauses, which were subsequently incorporated in the legislation of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 406) and 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 223):

"Limitations as to the rate of speed herein fixed shall be exclusive of all other limitations fixed by any law of this state or any political subdivision thereof. Local authorities shall have no power to enact, enforce or maintain any ordinance, rule or regulation in any way in conflict with, contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of this act, * * * and no such ordinance, rule or regulation of said local authorities heretofore or hereafter enacted shall have any force or effect, excepting, however" in certain matters which need not now be considered.

It must, of course, be conceded that a mere prohibition by the state Legislature of local legislation upon the subject of the use of the streets, without any affirmative act of the Legislature occupying that legislative field, would be unconstitutional and in violation of the express authority granted by the state Constitution to the municipality to enact local regulations. In other words, an act by the state Legislature in general terms that the local legislative body would have no power to enact local, police, sanitary, or other regulations, while in a sense a general law, would have for its effective purpose the nullification of the constitutional grant, and therefore be invalid. City of Freemont v. Keating, 96 Ohio St. 468, 118 N. E. 114, holding invalid section 6307 of the General Code. But it was contemplated by the constitutional provision in question that the state Legislature had the absolute right by general law to enact statutes which would have validity in all parts of the state, including municipalities, and, having done so, local laws in conflict therewith ipso facto become void. The legislative declaration that "local authorities shall have no power to pass, enforce or maintain any ordinance, rule or regulation in any way in conflict with, contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of this act," amounts to no more than the similar constitutional declaration that general laws control municipal police regulations. Article 11, § 11. If it were to be construed as an attempt to limit the power of local legislative bodies to pass regulations not inconsistent with such general law, it would of course be unconstitutional. The provision that "limitations as to the rate of speed herein fixed shall be exclusive of all other limitations fixed by any law of this state or any political subdivision thereof," in so far as it would operate to prohibit municipalities from passing regulations not inconsistent with the general law would for the same reason be unconstitutional. We are bound, however, in the construction of this section of the Motor Vehicle Act to give it a construction which will be both constitutional and effective if it can be done without violence to the language used. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature to declare that the limitation upon speed fixed in the law shall be the only limitation controlling the conduct of the driver of a motor vehicle upon the streets and highways of the state. The intent of the Legislature in adopting this general scheme for the control of motor vehicles upon the public highways of the state, for the collection of licenses and the appropriation thereof to the improvement of highways, is not to be measured alone by the language used, but by the whole purpose and scope of the legislative scheme. It cannot be doubted that the Legislature, in enacting section 22d with relation to the authority of municipalities to regulate speed, intended to occupy the whole field of traffic regulation, and in construing these prohibitory clauses relating to the powers of local legislative bodies, such provisions should not be ignored as unconstitutional, if a reasonable or even a strained construction can be adopted which would give them a constitutional effect. The Legislature, however, having complete control of the highways of the state, has as much right by general law to make it lawful to travel 10 miles per hour as to make it unlawful to travel 15 miles an hour. It seems to have been the legislative purpose, by the declaration that "the limitations as to the rate of speed herein fixed shall be exclusive of all other limitations," to authorize vehicles to travel at those limits within cities and counties. Indeed, as all the highways of the state are within either counties or municipalities, and as both have the same legislative power under article 11, section 11, of the Constitution, the purpose of the Legislature to prevent a reduction of speed limits, and a consequent lack of uniformity in such, is apparent. If this was the legislative purpose, such enactment is clearly within the scope of their constitutional power, and local ordinances, fixing other and different rates of speed, ipso facto conflict with the state legislation. The difficulty in determining whether or not the state Legislature has occupied the whole field of traffic regulation results in part from the form of the legislation. The Legislature did not, in terms, authorize a vehicle to travel at any time at the maximum speed limit fixed by the statute for different localities, but prohibited the operation of motor vehicles at any time or place at an unsafe and unreasonable rate of speed (section 22a), and in effect declares that the speeds of 35, 30, 20, 15, and 10 miles an hour, are, under circumstances described in the ordinance, unreasonable and unsafe, and therefore that it shall be unlawful to operate a motor vehicle in excess of such speeds. It is made a crime to violate any of the provisions of the act (Motor Vehicle Act, section 32, Stats. 1917, p. 410; section 32a, Stats. 1919, p. 225), and therefore a crime to operate a motor vehicle at a dangerous and unsafe rate of speed at any time within the state. This legislation would seem to occupy the whole field of traffic regulation. But it is contended that, in so far as there is an attempt to make criminal the operation of a motor vehicle at an unreasonable rate of speed, the law is so uncertain as to be void, and that, therefore in so far as the statute attempts in terms to make it a misdemeanor to operate a motor vehicle at an unreasonable and unsafe speed, the law is unconstitutional, and that the city may enact legislation to fill this hiatus in the law. On the other hand, it is argued that the law is valid, and, the state having prohibited unreasonable speed, no ordinance of the city can make any different or other prohibition, for the reason that every ordinance must be reasonable, and to prohibit a reasonable speed would be unreasonable, and that therefore no ordinance can be enacted except to prohibit the very thing prohibited by the state law, namely, exceeding a reasonable speed. In effect, however, the local ordinance fixing a different speed limit from that contained in the Motor Vehicle Act is a declaration of the local legislative body, to the effect that to exceed the limit thus fixed would be unreasonable. This legislative declaration would be binding upon the courts in the absence of a clear violation of the legislative power. Courts go to great extent in upholding the exercise of such power where it exists. Ex parte McKenna, 126 Cal. 429, 58 Pac. 916; Ex parte Berry, 147 Cal. 523, 82 Pac. 44. In the prosecution for a violation of the state law, the question of whether or not the speed traveled is unreasonable and unsafe is a matter for the consideration of the jury, and the scheme of the Legislature authorizes the submission of this question to a jury in a criminal case, called upon to pass upon the guilt or innocence of a person charged with traveling at an unreasonable speed. The effect of a local ordinance is to foreclose the question of the reasonableness of the speed, and to substitute the judgment of the local legislative body for the judgment of a jury. It is evident that the two plans are in direct conflict, and that the conflict is a very material one. Under the state law a motor vehicle driver, provided he keeps within the limits expressly fixed by law, is only confronted with the problem of keeping his vehicle at a speed which reasonable men would conclude to be a reasonable speed. While, on the other hand, he is confronted with an arbitrary rule fixed by a local legislative body, so that he would be wholly within his rights in traveling at a speed of 14.9 miles, and violating a criminal law if traveling at a speed of 15.1 miles, whereas, in fact, it might be much more reasonable to travel at a speed of 15.1 miles sometimes on that particular highway than to travel at a slower rate of speed at other times when the traffic was more congested. The tremendous difference between the two systems of legislation is emphasized by the fact that each county in the state has the same legislative power under the Constitution (article 11, section 11) as every city. Thus, every highway in the state, as well as every city street, is subject to local legislative control; and, while the Legislature has authorized the citizens of the state to travel upon the highways thereof at a speed which is not unreasonable and unsafe, every part of a trip from Siskiyou to San Diego would be controlled by arbitrary speed limits fixed by legislative bodies whose action he is presumed to know, but of which he is much more likely to be totally unaware. The difficulty is increased by the fact that while the state Legislature meets but once in two years and the people of the state not only take notice of the time and place of the meeting, but make an effort to ascertain the results of its deliberations, in the case of local communities the legislative bodies are frequently in continuous session, and, if not, meet at frequent intervals, and can pass regulations of which the general public has no information and of which the courts, other than the police courts of the particular municipalities, will not take judicial notice. It seems, then, that local legislation which determines the question of what speed is reasonable and which forecloses that question in a judicial investigation, is in direct conflict with the legislative scheme by which that question is left open for the determination of a jury. If the Legislature had merely fixed the maximum speed limit, it is clear that local legislation fixing a lesser speed limit would not be in conflict therewith, but would be merely an additional regulation. Ham v. Los Angeles County, supra; Ex parte Hoffman, 155 Cal. 118, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75. If we seek to uphold the local legislation by concluding that it is not in conflict with the state law for the reason that the ordinance, as well as the state law, prohibits an unreasonable speed, we are met with the proposition that a local ordinance cannot prohibit exactly the same thing prohibited by the state law and still be valid (In re Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405), and the invalidity of such an ordinance is emphasized by the fact that under the scheme of state legislation contained in the Motor Vehicle Act the fines and penalties imposed for its violation are placed in a special fund for the improvement of highways, whereas if imposed for the violation of a municipal ordinance they go into the municipal treasury. Or, if both are valid, a man by traveling at an unreasonable rate of speed has committed two offenses instead of one—one against the municipality and the other against the state. We conclude, then, that section 22d of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 evidences an intent on the part of the Legislature that the restriction that the speed cannot be unreasonable and unsafe shall be the test of the legality of the speed at any place within the state, and that this involves the right to have that question determined by a jury rather than by a local legislative body.

[5, 6] We have so far assumed that the state law prohibiting an unreasonable speed is not too uncertain to be a valid criminal statute. Numerous authorities are cited upon the question as to whether or not the criminal law therein considered is too uncertain to be enforced. We will not undertake to review the authorities cited on this subject, but will call attention only to those which in our judgment clearly establish the validity of such legislation. In this connection it may be stated that there has been a tendency to a much more liberal construction of such statutes in the more recent decisions, and this may in part be the result of more humane and liberal methods of dealing with those who are convicted of crime, and in part from the wide field now covered by the criminal law. In the Standard Oil Case, 221 U. S. 1, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, the Supreme Court of the United States, in interpreting the anti-trust law, adopted what has been characterized as the "rule of reason," holding that this law "really was not a denial of all restraint of trade, but only a denial of an unreasonable restraint of trade," thus leaving to courts and juries the determination of what restraints of trade were unreasonable. It is scarcely to be assumed that this court would read into a statute by construction a provision which, had it been included therein at the time of its enactment, would have rendered the statute void and unconstitutional, because of the uncertainty involved in the use of the very term read into it by the court, namely "reason." In People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 50 Pac. 376, the defendant was charged with killing the deceased by driving through the streets of Biggs in a reckless manner and at a great and unusual rate of speed. It was held proper to submit to the jury the question of whether or not the defendant had committed manslaughter in the performance of a lawful act "without due care and circumspection." In Schultz v. State, 89 Neb. 34, 130 N. W. 972, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 495, a provision of a motor vehicle act identical with that of the California law was held constitutional. A similar statute was held constitutional in State v. Campbell, 82 Conn. 671, 74 Atl. 927, 135 Am. St. Rep. 293, 18 Ann. Cas. 236, and in State v. Schaeffer, 96 Ohio St. 215, 117 N. E. 220, L. R. A. 1918B, 945, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1137. An ordinance similar in terms was held constitutional in Hood and W. Furniture Co. v. Royal, 200 Ala. 607, 76 South. 965; Fitzsimmons v. Snyder, 181 Ill. App. 70; State v. Welford, 69 Iowa, 467, 29 N. W. 450; People v. Lloyd, 178 Ill. App. 66; Commonwealth v. Cassidy, 209 Mass. 24, 95 N. E. 214; Chrestenson v. Harms, 38 S. D. 360, 161 N. W. 343. See, also, United States v. Knight, 26 Phil. 217. Upon the authority of these cases and our own case of People v. Pearne, supra, we must hold that the provision making it unlawful to travel at an unreasonable or unsafe speed and punishing the violation of such law as a crime is valid and constitutional legislation, although there are cases holding to the contrary. Hayes v. State, 11 Ga. App. 371, 75 S. E. 523. The recent case of Mann v. Scott, supra, is not opposed to the view herein expressed, for that decision is based upon the proposition (page 283) that—

> "It follows that a conflict, if any, can exist only upon the theory that the ordinance prohibits that which is affirmatively authorized by the Motor Vehicle Act. In short, the appellants are placed under the necessity of contending that that act affirmatively authorizes motor vehicles to pass a stopping street car in a city whenever the apparent risk involved in so doing would not deter an ordinarily prudent and careful driver. We do not so construe the statute."

In this case the petitioner had a right to drive on the highway at a speed that was reasonable and proper under all the circumstances, and the fixing of an arbitrary speed limit by the city authorities restricted that right, and was therefore in conflict with that right. If the statute had expressly provided that the driver of a motor vehicle could pass a standing street car whenever it was reasonable and proper so to do, and thus affirmatively authorize him to proceed, the situation would be more nearly parallel. We conclude that the city ordinance of Pasadena, fixing a speed limit of 15 miles an hour, is in direct conflict with the state law, and therefore void.

It is proper to say that the Motor Vehicle Act purports to authorize the state highway commission to establish less rates of speed than those provided in the law itself in traversing bridges, viaducts, etc. Motor Vehicle Act, Stats. 1919, p. 221, § 22. No point is made by the parties with reference to this feature of the act, and we deem it unnecessary to consider the questions of law which might result from this situation, in view of the fact that the same has not been argued or presented. We make this observation solely for the purpose of showing that this point has not escaped our attention, and that it is not decided.

Petitioner discharged.

OLNEY, J. I concur. The main opinion might, however, be taken as holding that the conflict between the city ordinance and the state law, which renders the former invalid, was between the provision of the ordinance fixing a maximum speed of 15 miles an hour and the provision of the state law that no one should travel at an unsafe speed. I do not so view the matter. The conflict in my judgment is with the provision of the state law fixing a different maximum, that of 20 miles an hour. Two things are essential for any law effectively regulating the rates of speed on highways. One is that no one shall exceed a certain speed. The other is that no one shall drive at a speed that is actually unsafe under the conditions which exist at the particular time and place. The two things are quite distinct, and the state law endeavors to provide for both. If the provision of the city ordinance fixing a maximum is in conflict with the state law, it is with the provision of the latter which fixes a different maximum, not with the provision that no one shall drive at an unsafe speed, maximum or no maximum.

If the state law merely provided a maximum which should not be exceeded, without any expression of intention affirmatively to authorize any speed not unsafe less than the maximum, it might well be held under the authority of the milk ordinance case and Mann v. Scott, referred to in the main opinion, that a city ordinance, fixing a lesser maximum, was not in conflict with it. But this is not, in my judgment, the true construction of the state law. It provides that a man traveling the road shall not travel at an unsafe rate of speed, and in no case in excess of a certain maximum, and also that no other limitation shall be put upon him. This prohibition of any other limitation, viewed purely as a prohibition upon municipalities and counties, is undoubtedly void. Cities and counties have the right given them by the Constitution to pass local regulations not in conflict with the state law, and this right the Legislature cannot prohibit them from exercising.

But the prohibition here involved is not to be viewed solely as a prohibition upon counties and municipalities. It is a prohibition designed for the regulation of the speed of those traveling the highways, and clearly designed for the purpose of permitting such parties to travel subject only to the regulations as to rate of speed provided by the state law. Putting it in another way, if the state law had read that a man traveling the highway should not exceed a certain speed, but should have the right to travel up to that speed, provided it was not unsafe for him to do so under the immediate surrounding conditions, there would have been no prohibition on counties and municipalities involved, and no question as to the validity of such prohibition would have arisen. Nevertheless, any local ordinance fixing a lesser maximum would be invalid, as plainly in conflict with the provision of the state law authorizing any speed not unsafe up to the maximum fixed by it. Now, the only difference between such a reading of the state law and its actual reading is that the permission to travel at any speed, not unsafe, up to the maximum fixed, instead of being couched in the affirmative, is put in the negative. The traveler is told, you may not travel at an unsafe speed and you may not exceed a certain speed—safe or unsafe—but any other limitation upon you is prohibited. This can mean but one thing, and that is that the traveler is authorized to travel at any rate of speed he desires, provided he does not travel at an unsafe rate or exceed the limit fixed. It is merely putting in a negative and roundabout way what could better have been said directly and affirmatively. With such a law a city ordinance fixing another and a lower limit is plainly in conflict.

SHAW, J. I dissent. Daniels is charged with driving an automobile faster than 15 miles an hour over the Colorado street bridge in Pasadena, in violation of two city ordinances, one forbidding a speed over 15 miles an hour upon any bridge in the city, the other a speed over 10 miles an hour upon that bridge. The Motor Vehicle Act forbids "a greater rate of speed than twenty miles an hour" at any place in a street "where the territory contiguous thereto is closely built up." The Colorado street bridge is contiguous to such territory. The question is whether the general law or the ordinances shall prevail.

Section 11, article 11, of the Constitution provides that—

"Any county, city, town or township, may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

Section 6, article 11, makes city charters and ordinances upon "municipal affairs" paramount, as to such affairs, to general laws, in all cities organized under a freeholders' charter. Pasadena is a city of that character. If the matter of the speed to be allowed in the streets of a city is a municipal affair, section 6, of course, settles this case. Assuming, however, for the present, that it is an affair not wholly municipal, I am of the opinion that these ordinances do not conflict with the Motor Vehicle Act, and consequently that they are valid under section 11 of the article.

It is a settled rule of decision in this state that where, upon any matter subject to the police power, a city ordinance makes a local regulation tending to afford greater protection to the safety or health of the people than is given by the general laws regulating the same matter, such city ordinance is not in conflict with the general law. Thus a city ordinance, requiring that all milk sold within the city shall contain at least 3½ per cent. of butter fat, does not conflict with a general law requiring that all milk sold shall contain at least 3 per cent. of butter fat. Ex parte Hoffman, 155 Cal. 118, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75. So, also, a county ordinance, limiting the rate of speed of vehicles upon bridges to 5 miles an hour, is not in conflict with a state law fixing a higher rate as a maximum speed limit thereon. Ham v. Los Angeles Co., 189 Pac. 462. And a city ordinance, requiring that automobiles overtaking a street car which has stopped to discharge passengers shall stop 10 feet behind the street car, does not conflict with a general law, requiring an automobile approaching or passing such car to be operated with due car and caution, and to come to a full stop, if reasonably necessary for the safety of such passengers. Mann v. Scott, 182 Pac. 281. This proposition is apparently conceded by the majority opinion. It does not purport to overrule the decisions above cited, though, in my opinion, it wholly disregards them. The soundness of the principle is obvious, and the reasons for it are nowhere better stated than in Ex parte Hoffman, supra. They need not be here repeated. The present case, upon this point, cannot be distinguished from Ham v. Los Angeles, supra. A petition for rehearing in this court in that case on that point was denied, and it is virtually a decision of this court.

Another rule, equally sound and obvious, is that the Legislature cannot, by general law, purporting merely to forbid the exercise by a county, city, town, or township of the police powers conferred upon it by section 11, article 11, of the Constitution take away or impair such local police power. This, also, the majority opinion admits. It is too plain for argument that the "general laws," in order to conflict with such local police regulations, must themselves contain regulations applicable to the same subject and inconsistent with the local regulations. A general law which does not in itself regulate a particular act, but which expressly or by implication provides that there shall be no local regulation thereof, would be a legislative attempt to nullify the constitutional grant to the local bodies politic, and would be to that extent invalid. In such a case the local power would remain, and local regulations would be valid.

The Motor Vehicle Act declares that—

"Limitations as to the rate of speed herein fixed shall be exclusive of all other limitations fixed by any law of this state of any political subdivision thereof." Section 22, subd. (d); Stats. 1917, 404.

It is admitted that this provision, if taken by itself, is void, so far as it relates to the local speed regulations of a city. The provision immediately following it, to the effect that local authorities may not make regulations "in conflict with, contrary to or inconsistent with" the provisions of the act, is itself inoperative, so far as it purports to limit such local authority, for it is a mere repetition of the Constitution on that point. In order to limit the powers of cities the law must provide regulations inconsistent with, and not merely prohibitive of, city regulations.

The majority opinion, while admitting that the Legislature cannot, by its mere declaration, forbid the exercise by a city of its police power under section 11, article 11, concludes that it can do so indirectly, in the matter of speed, by first fixing the maximum speed allowable in certain described conditions, and then declaring its own limitations to be "exclusive of all other limitations." This it finds to be the equivalent of a law affirmatively authorizing any speed up to the specified maximums under the respective conditions, and it declares that such an enactment by the Legislature "is clearly within the scope of their constitutional power."

I am unable to see why the original admission does not destroy the final conclusion on this point. The fact that more than 20 miles an hour is unsafe in closely built-up territory, and must for that reason be forbidden there (and this is the effect of that clause of the act), is in no wise inconsistent with the fact that more than 15 miles an hour is unsafe upon a bridge, or with the fact that more than 10 miles an hour is unsafe in going over a high and crooked bridge. Hence the legislative declaration that no one shall go more than 20 miles an hour along a road closely built up, does not conflict with the municipal declaration that it is unsafe for any one to go more than 15 miles an hour over any bridge or more than 10 miles an hour over a certain bridge which is high and crooked. Just as richer milk is better than poorer and may therefore be required by local authority, notwithstanding the general law fixing the lower standard, so the slower speed is safer than the higher speed upon bridges, and may be required by local authority, notwithstanding the general law fixing a lower standard of safety. The additional legislative declaration that its own limitation of speed shall be exclusive of all municipal speed limitations is entirely distinct and separable from the regulatory clause, and is nothing but a legislative attempt to prevent a city from exercising the police power given to it by the Constitution.

This difficulty was apparently perceived, though not admitted, by the majority, for the conclusion that the Motor Vehicle Act prevails over local speed regulations is finally put upon the ground that by another provision of the act the "state Legislature has occupied the whole field of traffic regulation," leaving nothing for the local authorities to regulate. This provision is found in the opening clause of section 22, and it reads as follows:

"Any person operating or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highways shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate, or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property; provided, that it shall be unlawful to operate or drive at a rate of speed" in excess of certain maximum rates fixed for particular conditions described, including the 20 miles an hour provision in question.

There are, in my opinion, two reasons showing that this clause does not "occupy the whole field" as the majority of the Justices say it does.

First, the other provisions of the section force the conclusion that the Legislature itself did not so understand it, and especially that it was not considered a sufficient regulation to meet the varying needs of different local conditions, particularly upon bridges. The same subdivision contains a further proviso purporting to authorize the state highway commission to establish "the maximum rate of speed over any bridge, dam, trestle, culvert, causeway or viaduct," at less than the "rate established by law," whenever in its judgment the safety of persons or the protection of the highway "shall be promoted thereby." If the act had already "occupied the whole field" of regulation, there would have been no occasion for this clause. The insertion thereof in the act shows conclusively that the Legislature did not believe that the opening clause, in connection with the maximum speed clauses following it, "occupied the whole field" of speed regulation, but did believe that further speed regulations adapted to local conditions would be necessary to insure or promote the safety of persons and property, and that for that reason it attempted to empower said commission to prescribe the regulations appropriate to the varying local needs.

Second, the language of the opening clause is too vague, uncertain, and indefinite to constitute a sufficient definition of a public offense. Who shall decide whether the rate of speed is "greater than is reasonable and proper" or so great as "to endanger the life" of a person or the safety of property, in the particular circumstances? The conditions are often very complicated. The driver at a crowded crossing, for example, is generally confronted with the necessity of choosing between several alternatives, and must decide in an instant which alternative to take and at what speed to drive to escape the greater danger. The clause reads like an instruction to a jury in an action for damages, rather than a penal statute, laying down a rule of action for the future and defining the kind of acts that are to be denounced as criminal. It calls for the constant application of the well-known rule that a person suddenly meeting an unexpected danger is not expected to choose his alternatives as wisely as one having time for observation and deliberation, or as a jury reviewing his conduct in the light of the often conflicting and always confusing testimony of excited eyewitnesses. One person might believe the speed excessive, another that it was too slow. The ultimate decision by a jury or judge could never be foreseen. Two persons might participate in the same act of driving, and might be tried separately. One jury would deem the speed dangerous, and convict one of them; another jury, upon the same evidence, might believe it safe, or reasonably "careful and prudent," and so acquit the other participant. The provision, in its practical effect, with regard to speed, is that no person shall drive at a speed which the jury that tries him, upon hearing the evidence, shall consider fast enough to endanger life, limb, or property. No person could know whether or not he had committed an offense, until after the verdict. The rule is that penal statutes are strictly construed, and that in order to be valid the offense must be so defined that a person of ordinary understanding may know therefrom when he is violating its provisions. Ex parte Jackson, 45 Ark. 158; Czarra v. Dist. of Col., 25 App. D. C. 443; State v. Gaster, 45 La. Ann. 636, 12 South. 739; Augustine v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 59, 52 S. W. 77, 96 Am. St. Rep. 765. "Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime." U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 220, 23 L. Ed. 563.

It is open to at least grave doubt whether or not the Legislature intended to declare a violation of this clause to be a criminal offense, at least with regard to bridges. Section 32 declares that any person who violates any provision of the act is guilty of a misdemeanor. But the opening clause of section 22 does not forbid any specific rate of speed, and the section contains no express prohibition of speed less than the respective maximums specified therein. It leaves all lower speeds over bridges and the like, as we have seen, to the regulation of the commission. Since section 32 does not declare it to be a misdemeanor to violate a regulation of the state highway commission on the subject, it is reasonable to suppose that the mere act of driving over a bridge, contrary to such regulation of the commission, was not intended to be denounced as criminal.

If the provision of section 22 purporting to empower the commission to prescribe lower rates of speed over bridges, in connection with the penal clause of section 32, was intended to make the violation of a regulation of the commission a misdemeanor, and was valid in that respect, it might be argued with much force that the "whole field of regulation" was occupied by the general law. But if that provision of section 22 is so intended, it is invalid. It is an attempted delegation to the commission of the legislative power to define criminal offenses, and as such it is beyond the power of the Legislature. All legislative power is vested by the people in the Legislature and in local political subdivisions of the state. Const. art. 4, § 1; art. 11. The function of defining public offenses requires the exercise of a discretion which the people have committed exclusively to the Legislature and the local authorities named. It cannot be transferred by the Legislature to any state commission of its own creation. No proposition is better settled than this. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624; Ex parte Cox, 63 Cal. 21; Harbor Com'rs v. Excelsior Co., 88 Cal. 491, 26 Pac. 375, 22 Am. St. Rep. 321; Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 313; Hardenburg v. Kidd, 10 Cal. 402; Ford v. Harbor Com'rs, 81 Cal. 36, 22 Pac. 278; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 163; 12 Cor. Jur. 839.

Furthermore, the regulation and control of the use of streets within a city should not be made a matter exclusively of general concern, but should be classed as, at least in part, a "municipal affair," within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 6, article 11, of the Constitution. The cities lay out and improve the streets and build the bridges and viaducts. The cost is paid out of funds raised either by general city taxation or by assessments on adjacent private property specially benefited. It is settled that the doing of these things is a municipal affair in which city ordinances prevail over general laws. Sunset, etc., Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 281, 118 Pac. 796; Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 60 Pac. 433; Fritz v. San Francisco, 132 Cal. 376, 64 Pac. 566; Banaz v. Smith, 133 Cal. 102, 65 Pac. 309; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 696, 76 Pac. 661. The cities have the power and it is their duty to keep in repair the city streets, bridges, and viaducts. As a part of that power they should have the right to make all regulations concerning their use that are reasonably necessary to protect them from injury, and so keep down the expense of repairs. They cannot effectively do this if the state may by general laws provide exclusive regulations. The conditions of local use and local situations will of necessity be so variable and will be subject to such frequent changes in different parts of the state that no general law could be framed that would adequately provide for the necessities of each case. Again, many different uses are made of streets that are peculiar to cities and which vary in different cities, according to local customs and desires, such as the projection of awnings, the setting of poles for power and lighting wires and lamps, the laying of conduits and car rails, and the excavation of areas under sidewalks for access to basements. All of these are held to be municipal affairs upon which ordinances of a city operating under a freeholder's charter are superior to general laws. Sunset, etc., Co. v. Pasadena, supra. This well-considered case appears to have escaped the notice of the majority. Yet if the majority opinion expresses the law, that case stands tacitly overruled on that point, and it is within the power of the Legislature at any time to enact a general law attempting to regulate all such uses, and such law would supersede and suspend all municipal ordinances on the subject in every city in the state. The present Motor Vehicle Act concedes to each city the right to regulate traffic at crowded street crossings therein. But if the majority opinion is correct, this is not a municipal affair, and the state could make its own regulations for such places, and provide its own officers to enforce them, and if the regulations proved wholly inadequate, or the enforcement thereof wholly inefficient, the only recourse of the people of the city would be to await the next sitting of the Legislature, in the hope that out of the inevitably conflicting demands of different localities some sort of relief would be provided by a general law. It is, in my opinion, indisputable that in this state regulations of this kind have always hitherto been regarded as "municipal affairs," and that that phrase was so understood and used in the amendment of section 6, article 11, in 1896, with the intent to make such regulations paramount to general laws.

BLAKE v. ARP. (Civ. 3264.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃883(11)—Contribution not maintainable under statute.

Proceeding by a judgment debtor to have set off against the judgment the amount of a judgment rendered against him, plaintiff, and another, which he had paid in full, by motion in the action in which plaintiff recovered judgment, cannot be maintained as proceeding to enforce contribution, under Code Civ. Proc. § 709, where the claim was not filed with the clerk within 10 days as required by that section.

2. Judgment ⊂⊃883(6)—Payor of joint judgment cannot set off amount against judgment owed by him.

The rule that courts under their equitable powers will allow the owner of a judgment to set off the amount against a judgment owned by his judgment debtor against him applies only to existing judgments, and does not authorize one who paid a joint judgment against himself and two others to set off the amount in whole or in part against a judgment held by one of the others against him.

Where the parties stipulated that their appeals from the same order be heard on the same record, and considered together, separate orders are not required.

E. F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, for plaintiff.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for defendant.

JAMES, J. Both plaintiff and defendant appear as appellants in this action, neither being satisfied with the order made in the superior court. On the 25th day of October, 1915, plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant for a considerable sum of money. On the 3d day of June, 1919, plaintiff assigned this judgment to one Cohn. On January 9, 1917, in an action brought against the plaintiff and defendant here and one Hewitt, judgment was recovered in the sum of $1,050, with interest and costs. An appeal was taken from that judgment by defendant, Arp, and the judgment was thereafter affirmed, and it was fully paid by Arp about July 1, 1919. In the transcript there appears a notice of motion, made under the title of the first-mentioned action, which notice recited that Arp—

"will on Monday, the 14th day of July, 1919, * * * move the said court for an order directing the clerk to enter partial satisfaction in the sum of $1,313.30 of the judgment heretofore entered herein in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $2,100, together with interest, and $138.85 costs. * * * Said motion will be made on the ground that the defendant has paid on account of the judgment entered in the action the sum of $1,313.30 in satisfaction of the judgment recovered in the said action of Ransch v. Arp, and on the ground that the judgment in the last-mentioned action was for the recovery of the debt, which was owing and payable by the plaintiff herein, and not owing by the defendant herein, and which in equity and good conscience ought to be paid by the plaintiff herein."

This notice appears to be dated July 7, 1919, but the record does not disclose the date of filing thereof by the clerk. The record does show, however, that the motion came on to be heard on the 2d day of September, 1919, and the court made its order, being the order from which the appeals are taken herein. This order directed—

"the clerk of the court to enter partial satisfaction of the judgment herein to the extent of the sum of $437.77, being one-third of the amount paid by said Arp in full satisfaction of the judgment entered in the said action of Ransch v. Arp et al."

The following also appears in the printed transcript as a part of the record:

"It being also stipulated in open court that the record in the clerk's office in this case on the hearing of said motion that no notice of payment of said judgment was filed by James Arp with the clerk of said court within 10 days after his payment of said judgment, or at any other time claiming contribution or repayment under section 709 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California."

The cause of dissatisfaction of the plaintiff with the order made is, as contended by her, that the motion should not have been granted at all; defendant is dissatisfied because the court granted the motion allowing a credit of one-third of the amount which he had paid in the second judgment only, instead of offsetting the whole thereof against the judgment in the case of Blake v. Arp.

[1] In the view we take of the matter, it will be unnecessary to consider the effect which the assignment by Blake of her judgment had upon the rights of Arp, or as to whether there is merit in plaintiff's contention that the second judgment was not one on account of which contribution could be claimed against her. The procedure adopted by the defendant Arp was not one appropriate to enforce contribution under the provisions of section 709, Code of Civil Procedure, for it does not appear that he proceeded as required under that section. Aside from the fact that the papers which he filed were not appropriate in their form or substance to make effectual any such claim, it was expressly stipulated that a claim for contribution, required to be filed within 10 days with the clerk of the court under the provisions of section 709, was not so filed. The right given by section 709 is purely statutory, and is designed to furnish a means whereby a defendant, against whom a judgment has been entered and paid, may enforce claim for contribution in a proper case without resort to suit.

"It simply provides a convenient method of enforcing contribution by a judgment debtor who has paid a judgment as against a codefendant or codefendants liable for a proportion of the debt." Dow v. Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Co., 162 Cal. 136, 121 Pac. 379; San Joaquin Valley Bank v. Gate City O. Co., 36 Cal. App. 791, 173 Pac. 781.

[2] The procedure adopted by the defendant would have been appropriate in a case where one judgment was sought to be set off against another, to effect which result it must appear that there are judgments in favor and against each of the parties.

"The satisfaction of a judgment may be wholly or partly produced by compelling the judgment creditor to accept in payment a judgment against him in favor of the judgment debtor, or, in other words, by setting off one judgment against another. This is usually brought about by a motion in behalf of the party who desires to have his judgment credited upon or set off against a judgment against him. The court in a proper case will grant the motion. Its power to do this cannot be traced to any particular statute and exists only in virtue of its general equitable authority over its officers and suitors. * * * Generally, a party will not be allowed to set off a judgment in his favor against a judgment against him, unless he is both the legal and equitable owner of the judgment in his favor, and the party against whom he seeks to exercise the right is also the beneficial owner of the judgment recovered by him." 2 Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 467a.

The cases cited by appellant Arp, notably Coonan v. Loewenthal, 147 Cal. 218, 81 Pac. 527, 109 Am. St. Rep. 128, and Haskins v. Jordan, 123 Cal. 157, 55 Pac. 786, were cases proper to be considered under the rule announced by Mr. Freeman for the judgments sought to be offset were existing judgments which had not been satisfied. If the judgment had been paid, it is satisfied; hence there is no judgment which the court may credit to the moving party upon his judgment debt in another action. The court, by its order as made herein, attempted to enforce the alleged right of contribution in favor of the defendant in a proceeding which had not been taken in the way required by the code provisions to which we have referred.

[3] The parties hereto having stipulated that both appeals be heard upon the same record and considered together, separate orders are not required to be made.

The order appealed from is reversed, appellant Blake to recover her costs.

In re KLING. (Civ. 3326.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹74, 82(4)—Order disallowing costs, appealable only after final judgment.

An appeal lies from an order disallowing costs only when such order is entered after the final judgment; in other cases the order is reviewed only on appeal from the final judgment.

2. Appeal and error ⟹74—Reversal of disbarment for insufficient evidence is not final judgment.

A reversal of a judgment disbarring an attorney because of insufficiency of evidence is not a final disposition of the case, but is in effect a remand for a new trial, so that an order disallowing costs is not appealable until final judgment by the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Proceedings for the disbarment of D. G. Kling, as an attorney and counselor at law. From an order granting a motion to retax, strike out, and disallow the bill of costs, after the judgment of disbarment was reversed for want of evidence, the attorney appeals. Appeal dismissed.

D. G. Kling, of Los Angeles, and Winslow P. Hyatt, for appellant.

Alfred Wright, Alexander Macdonald, Percy V. Hammon, and Paul Vallee, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. A proceeding for the disbarment of appellant as an attorney at law was instituted in the superior court by the Los Angeles Bar Association. The trial thereof resulted in an order made suspending him from practicing his profession. On appeal therefrom the judgment was reversed (Matter of Kling, 186 Pac. 152) upon the ground that the same was not warranted by the evidence. Upon the going down of the remittitur, appellant served and filed his bill of costs and disbursements made at the trial and on appeal, to which respondent interposed a motion to retax, strike out, and disallow the same, which motion was by the court granted and from which this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant, conceding that the allowance of costs is a matter of statutory regulation, bases his claim to the allowance thereof upon the statutes applicable to civil cases and special proceedings to the effect that the prevailing party, except in certain cases wherein this proceeding is not included, is entitled to costs both for expenditures made in the lower court upon trial and upon appeal. See sections 1022, 1024, 1025, 1027, Code Civ. Proc. These sections appear to refer alone to the allowance of costs in civil actions and special proceedings; hence we have grave doubts as to whether they constitute authority for an allowance of costs to one who successfully defends himself in a disbarment proceeding, the provisions for which are confined to chapter 1, tit. 5, pt. 1, Code of Civil Procedure, entitled, "Attorneys and Counselors at Law," wherein no reference is made to an allowance of costs in such a proceeding. See Morton v. Watson, 60 Neb. 672, 84 N. W. 91; State v. Fisher, 82 Neb. 361, 117 N. W. 882; In re Watt & Dohan (C. C.) 154 Fed. 678; and In re Eaton, 7 N. D. 269, 74 N. W. 870.

Since, however, we are clearly of the opinion that the appeal must be dismissed, we deem it unnecessary to decide the question.

[1] To entitle a party to appeal directly from an order of this character, it must, as provided by section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, appear that the same was made after final judgment rendered in the case wherein allowance of costs is sought. Crane v. Forth, 95 Cal. 88, 30 Pac. 193; Empire Co. v. Bonanza Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. 810. As stated, the judgment of disbarment was, on appeal, reversed for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings implied therein. The effect of such reversal was to remand the case for a new trial. Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639; Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 40 Pac. 21, 386. By such action the parties, until a new trial was had or other disposition made of the case, were in precisely the same position as if a trial thereof had never been had. Sharp v. Miller, 66 Cal. 98, 4 Pac. 1065. Hence, for the reason that at the time of the making of the order no final judgment had been rendered in the case, the order is not appealable. A review thereof can be had only upon an appeal from the judgment. Lasky v. Davis, 33 Cal. 677; Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 105, 87 Am. Dec. 107; Empire Co. v. Bonanza Co., supra.

[2] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the order of this court reversing the judgment from which the appeal was taken must be deemed a final disposition of the case without further action on the part of the trial court. By virtue of the reversal the case was remanded to the trial court for further action and disposition.

The appeal is dismissed.

Application of TRAVERS. (Cr. 916.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1920. On Petition for Rehearing, Aug 24, 1920.)

1. Habeas corpus ⊂=85(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding petitioner had infectious disease.

In habeas corpus proceedings to procure petitioner's release from custody in a county hospital, evidence held to sustain the findings of the commissioner to whom the issues of fact were referred that petitioner was suffering from infectious venereal diseases.

2. Health ⊂=23—State can restrain person afflicted with infectious diseases.

The state has power for the protection of the community at large to confine in a hospital persons afflicted with venereal diseases.

3. Health ⊂=23—Consent to physical examination to avoid trial for vagrancy not secured by duress.

Where petitioner had been arrested on a charge of vagrancy and was informed by the magistrate that if she submitted to physical examination and was found free from venereal disease, he would release her, her consent to a physical examination to ascertain the existence of disease was not void because procured by duress, and the right to confine her in a hospital because of the existence of disease, which could have been done following a compulsory examination after her conviction, was not thereby rendered illegal.

On Petition for Rehearing.

4. Habeas corpus ⊂=113(11)—Rehearing after final judgment is beyond jurisdiction.

The appellate court has no further jurisdiction in habeas corpus proceedings after rendering a final judgment remanding petitioner to custody, and cannot grant a rehearing.

Nourse, J., dissenting.

Application by Evelyn Travers for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Health Officer of the City and County of San Francisco to secure the release of petitioner from detention for communicable disease. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Leo R. Friedman, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. On the petition of her attorney, a writ of habeas corpus in this matter was made returnable to this court. The petition, which was lengthy, and need not be set forth, was based upon the alleged facts that Evelyn Travers was imprisoned by the health officer of the city and county of San Francisco, in a certain ward of the city and county hospital, on the pretense that she was infected with a certain specific disease, that she was not examined by a licensed physician, and that she was examined against her consent. It was further alleged that she was arrested while on her way to her home, without warrant or cause, by a peace officer, that she was discharged by the police court on the following morning, and that she was examined by a doctor while she was under duress produced by threats that she would be convicted of vagrancy and sentenced to the county jail unless she consented to the examination. It was alleged also that she was not suffering from the particular disease mentioned in the petition, nor from any other contagious or infectious disease, that the state board of health nor its secretary had not taken control of the case, nor caused her restraint in the hospital to prevent the spread of such disease, that she had been deprived of nourishing food, access to the sunshine, and of the visits of her friends and attorney.

[1] On the return of the writ by the health officer of the municipality, who is also an inspector of the state board of health, most of the allegations of fact were traversed, and other facts set forth as a justification for the detention. Because of the wide divergence of the two statements of fact it became necessary for evidence to be taken. The matter was referred to Thos. F. Prendergast, a commissioner appointed by the court. The proceedings before the commissioner were reported by the official reporter of the court. No good result would follow from even summarizing either the evidence or the report of the commissioner. Suffice it to say that the examination was continued at great length. A large number of witnesses testified, and documentary evidence was introduced. The testimony of medical experts on the part of the respondent was direct and positive concerning the infection of the woman by two distinct, infectious, and communicable diseases most frequently transmitted through participation in social vice. The evidence of medical witnesses called on behalf of the petitioner was to the effect that when they made examinations the recognized tests failed to show the presence of the specific diseases in question. There was unquestionable evidence that by certain preliminary treatments the tests in cases of admitted infection might be rendered negative of proof for a short period during which an examination might have been made. The court is of the opinion that the finding of the commissioner that the two forms of disease in question were present at the time of the issuance of the writ is sustained by the evidence and is conclusive; and there is no evidence that either has been eradicated since that time.

[2] It is a matter of common knowledge that the federal government, the state government, and the municipal government are engaged in an effort to prevent the spread of the two diseases in question. By section 2979 of the Political Code the state board of health is vested with general power of inspection, examination, quarantine, and disinfection of persons within the state, and with power to appoint inspectors who, under the direction of the board, shall be vested with like powers. The state board of health appointed the health officer of the municipality such an inspector, and directed him, as one of its such inspectors, "to use every available means to ascertain the existence of, and immediately to investigate, all reported or suspected cases of syphilis in the infectious stages of gonococcus infection." Inspectors were further required to make examinations of all persons reasonably suspected of having either of the specified diseases, and "owing to the prevalence of such diseases among prostitutes, all such persons may be considered within the above class." The law provides for the isolation of persons suffering from infectious and contagious diseases. Such laws have been upheld in a multitude of cases, and the safety of the community depends upon the proper enforcement of health and quarantine regulations. On habeas corpus proceedings the first question, and usually the only one, presented is as to the existence of the power of restraint. In this case the power to isolate persons suffering from the particular diseases, or either of them, cannot be seriously questioned.

The commissioner finds that the arrest was made, not as stated in the petition, but in a lodging house, which the woman was visiting for purposes of prostitution; that the records of the police court show that she was charged with vagrancy; that she appeared and pleaded not guilty, waiving a jury; that she was then given a hearing, and the case was continued to a later date. It is further found that after the hearing she voluntarily submitted to a physical examination by the doctor then in charge of the diagnostic clinic of the department of public health of the city, who was assisted by a graduate nurse, and that specimens then obtained were sealed and submitted to another doctor who was the chief bacteriologist of the department, upon whose report the health officer made the order of detention in the San Francisco hospital, and of quarantine. It is further found that other allegations in the petition are untrue, particularly in regard to the food and treatment of the patient at the hospital.

Some contention was based on the ground that the examining doctor at the time was not a licensed physician. There was no suggestion that he was not a capable and learned physician, who was in charge of the clinic by the order of the health officer. He did not make the order of detention, and the examination was made by consent.

[3] In regard to the charges of duress on behalf of the petitioner, it was sought to be shown that the police judge had stated that in every such case the woman is sent to be examined by the clinical officer, and, if she passes, the case is dismissed. Thereupon it was stipulated by the district attorney that such is the invariable practice, not, however, for the purpose of forcing the women so charged to submit to examinations, but to enable the police judge to show leniency to them. Whatever might be said concerning this method of releasing persons charged with vagrancy merely as a matter of leniency, in the particular case it cannot be made the basis of a charge of duress. The woman, if satisfied of her innocence, might have submitted to trial and judgment. If she was guilty and had been sentenced, she might have been examined even against her will. She chose the easier of the two courses open to her.

Upon the allegations in the petition the writ was ordered issued, but in view of the record the petition was without foundation. It is considered proper in this connection to add that if a person arrested on the charge of vagrancy should appear to be suffering with another disease—smallpox, for instance—and the proceedings followed which took place in this case, the evil consequences to the community might have been frightful to contemplate. Persons petitioning for habeas corpus, particularly when such petitions are made on behalf of another, should be well assured of the facts represented to the court as true. In the present instance the petitioner no doubt erred or was misinformed, but such errors, fraught with danger to the community, should not be made. This statement is considered necessary to prevent anything in this opinion being considered as authority for unwarranted applications for the release of persons properly quarantined under lawful regulations of the public health department.

The writ is discharged, and Evelyn Travers is ordered returned to the care of the respondent health officer.

I concur: LANGDON, P. J.

NOURSE, J. I dissent. The undisputed facts are that petitioner was arrested on a charge of vagrancy, was taken from her place of abode to the police court, where she pleaded not guilty, and, without trial or judgment, was ordered into the custody of the health officer. She was then taken to the city and county hospital, where, in direct defiance of a penal statute, she was subjected to a medical examination by an unlicensed employé illegally styling himself a doctor. As a result of such examination she was ordered confined in the city and county hospital for an indefinite period, and was so detained without warrant or judicial commitment when released on bail by order of this court.

The power to quarantine diseased persons for the purpose of preventing the spread of communicable diseases need not be questioned. The power to imprison a citizen in a public hospital without trial or commitment is obnoxious to every American principle of right and justice. It is one of the fundamental principles of both our federal and state Constitutions that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." "It is a rule as old as the law, and never more to be respected than now, that no one shall be personally bound until he has had his day in court, by which is meant, until he has been duly cited to appear, and has been afforded an opportunity to be heard." Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 350, 368 (21 L. Ed. 959).

In the present case the petitioner, having been charged with the crime of vagrancy, was entitled to a trial and judgment upon that charge. It matters not that she consented to go to the city and county hospital for medical examination on the promise of the judge of the police court that he would dismiss her case if found free from disease—and the implied threat that if she did not consent she would be convicted and sentenced. The magistrate was without power to make any such promises. It was his duty to try her for the offense of which she was charged and find her either guilty or not guilty of that offense. The presence of disease is no element of the crime of vagrancy, except in certain instances defined in section 647, Penal Code, which are not material to this case. If, as claimed in argument, the petitioner was a prostitute, then, under section 647, she was a vagrant. That was the issue which was presented to the magistrate, and upon that issue she was entitled to a trial. She did not have a trial upon that or any other issue.

The broad scope of the main opinion is atrocious in its consequences. Having approved the farcical and unjudicial pretense of a trial in the police court, the effect of the opinion is that any citizen may be taken from his home, and, without trial or judgment, confined in a public hospital during the will and pleasure of the health officer, if some unlicensed employé of the institution believes that he is afflicted with some contagious disease. During such confinement the victim may be denied the right to call in his own physician, but is forced to subject himself to such medical treatment as the employés of the hospital may choose to give him.

Section 2979a of the Political Code, the section under which the health officer is acting, authorizes him, when acting as an inspector under the state board of health, to "take possession or control of the body of any living person," upon being informed of any of the contagious or infectious diseases mentioned in the section. Among the diseases therein mentioned are tuberculosis, pneumonia, diphtheria, measles, chicken pox, whooping cough, mumps, and "any other contagious or infectious disease." Thus a parent whose child is afflicted with any of the many contagious diseases prevalent among children, may be denied the right of caring for his child in his own home and of calling a physician of his own choosing. All that is necessary, under the main opinion, is for the health officer to be informed that some contagious disease exists. Then he may take possession and control of the "body of any living person" (not necessarily one afflicted with the disease), remove him from his home and the care of his family, and confine him in the county hospital, without commitment, until such time as the employés of the hospital may determine that his illegal imprisonment might cease. If such be the law, one who is afflicted with tuberculosis may suffer a greater punishment for his offense than one who has committed a burglary.

The provisions of section 2979a, in so far as they attempt to authorize the imprisonment of the individual for an indefinite term without trial and without commitment, are unconstitutional and void. The petitioner is detained by the health officer solely under the authority of that section. Her imprisonment in the city and county hospital is without the semblance of a legal confinement, and she should be discharged.

MITCHELL v. WHITFORD et al.

(Civ. 2151.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 7, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⟹48(1)—Mistake in description, which does not prevent identification, not fatal.

A mistake or misdescription, or uncertain description, of the property in a mortgage, does not avoid the instrument, if the property is nevertheless capable of identification, and can be located by a surveyor by applying the rules of surveying to the whole description.

2. Mortgages ⟹48(2) — Obvious mistake in one call held not to invalidate.

A mistake in the description contained in a mortgage, whereby a call read 3,146 chains, instead of 3.46 chains, was obviously a mistake on its face, and since a surveyor could locate the land, notwithstanding such mistake, by running the later calls backwards, the mistake does not invalidate the mortgage, especially as against one who had both constructive and actual notice that the property was subject to the mortgage when he purchased it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by R. C. Mitchell, as trustee, against R. A. Whitford and others for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Charles Z. Soule appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore J. Savage, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. C. Porter, of San Francisco, and L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Stanislaus county, decreeing the foreclosure of a mortgage. The said mortgage was executed by defendants R. A. Whitford and his wife, Augusta Whitford, to one C. L. Flack, to secure a promissory note for the sum of $21,864.42, dated April 9, 1913, payable 4 years after date, with interest at 6½ per cent. per annum. Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, the plaintiff became the holder thereof by mesne assignments. Subsequent to the making of this mortgage, the mortgagors deeded the property so mortgaged, and it was conveyed repeatedly until the fee vested in the appellant, Charles Z. Soule. The plaintiff, by his complaint, named as defendants the original mortgagors, R. A. Whitford and his wife, Augusta Whitford, and a number of others, including appellant. All the defendants, except Charles Z. Soule, defaulted. By the decree, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendants R. A. Whitford and Augusta Whitford, in the sum of $27,707.03, on the note. The decree further adjudged the same a lien upon the land described in the judgment, ordered the land sold to satisfy said sum, provided for judgment against the Whitfords for any deficiency, and foreclosed the rights of the defendant Soule. Defendant Soule appeals from the judgment, in so far as it subjects his land to the lien of the said mortgage, orders it sold, forecloses his rights, and otherwise affects his interests.

The mortgage was recorded on the same day that it was executed, to wit, April 9, 1913. The description of the land mortgaged, as given in finding III, is a surveyor's description. It commences at an established point, a section corner, and then contains some 27 calls, given by courses and distances only. Said description is as follows:

"Beginning at corner to sections 7, 12, 13, and 18, township 4 south range 7 and 8 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian; thence south 0° 10′ east, 40 chains; thence south 0° 10′ east, 21 chains; thence north 89° 41′ east, 46.95 chains; thence north 34° 50′ west, 1.38 chains; thence north 18° 39′ west, 2.55 chains; thence north 13° 20′ west, 5.70 chains; thence north 6° 43′ east, 13.38 chains; thence north 5° 40′ east, 4.88 chains; thence north 8° 35′ west, 2.99 chains; thence north 67° 7′ east, 1.50 chains; thence north 10° 39′ east, 4.77 chains; thence north 11° 52′ east, 5.16 chains; thence north 19° 25′ east, 6.84 chains; thence north 35° 14′ east, 4.07 chains; thence north 20° 11′ east, 2.89 chains; thence north 1° 44′ west, 1.79 chains; thence north 3° 42′ west, 4.25 chains; thence north 48° 4′ west, 3.46 chains; thence north 39° 13′ west, 11.19 chains; thence north 67° 8′ west, 3.34 chains; thence north 75° 39′ west, 8 chains; thence north 55° 35′ west, 3.40 chains; thence south 37° 57′ west, 2.17 chains; thence south 27° 59′ east, 2.72 chains; thence south 11° 15′ west, 4 chains; thence south 7° 45′ east, 6 chains; thence south 89° 41′ west, 30.50 chains to point of beginning. Above described tract of land containing 300.89 acres."

The court found that the description of the—

"land set out in the mortgage was intended by the parties to be the same as that which is set out in finding No. III, and that by inadvertence and mistake the course in said description read as recorded, 'Thence north 48° 4′ west, 3,146 chains,' and the true course is 'thence north 48° 4′ west, 3.46 chains.'"

The court also found that this mistake in the description was by "inadvertence and mistake of all parties." The error is in the eighteenth call of the description, which reads: "Thence north 48° 4′ west, 3,146 chains." The correct description should read: "Thence north 48° 4′ west 3.46 chains." This erroneous description would not describe the land that the parties intended to mortgage. It simply describes a line which does not inclose the land. This erroneous description would run that course referred to over thirty miles. The mortgage called for 300.89 acres, and it is very plain that it was a mistake that any one would notice in the reading of the description.

The appellant does not claim that he suffered any injury by reason of this error in the description, and he does not claim to have been misled by the description contained in the record. The court found that the appellant—

"acquired title to said lands in good faith and for valuable consideration, and that valuable consideration was the sum of $10, and that he did not pay any greater or further consideration than the sum of $10. That at the time of the giving, granting, and delivering by him to his grantors of the said sum of $10 for said grant, as aforesaid, and prior thereto, he had actual notice and constructive notice of the records in the recorder's office of the county of Stanislaus, state of California, of said note and mortgage, and that the same was a lien on the lands described in finding No. III. * * *"

[1] The whole claim of appellant to defeat the mortgage of plaintiff is based on this error in the description—an error only in one course, and it is very apparent on the face of the record that it is an error. After describing the land almost to the place of beginning, the description on the record reads, as before stated, "thence north 48° 4′ west, 3,146 chains." The correct description should read, "thence north 48° 4′ west, 3.46 chains"; the error being the inserting of the figure 1 in the place of the period between the figures 3 and 4.

"A mistake or misdescription, or a defective or uncertain description, of the property intended to be conveyed by mortgage will not necessarily avoid the instrument. If the property is nevertheless capable of identification, and is clearly identified, the mortgagee may have the mortgage reformed or corrected." 27 Cyc. 1093.

"Whether the description is uncertain or not is to be determined from an inspection of the entire deed, and in considering it the construction to be put upon it must not only be a reasonable one (Civ. Code, § 3542) but such an interpretation must be indulged in as will give effect to the deed rather than defeat it." Hall v. Bartlett, 158 Cal. 638, 112 Pac. 176.

"A deed is not void for uncertainty because there may be errors or an inconsistency in some of the particulars. If a surveyor, by applying the rules of surveying, can locate the land, the description is sufficient; and, generally, the rule may be stated to be that the deed will be sustained if it is possible from the whole description to ascertain and identify the land intended to be conveyed." Devlin on Deeds, § 1012.

This section is cited with approval in McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 529, 532, 41 Pac. 420.

[2] In the case of Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 481, 485, 486, the Supreme Court held that, where there are errors in tracing the description, the surveyor might, when it is necessary, take the last call, and run the lines back to the first call—citing Noyes v. Dyer, 25 Me. 468. A surveyor following this rule in the case at bar, and taking the last call, and running the lines back, the mistake in the description is discovered, and the eighteenth call in the description, instead of being "thence north 48° 4′ west, 3,146 chains," should be "thence north 48° 4′ west, 3.46 chains."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte RAYMOND. (Cr. 926.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 5, 1920.)

Prisons ⟸15—Prisoner may not be denied credits, where he was not present when evidence was heard.

Under Pen. Code, § 1588, requiring prison directors, before forfeiting prisoner's credits, to give notice to the offender and hear proof, a prisoner's credits cannot be forfeited, where he was charged with participating in a riot within the prison, and pleaded not guilty, but he was not permitted to be present when the proof was heard, or to present any defense.

Waste, Presiding Judge pro tem., dissenting.

Application for habeas corpus by Harry Raymond, prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure petitioner's release from custody, on ground that credits were illegally forfeited. Prisoner discharged.

Harry Raymond, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Petitioner was received at the state penitentiary at San Quentin about August 25, 1911, under a sentence of 10 years for grand larceny. If entitled to the credits for good conduct allowed under section 1588 of the Penal Code, he should have been released February 25, 1918. The petition alleges that during the month of July, 1912, without previous notice, and without opportunity of preparing or presenting any defense, he was taken from his cell and led before the board of prison directors, where his credits were forfeited without trial, and that he is accordingly still held in custody by the warden of the penitentiary. Petitioner relies on the provisions of section 1588, which grant to a prisoner the credits as a matter of right, subject to forfeiture only "after due proof of the offense and notice to the offender."

The evidence produced at the hearing in brief is: Petitioner, with some 25 other prisoners, was charged with participating in a riot within the prison. The directors met in a room situated in a building where these prisoners had been placed in solitary confinement. One prisoner after another was called before the board and asked to enter his plea. When the petitioner was called, he pleaded not guilty. No testimony was taken in his presence; he was not confronted by any witnesses, and had no opportunity of presenting any defense. The witnesses produced by the Attorney General at the hearing did not controvert this positive evidence given on behalf of petitioner.

"This section [1588] requires that the board of directors, before they shall take action, shall have given notice to the offender and heard proof touching the offense." In re Knowlton, 136 Cal. 107, 109, 68 Pac. 480.

Upon the record before the court there is no escape from the conclusion that petitioner was not afforded the hearing required by the Code when his credits were forfeited. For that reason he is entitled to the credits allowed by the Code, and, his term of service having expired, he should be discharged from custody.

So ordered.

I concur: BRITTAIN, J.

WASTE, Presiding Judge pro tem. I dissent. I am unable to agree with my Associates in the conclusion reached by them in the matter of the application for a writ of habeas corpus. It appears from the return to the writ, the affidavit of the clerk to the state board of prison directors, and oral testimony taken at the hearing, that on or about the 11th day of July, 1912, a riot occurred in the dining room at the state prison at San Quentin, at a time when the board of prison directors was in session. The convicts supposed to be the ringleaders in the uprising—this petitioner among them—were apprehended, and were at once placed in solitary confinement. The prison remained in a turmoil, and the situation was tense when the board met again the next day. As a matter of precaution, the board met in a room in the building in which the solitary confinement cells were located, and into which those cells opened. All the members of the board and the clerk were present, and the session seems to have been regular in every particular.

The warden of the prison filed a charge, in writing, signed by him as warden, in which the petitioner, with others, was accused of having violated the rules of the prison by engaging in riotous conduct, and the destruction of state property. Raymond, the petitioner here, was brought before the board, informed of the charge made against him by the warden, which was read to him, and "asked if he was guilty or not guilty." He entered a plea of "not guilty," and the trial was proceeded with. The warden, the captain of the guard, and two guards were called before the board, and testified in support of the charges. From the evidence it appeared that Raymond, together with other prisoners, had engaged in a general riot, had destroyed certain property within the prison belonging to the state of California, and that, in subduing the insurrection, one inmate was killed and another seriously wounded. The board thereupon found and adjudged the petitioner guilty as charged and declared his credits forfeited.

Thus far the record is clear and unassailable. Petitioner would impeach it by certain averments in his petition, and by oral testimony, to the effect that no evidence was taken in his presence; he was not confronted by any witnesses, and had no opportunity of presenting any defense.

There is a conflict and an uncertainty in the evidence as to the presence of the petitioner during the hearing. He testified that as soon as he was informed of the charges, and caused to enter his plea, he was taken back to his cell, which was about 10 feet from where the board was in session, and that he did not hear the testimony given against him. The captain of the guard testified that to the best of his recollection the petitioner was present. The affidavit of the clerk of the board is that the warden, the captain of the guard, and two guards testified in Raymond's presence. His testimony was not so positive as to the fact. It does not appear that Raymond objected to the consideration of his case by the board, sought to make any defense and call witnesses in his behalf, or asked for a continuance or delay in the matter. He has not claimed that he did. The minutes of the board do not show such to be the fact, and the affidavit of the clerk of the board is that he did not.

By section 1588 of the Penal Code it is provided that, if any convict in the state prison—

"shall commit any assault upon his keeper, or any foreman, officer, convict, or person, or otherwise endanger life, or shall be guilty of any flagrant disregard of the rules of the prison, or commit any misdemeanor, or in any manner violate any of the rules and regulations of the prison, he shall forfeit all deductions of time earned by him for good conduct; * * * such forfeiture, however, shall be made only by the board of directors after due proof of the offense and notice to the offender; nor shall any forfeiture be imposed when a party has violated any rule or rules without violence or evil intent, of which the directors shall be the sole judges."

As said by the writer of the majority opinion:

"This section requires that the board of directors, before they take action, shall have given notice to the offender and heard proof touching the offense."

In my judgment, it has not been made to appear but that the provision of the statute was fully complied with in the instant case, and that the situation here presented is no more aggravated than that considered in the case quoted from in the majority opinion, in which the writ was discharged and the petitioner remanded. In re Knowlton, 136 Cal. 107, 109, 68 Pac. 480. That should have been the order here.

PEOPLE v. GRANEY. (Cr. 709.)

Criminal law ⟸407(2) — Evidence that defendant was silent when implicated in a codefendant's confession held admissible.

Where in a prosecution for attempted robbery defendant, in company with his codefendants, was taken to the sheriff's office, where one of the codefendants admitted his guilt and implicated defendant, but defendant, after listening to the implicating statement in response to a question by the prosecuting attorney, refused to make a statement in reply on the ground that his attorney had ordered him not to talk, evidence as to such occurrence held admissible, although it would have been inadmissible had defendant denied the truth of the statement, which he had opportunity to do.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Donald C. Graney was convicted of attempted robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Fish & Eddie, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant, as charged in an indictment, was convicted of the crime of attempted robbery, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment thereon pronounced against him.

On the afternoon of October 2d, four men, all of whom were armed, entered the First National Bank of Hynes and attempted to rob the same. One of them, Dave Curry by name, was captured while engaged in the felonious act. On the following day, defendant and two other men were arrested as participants in the commission of the crime. In company with Curry, they were taken to the office of the sheriff, at which time Curry admitted his guilt, and, in the presence of defendant, stated the latter was a full participant therein. During the examination of Curry, the question was asked: "Did you have any talk together as to what you were going to do or where you were going?" in response to which Curry said, "No." And, continuing, the interrogator stated: "Something had been said, wasn't there? What did you say to one another?" whereupon defendant interposed, saying: "Our counsel gave us orders not to talk about the case until we were taken into court." The interrogation of Curry proceeded, and upon the completion of his statement, defendant was asked if there was anything in the statement which he wanted to correct or add anything thereto, to which he replied, "No, sir." And again: "Is there anything that Curry has said, boys, that is not right or that you want to correct? * * * Anything you want to correct or fill in, Graney?" To which he replied, "No, sir." Not only did defendant object to the introduction of this testimony, but thereafter moved the court to strike out the same, which motion was denied; and this ruling constitutes the only error of which defendant complains.

While appellant concedes the rule, stated by the court in instructing the jury, that "you cannot take into consideration the substance of said confession or the truth or falsity of it against the defendant, but can only consider what the defendant did or said when said statement was made in his presence," he insists that by reason of the mere avowal that his attorney had advised him not to talk, what he said or did in response to Curry's statement as to his participation in the crime was not admissible in evidence, and hence it follows that it was likewise error to admit Curry's statement.

The denial of the truth of the statement made at the time would have rendered the evidence inadmissible (People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 542, 66 Pac. 798), and the converse is true where an accusation is admitted. So too, it is held that where, in response to the accusation of crime, the accused remains mute under such circumstances that he was free to speak or ought to speak, the fact of his remaining mute would justify the admission of the evidence. People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650. In the instant case, defendant was free to speak, and had every opportunity to do so; indeed, his position under the circumstances was such that if the charge was untrue he should have spoken in repudiation thereof. But he neither denied nor admitted the accusation; in effect he stood mute and assigned his reasons for so doing. The court was thus called upon, in passing upon the preliminary question of the admissibility of the evidence, to determine upon the unsworn statement of defendant, not only whether the reason assigned was a subterfuge, but whether, if genuine, it justified defendant making no response to the accusation. In our opinion, it ruled correctly in allowing the evidence to go to the jury for what it was worth. If the jury believed the defendant's testimony thereafter given in his own behalf, that his attorney had advised him not to talk, and which the court did not have before it when it made the ruling, it would be of little probative weight, but this fact does not affect its admissibility. The facts of the case are very similar to those involved in People v. Philbon, supra, where the defendant was charged with grand larceny. It appearing that a bystander, who witnessed the theft, said, in the presence of and referring to defendant, "Don't you let him go, because I saw him take your purse," to which the accused replied, "I did not take it; I saw you drop it, and I picked it up and went after you." On appeal the court upheld the admission of this evidence for the purpose of showing the conduct of defendant and his reply to the statements made by the bystander who claimed to have witnessed the theft, and further said:

"It is only when there is something in the conduct of the accused person, in response to the statement that is material to the issue, that the statements of such persons are admissible at all, and they are admissible then solely for the purpose of explaining the conduct of the accused."

So here, the testimony was admissible, leaving to the jury the question as to whether, under all the circumstances shown, it had any probative force in tending to show defendant's guilt.

The judgment is affirmed.

COHN v. RUDNECK et al. (Civ. 3216.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 31, 1920.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⟸291(13)—Evidence held to sustain finding that lease gave no option for renewal.

In forcible detainer to recover possession after the expiration of a lease, both copies of which had been lost, evidence held to support the trial court's finding that the written lease did not contain an option for renewal, as claimed by defendants.

2. Landlord and tenant ⟸291(12)—Evidence that tenants intended to build admissible to show that they had no option to renew.

In forcible detainer, where the defendants claimed a lost lease gave them an option to renew, evidence that some time before the expiration of the lease they were preparing to build was admissible as tending to contradict their claim of option, even though it was not admissible to show waiver.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1052(5)—Evidence of rent offer not prejudicial, where court found less value.

In forcible detainer proceedings the admission of a statement by plaintiff that he had been offered $100 per month as rental for the premises was not prejudicial to defendants, where the court found the rental value to be $50, the amount specified in the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. Cohn against M. Rudneck and others for unlawful detainer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

E. F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. At the expiration of a written lease of real estate made by plaintiff to defendants they refused to surrender possession, and thereupon he brought this action for unlawful detainer. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal.

[1] The lease was for a term of five years at a rental of $40 per month for the first two years; $45 per month for the next two years, and $50 per month for the last year. As alleged by defendants, the lease contained a provision that "at the end of the term, to wit, December 31, 1918, * * * the defendants should have the option or right or privilege of an extension or renewal of such tenancy or lease for the further or additional period of five years from and after January 1, 1919, upon the same terms and conditions provided for in said lease for the term commencing January 1, 1914, and ending December 31, 1918," as to which the court found adversely to defendants, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding presents the chief question for determination. The burden of establishing the truth of this allegation devolved upon defendants. While the lease was executed in duplicate, both copies thereof were lost, and the question as to whether the lease contained the provision alleged was made to depend upon the conflicting testimony of the respective parties. Defendants were partners doing business under the name of the Western Junk Company, and each of them, Himovitz, Rudneck, and Bernson, testified that by the terms of the lease they were given a "five-year privilege." No claim was made by defendants or either of them that the lease contained a provision for the renewal thereof, until about December 26, 1918, four days before the expiration of the lease, at which time, and after plaintiff had served notice upon them to surrender possession, they served him with notice of an election to renew the lease upon the purported provision therein. While concededly plaintiff had talks with defendants in regard to a continuance of their tenancy, they never at any time prior to December 26th made any claim that the lease contained a provision for its renewal at their option. On the contrary, their action and conversations in reference to the subject of their tenancy were indicative of the contrary. The court no doubt in considering their testimony was impressed by the fact that they had no recollection of the contents of the lease other than that it contained, as stated by them, "a five-year privilege." Plaintiff, on the contrary, testified in positive terms that the lease contained no provision for the renewal thereof. While it is true, as contended by appellants, the witness entered into an argument based upon the conduct of defendants which he claimed tended to show that the lease contained no such provision, such argument does not detract from the weight of his positive statement which the court, considering the unsatisfactory testimony of defendants, was justified in believing. Upon the facts shown by the record it cannot be said the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding made by the court, and hence it is unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of the question as to whether or not, if the lease contained the provision alleged, it was void for uncertainty.

[2] Conceding, as claimed by appellants, that if in the lease defendants were given an option to renew the same, a waiver thereof could not be shown by parol testimony, nevertheless the conversation had in August prior to the expiration of the lease with defendant Rudneck, wherein he stated that defendants had secured a lot and had material for a building which they proposed erecting, and therefore would not continue their tenancy, was proper as tending to show that the lease contained no such provision.

[3] Neither were defendants prejudiced by the statement of plaintiff that he had been offered $100 per month as rental for the premises. The court fixed the rental value at $50 per month, and there is evidence to sustain such finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

MacFARLANE v. DOYLE. (Civ. 3291.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1)—Finding based on evidence conclusive.

Where it was undisputed that plaintiff had paid a sum of money to defendant, which he testified was a loan to defendant, and which defendant testified was a part payment on a purchase of property, the trial court's finding that the payment was a loan cannot be set aside on appeal, as not sustained by the evidence.

2. Trial ⟸393(1)—Findings, whose preparation was not directed by court, need not be served five days before signing.

The requirement of Code Civ. Proc., § 634, that where the court directs a party to prepare findings a copy shall be served on the other party five days before the findings are signed if mandatory, does not require the service of the findings five days before they were signed in the case, where it is not shown that the court directed the preparation of findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by D. F. MacFarlane against R. M. Doyle. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Blakely, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. E. Kirk and Wally Vogel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. By one count of the complaint in this action plaintiff alleged that he loaned to defendant the sum of $900, which defendant agreed to repay on demand; that notwithstanding demand made therefor, defendant has refused to pay the same, and the whole thereof remains unpaid. The second count of the complaint states a cause of action for wages alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff for services rendered by the latter at the former's request. By this answer defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint, and filed a cross-complaint, wherein he alleged that he sold to plaintiff a one-third interest in and to a certain business for an agreed price of $1,733.33, upon which plaintiff paid to him the sum of $900 and no more, for the balance of which he demanded judgment. The allegations of the cross-complaint were denied by plaintiff. As to all of the issues so joined, the court found adversely to defendant, and gave judgment for plaintiff as prayed for, from which defendant appeals, claiming that the findings are without support.

[1] There is no merit whatever in the contention. That defendant received from plaintiff the sum of $900 is conceded, and the testimony of plaintiff clearly shows that the sum was advanced to defendant purely as a loan, while that of defendant likewise clearly tends to prove the money was paid as a part of the pruchase price for an interest in the business, as alleged in his cross-complaint. It was, of course, the province of the trial court to determine which one of these witnesses was entitled to belief. The court, as it had the right to do, resolved the conflict in favor of the plaintiff, and such determination of the question must on appeal be deemed conclusive.

[2] It appears the findings were signed and filed upon the same day when served, contrary, as claimed by appellant, to section 634, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that where the court directs a party to prepare findings, a copy thereof shall be served upon the other party to the action at least five days before findings shall be signed by the court. Assuming that this provision is mandatory rather than merely directory, there is nothing in the record showing the court directed the preparation of findings; and hence, as held in Hoffman v. Guy M. Rush Co., 27 Cal. App. 167, 149 Pac. 177, the case is not brought within the provisions of the section.

The judgment is affirmed.

JONES v. JONES. (Civ. 3339.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 30, 1920.)

1. Trial ⊜404(1)—Findings to be construed in support of judgment.

Findings should be construed most strongly in support of the judgment based thereon.

2. Divorce ⊜27(6)—Single act of slapping wife held not ground for divorce.

That a husband slapped his wife on one occasion did not entitle her to divorce, where it did not appear that the act caused her the slightest physical pain or mental suffering, and the act was committed in an altercation provoked by the wife, wherein she had attacked him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Suit by Ruby L. Jones against Walter Jones for divorce. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Warren L. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a decree whereby she was denied a divorce from her husband, the defendant.

In her complaint, among other things, plaintiff alleged "that during the latter part of February, 1916, the said defendant willfully and without reasonable or just cause, assaulted and struck this plaintiff, and assaulted and struck a daughter of this plaintiff, and abused the said plaintiff, and used towards her profane and insulting names, in the presence of her children"; all of which allegations are denied by defendant in his answer. Upon these issues the court found as follows:

"The defendant in the latter part of February, 1916, did slap the plaintiff, and did slap the daughter of the plaintiff. This was in the course of an altercation between the defendant on one side and the plaintiff and her daughter on the other side, in which none of them were without fault. The defendant did not upon this occasion, use profane and insulting names in the presence of the plaintiff."

Appellant's sole contention is that the evidence did not justify this finding, and, further, if justified by the evidence, plaintiff was entitled to a decree of divorce thereon. Conceding that defendant did slap his wife, as shown by her testimony, but denied by defendant, the act, as appears from ample evidence, was committed in an altercation provoked by the wife, who, without just cause attempted to eject him from a room in his residence, at which time she made a furious attack upon him by striking, kicking, and biting. In effect, while the court found that defendant, on the occasion referred to, slapped his wife, the act was provoked by her unwarranted attack and conduct.

[1, 2] Findings should be construed most strongly in support of the judgment based thereon, and, notwithstanding defendant was guilty of the act as found, it is not made to appear that it caused plaintiff the slightest physical pain or mental suffering, in the absence of which showing it cannot be said that defendant's single wrongful act, committed under the circumstances stated, entitles her to a reversal of the case.

There is no merit in the points presented; hence the judgment is affirmed.

AITKEN v. ROCHE et al., Police Com'rs. (Civ. 3527.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. July 29, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law ⊂=102(2)—Right of policeman to pension vested.

The right of a policeman to a pension under the charter of the city of San Francisco is vested, and enters into his contract of employment when he becomes a member of the department.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=187 — Retired patrolman entitled to half of pay as increased after retirement.

Under Charter of City and County of San Francisco, art. 8, c. 1, §§ 1, 2, c. 7, c. 10, §§ 2, 3, 5, 6, 10, patrolman retired from police force of city in 1903, when the pay of a patrolman was $102 a month, held not limited to a pension of one-half that sum, or $51 a month, but entitled to half the pay of a patrolman, of $140 a month, as increased by charter amendment adopted in 1918 and approved by the Legislature January 21, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1391).

3. Pensions ⊂=1—Pension statutes liberally construed.

Pension statutes are to be liberally construed.

Application for writ of mandate by James Aitken, for himself and in behalf of all other persons who receive pensions from the Police Relief and Pension Fund of the City and County of San Francisco, state of California, in sums less than one-half of the salary now attached to the rank held by the pensioner, when pensioned, or by the husband or father of the pensioner when the pension was awarded, against Theodore Roche and others, as Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco and as the Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund of said City and County. Application granted.

Moran & Moran, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George Lull, City Atty., and Milton Marks, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. The petitioner seeks by mandamus to require the board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund of the city and county of San Francisco to allow his demand for an amount of money in excess of that to which it is conceded he is entitled. The defendants demur generally to the sufficiency of the petition. A single question of law is presented, and it is determinative of the petitioner's right.

The petitioner became a member of the police department in 1880, and served continuously until 1903, when he was retired on account of physical disability received in the performance of his duty, and since that time he has been on the pension roll, he having been retired while he was holding the rank of patrolman. At the time of retirement the pay of a patrolman was $102 a month. By a charter amendment, adopted at the election of 1918, and approved by the Legislature January 21, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1391), the pay attached to the rank of patrolman was increased to $140 a month. The charter provides that members of the police department may be retired, as the petitioner was, "upon an annual pension equal to one-half of the amount of salary attached to the rank which he may have held three years prior to the date of such retirement, to be paid him during his life and to cease at his death. In case his disability shall cease his pension shall cease, and he shall be restored to the service in the rank he occupied at the time of his retirement." Charter, c. 10, art. 8, § 3. The sole question is whether or not pensioners are entitled to one-half of the pay attached to their retirement rank when pension installments successively become due, or to one-half of the pay which was attached to the rank when they were retired. It is alleged that over 100 such pensioners are concerned in this proceeding.

[1] On behalf of the defendants it is correctly stated that the right to pension is a vested one, and that it enters into the contract of employment when a man enters the police department. O'Dea v. Cook, 176 Cal. 659, 169 Pac. 366. From this it is argued that the amount of the prospective pension is fixed. This is fallacious, because if it were as the defendants contend, an increase in salary while a man was on active duty would not carry with it, as it does, the right to a correspondingly increased pension upon his subsequent retirement. Under such circumstances there would be no difficulty in determining that the right which was vested is the right to have the pension, not of a particular number of dollars, but "equal to one-half of the amount of salary attached to the rank," whether it should be more or less than that attached to the rank when the contract of employment was made. A similar contention, made in regard to another sort of contract, would be swept aside with little consideration. Suppose, for instance, the owner of an office building should lease it for a term of years, reserving as rent a sum equal to one-half of the gross rentals received by the tenant from subtenants, and it were shown that the gross rentals either increased or decreased in subsequent years. The right to a sum equal to one-half of those rentals would be vested, but neither party could successfully contend that the change in the amount of gross rentals warranted any change in the proportionate amount of money to be paid to the owner of the building.

Reliance is placed by the defendants upon an opinion of a former city attorney (Opinion, City Attorney, Percy V. Long, January 20, 1908) from which, in their brief, a quotation is made:

"Since the amount of the pension attaches to the rank and not to the salary, the effect of increasing the salary of any rank necessarily means a permanent increase so far as to carry one-half of it over in the form of a pension to such retiring officer or man. The pension is increased because the salary is increased. The amount of the pension is made in terms one-half of the amount of salary attached to the particular rank. A new salary under Amendment No. 20 having attached to a particular rank, a pension amounting to one-half the new salary immediately attaches upon the retirement of the officer or man."

This was all that was necessary to sustain the action based on the opinion of the city attorney, and fully supports the views hereinbefore expressed. The quotation, however, goes further, the following being added:

"Since the salary of only those officers and men who were in the active service of the department was increased by Amendment No. 20, it follows, of course, that only such portion of the police force (and not those who were pensioned and retired before the amendatory legislation) is entitled to an increase of pension based upon such increase of salary."

This quotation supports the contention of defendants.

A similar question has arisen in regard to the pay of retired officers of the United States army. The case is not exactly parallel, but the reasoning upon which the Supreme Court of the United States reached a conclusion opposed to that expressed in the opinion of the city attorney applies with equal force to this case. A statute of the United States provided that—

"Officers retired from active service shall receive seventy-five per centum of the pay of the rank upon which they were retired." U. S. Rev. St. § 1274 (U. S. Comp. St. § 2138).

Another section of the same statute provided that—

"There shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer below the rank of brigadier general * * * ten per centum of their current yearly pay for each term of five years' service." U. S. Rev. St. § 1262 (U. S. Comp. St. § 2099).

Said the Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller:

"The question is therefore whether an officer thus situated is in the service within the meaning of section 1262. That section allows an increase of pay for every five years' service. When the service ends, there can be no increase on that account. As long as the service continues, the increased pay applies whenever it amounts to five years."

It will be noted that the opinion of the city attorney is based on the fact that retired men are no longer in active service. Said Mr. Justice Miller:

"The law under which these officers are retired does not require their consent, nor does it require that the order for their retirement shall be based upon any absolute incapacity for further service. It may be based upon age, which, being fixed at a minimum of sixty-two years by no means implies such incapacity. It may be based upon wounds received in battle, but the person retired for this cause may, for many purposes, be a very useful officer."

After reciting certain other provisions of the statutes under which such retired officers are permitted to wear uniforms and may be required to perform special service or return to active duty, and in which they are spoken of as officers of the army on the retired list, Mr. Justice Miller continued:

"It is impossible to hold that men who are by statute declared to be a part of the army, who may wear its uniform, whose names shall be borne upon its register, who may be assigned by their superior officers to specified duties by detail as other officers are, who are subject to the rules and articles of war, and may be tried, not by a jury, as other citizens are, but by a military court-martial, for any breach of those rules, and who may finally be dismissed on such trial from the service in disgrace, are still not in the military service.

"If Congress chose to provide for their qualified relief from active duty, and for a diminished compensation, it did not discharge them from their other obligations as part of the army of the United States. And if, because they were not required to do full service thereafter, their compensation was diminished by the statute 25 per cent., that is no reason why the accounting officers should add a further limitation of pay not found in any statute.

"We are of opinion that retired officers are in the military service of the government, and that the increased pay of 10 per cent. for each five years' service applies to the years so passed in the service after retirement as well as before."

United States v. Tyler, 105 U. S. 244, 26 L. Ed. 985.

In the O'Dea Case it was held that the right to a pension entered into the contract of the employment of a policeman. The charter provides that the "Police Department shall consist of a board of police commissioners, a chief of police, a police force and of such clerks and employés as shall be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this article." Charter, art. 8, c. 1, § 1. Section 2 of the same chapter provides that—

"All members of the police department shall hold office during good behavior, subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth relating to promotions, suspensions, dismissals and disratements."

Chapter 7 relates to promotions, suspensions, dismissals, and disratements, and provides for charges and trial for punitive purposes. Chapter 10 relates to the police relief and pension fund. Section 3 contains the provisions in question in this case. Section 5 provides that—

"Any person receiving a pension * * * who shall be convicted of felony, shall become dissipated, an habitual drunkard, or shall become a nonresident of this state, shall forfeit all right to said pension."

Section 7 provides that—

"The commissioners shall make rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this chapter and to enforce compliance therewith on the part of members of the department."

Section 10 vests in the board of pension fund commissioners the powers of the board of police commissioners to make rules and regulations for its guidance. It has been shown that in case the disability of the pensioner shall cease he shall be restored to service.

[2] These provisions of the charter would seem to bring the case clearly within the reasoning of Mr. Justice Miller in United States v. Tyler. Paraphrasing his statement:

"It is impossible to hold the men who are by the charter declared to be a part of the police force, who may be reassigned to duty, who are subject to the rules of the police department and who may be tried for offenses against those rules, and for drunkenness, and required upon conviction, to forfeit their vested right to a pension, are still not in the police department."

This conclusion is supported by the language of the charter itself. Section 2 of chapter 10, relating to the police relief and pension fund, provides for the retirement of aged, infirm, or disabled members of the department and contains the following clause:

"Such retired member shall receive * * * a monthly pension. * * * No such pension shall be paid unless such person has been an active member of the department for twenty years continuously next preceding his retirement, and the same shall cease at his death."

Again, in section 6 of the same chapter, which provides a benefit for the widow or children of a member of the department who dies from natural causes, it is further provided that—

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to any member of the department who shall have received any pension under the terms of this chapter."

The Supreme Court has decided that a retired officer who has not resigned or been dismissed still remains a member of the department. Kavanagh v. Police Pension Fund Commissioners, 134 Cal. 53, 66 Pac. 36. Under the provisions of section 2 of chapter 1, relating to the police department, a member of the department shall cease to be such only upon his death unless dismissed for cause after trial, or unless he resigns and thereby forfeits his right to participate in the pension fund.

Apart from the compelling force of the decision in United States v. Tyler, or if the question were entirely new, upon somewhat different reasoning, the same conclusion would be reached. Since, under the O'Dea Case, the right to participate in the pension fund enters into the contract of employment, and since increases of salary of police officers are made from time to time, and if a man faithfully performs his duty his contract is for the remainder of his life, it may well be assumed that a man entering the department contemplates the possible increase of the salary which, but for these beneficial provisions, would be small. Under the construction contended for by the defendants, if two men should have entered the department on the same day, and one of them should have been shot in making an arrest, and his injuries necessitated the amputation of one of his legs, and if, in the regular course of the proceedings of the pension commissioners, he had been retired the day before the increase of salary became effective, he would be entitled to a pension of $51 a month. If the other man had been similarly injured at the same time with similar results, and action on his retirement were deferred until the bill for the increase of salary became effective, he would receive a pension of $70 a month.

The article of the charter relating to the fire department also provides for retirement pensions. At the same election at which the charter amendment was adopted increasing the salaries of members of the police department there was a corresponding amendment adopted providing for the increase of the salaries of the members of the fire department. Stats. 1919, p. 1391. The charter amendment relating to the increased salaries of firemen contained the following clause: "The purpose of this amendment being to increase the salary of each officer, member and employé herein mentioned for the period specified herein" (the provisions being for an increase of the sum of $20 per month for a period of five years to those members of the department receiving an annual salary of $1,860 or less), "but not to increase the pensions mentioned in sections 3, 4, and 5 of chapter 7, article 9 over and above the amounts provided before the adoption of this amendment." Under this provision, the legislative intent was clearly expressed not to increase the pensions provided prior to the amendment for members of the fire department. The amendment providing for the increase of salaries of the members of the police department simply amended the original charter provisions—sections 1 and 6 of chapter 5 of article 8—specifically fixing the salary attached to the various ranks in the police department. There was no limitation or exception in the amendment similar to that relating to the temporary increase of salary granted the members of the fire department.

[3] If doubt remained in regard to the proper construction of the amendment, relating to the police department, it would be resolved in favor of the petitioner because of this difference in the two amendments submitted to the people and adopted at the same election. It is firmly established that pension statutes are to be liberally construed. O'Dea v. Cook, 176 Cal. 662, 169 Pac. 366; Walton v. Cotton, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 355, 15 L. Ed. 658; Hanscom v. Malden, 220 Mass. 1, 107 N. E. 426, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 145.

The evident purpose of the amendment was to make provision for the greatly increased cost of living. It is alleged in the petition that of the 100 or more pensioners, who are situated similarly to the petitioner, most of them are old, disabled, and infirm and unfit for active service in the police department or elsewhere, and that others are widows and children, largely dependent upon their pensions. The increased cost of living peculiarly affects persons so situated, and the reasons which actuated the voters of San Francisco to increase the pensions of men on the active list of the police department apply quite as strongly to those members of the police department who are not on the active list.

The writ of mandate will issue as prayed.

49 Cal. App. 30

PEOPLE v. HAMILTON. (Cr. 491.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. August 5, 1920.)

1. Homicide ⟸228(2)—Corpus delicti may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

Both elements of the corpus delicti of homicide—that is, the death of the person alleged to have been killed and the criminal agency accomplishing the death—may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

2. Homicide ⟸228(2) — Circumstantial evidence held sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

Evidence that deceased and her companion were last seen alive with defendant, that he had a rifle with shells similar to those found near the bodies, and that he made untrue statements as to their disappearance, held sufficient to establish the corpus delicti of killing, though only the skeletons and some of the clothing were found.

3. Criminal law ⟸829(9) — Requested instructions, already covered, need not be given.

Requested instructions that a crime of the character charged, or an inferior crime necessarily included therein, must be proved to have been committed, need not be given, where it was sufficiently covered by the instructions of the court already given.

4. Criminal law ⟸829(15) — Requested instruction on circumstantial evidence held covered by given instructions.

It was unnecessary to give a requested instruction that each fact in the chain must be established beyond reasonable doubt, where the court had already charged that the jury should acquit, if there was doubt as to one of the facts essential to establish guilt, and that to convict circumstantial evidence must be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, except guilt.

5. Homicide ⟸340(3)—Accused cannot complain that instruction on manslaughter was unsupported by evidence, which showed murder or nothing.

On appeal from a conviction for manslaughter, accused cannot complain that it was error to charge on the offense of manslaughter, because the evidence established murder, if it established any offense, since such error was favorable to accused.

6. Criminal law ⟸1039—Objection that sheriff is disqualified to have custody of jury must be made below.

Accused cannot complain on appeal that the sheriff, whom the court had found disqualified to summon the jury, was given custody of the jury during their deliberations, where that objection was not made in the trial court at the time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Fred Hamilton was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. McLaughlin, of Quincy, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The defendant, Fred Hamilton, was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Plumas county, on the 12th day of August, 1919, with the murder of one Gussie Redhead, an Indian woman, on or about the 27th day of July, 1917, near Quincy, in said county of Plumas, and on the trial of the case the defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter, and judgment was pronounced thereon. This appeal is from the judgment and an order refusing to grant a new trial.

The principal point upon which defendant relies for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to prove the corpus delicti, that it fails to prove that any criminal violence had been used, and that the identity of the deceased was not sufficiently established.

It appears that on or about the 12th day of April, 1919, two children, while gathering wild flowers at a place called "Hospital Hill," about 1⅛ miles from the town of Quincy and about ¼ of a mile from the county hospital, at a point about 100 yards from the county road between Quincy and Greenville, found two human skulls. They reported the find, and the officers made an investigation, and found the remains of two human beings. One of the skeletons was apparently that of a woman, the ribs being incased in a corset, while the other was apparently that of a male. These skeletons were near together, being about 100 yards apart. There was a man's coat by the female skeleton, and an arm bone was still in one of the sleeves. It was a blue coat, with small white stripes. There were also found by the female skeleton a part of a shirt, underclothes, some lace, crotchet, and a silver watch, and near the male skeleton were found some teeth, hair, a pocketknife, and part of a vest, the cloth of which was identical with the cloth of the coat by the remains of the female. At the trial the skeleton of the female was identified to be that of Gussie Redhead, and the skeleton of the male to be that of Henry Lee, an Indian. The defendant and the said Gussie Redhead had been for some time living together, and in the early part of July, 1917, he was working on a ranch for one Hugh Seaman. During the time he was employed on this ranch, he was absent at one period for two days, and on his return Mr. Seaman asked him where he had been, and he replied that he had been hunting for his wife, who had run away.

On the night of July 26, 1917, after a picture show in the town of Quincy, the said Gussie Redhead, Henry Lee, Noanie Hardgrave, Tom Hardgrave, Harry Beatty, and the defendant, Fred Hamilton, went together from the town of Quincy to a place on the road called by one of the witnesses "the pines," near the high school. They were drinking, and during the time that they were there a violent quarrel ensued between the defendant and Gussie Redhead, and the language used by both of these parties, according to the evidence of the witness Harry Beatty, was very profane. During this quarrel the defendant attempted to strike said Gussie Redhead and he said something to her about "trying to kill him." While at this place Gussie Redhead complained to Henry Lee about her being cold, and asked him for his coat, which he gave her, and she put the coat on and wore it. It was a blue coat, with small white stripes, and was of the same material as the vest then being worn by the said Henry Lee. As above stated, this coat was found by the remains of Gussie Redhead, and a portion of the vest by the remains of Henry Lee. During the time these parties were at this particular place, Harry Beatty went to sleep among the pines. Afterwards Tom and Noanie Hardgrave went to their home, and Gussie Redhead, Henry Lee, and the defendant left, and went in the direction of the town of Quincy. This was the last time Gussie Redhead and Henry Lee were seen alive. Beatty slept out in the pines until the next morning at about daylight. When he went there the evening before, he had on his person a silver watch, which was missing when he awoke in the morning. He stated that "during the night there was some one came to me, and put their arms around me, and was talking to me; but I couldn't understand what the person said." He knew that the person was a woman by the voice; but he did not remember anything that she said. This silver watch was found lying on the inside of the coat by the remains of Gussie Redhead, rolled up in an old handkerchief, a piece of lace, and crochet.

The next morning after this meeting on the road, at about daylight, the defendant called at the home of Mike Hedrick and borrowed a rifle, saying that he wanted to go hunting. The rifle was a 30-caliber Winchester, model 94. Hedrick also gave him six cartridges for the rifle. These cartridges were soft-pointed, with jackets. Two empty 30-30 cartridge shells (the same kind of cartridges as used in this rifle) were found near the remains of Henry Lee, and near the body was also found a jacket from a bullet of a 30-30 cartridge. There was also found by Dr. Styan, in the decomposed tissues still adhering to the spinal column of the remains of Henry Lee, a similar jacket of a bullet, which jacket was lying against the vertebral column, against the twelfth dorsal vertebra.

The defendant, on the 4th day of July, 1918, in speaking to one Charley Redhead in reference to Henry Lee and Gussie Redhead, said:

"He camped out this side of hospital son of a bitch Gussie and Henry Lee."

He also in 1918, about a year before the trial, in talking to one Tom Epperson about Gussie Redhead, said that she was at Beckwith; that he had been so informed. On or about the 1st day of August, 1917, the defendant called at the "Quincy Laundry" and told a Mrs. G. Que that Henry Lee and Gussie had gone away. This statement was untrue.

[1] In the note to State v. Williams, 78 Am. Dec. 253, it is said by the editor, after referring to the rule that direct and positive evidence is unnecessary to prove the corpus delicti, and the cases in support thereof, that:

"This rule is now clearly established, and it would be most unreasonable to always require direct and positive evidence. Crimes, especially those of the worst kind, are naturally committed at chosen times, in darkness and secrecy. Human tribunals must therefore act upon such indications as the circumstances of the case present or admit, or society must be broken up. The cases just cited show that the jury may find a verdict of guilty upon circumstantial evidence, and that the corpus delicti may be proved by such evidence, as well as any other part of the case, and that this rule applies in cases of murder and manslaughter, as well as in all other crimes. But a few courts have, by refined distinctions, qualified this doctrine slightly. Thus in New York it was laid down, in the first instance by a divided bench, that in murder, either the death, or the criminal agency producing it, must be proved by direct evidence; then the other may be proved by circumstantial evidence. Ruloff v. People, 18 N. Y. 179. The same thing was held as to the crime of murder or manslaughter in People v. Bennett, 48 N. Y. 137; but the court was divided. The better rule, however, is that either element of the corpus delicti, or both, may be proved by circumstantial evidence, and this is the one sustained by the weight of authority, as shown by the cases above cited. But circumstantial evidence should be acted upon with great caution, especially where the public anxiety for the detection of a great crime creates an unusual tendency to exaggerate facts and draw rash inferences (Pitts v. State, 43 Miss. 472); because, of all the various sources of error, one of the most copious and fatal is an unreflecting faith in human testimony."

In State v. Williams, 46 Or. 287, 80 Pac. 655, the Supreme Court of Oregon, in approving this rule as above stated, said:

"To the doctrine of these cases and the rule thus stated we give our assent. The strict rule contended for by defendant would operate completely to shield a criminal from punishment for the most atrocious crime, and afford him absolute immunity if he were cunning enough to consume or destroy the body of his victim by fire or some chemical agency, or completely hide it away, or otherwise destroy its identity, although the proof of his guilt might be of the most clear and convincing kind, and remove all possible doubt in the premises. The death of the person alleged to have been killed is a distinct ingredient in the case of the prosecution for murder or manslaughter, and must be established by direct testimony or presumptive evidence of the most cogent and irresistible kind. Great care in such a case should always be observed in acting upon presumptive or circumstantial evidence. No conviction should be had or allowed to stand on mere suspicion or conjecture alone. * * * Where, as here, the entire circumstances point with one accord to the death of the person alleged to have been murdered, the finding of fragments of a human body, or of metallic articles which are positively identified as part of the body of the alleged victim, or as articles worn by him, will be sufficient, if believed by the jury, to establish the fact of death, when this is the best evidence that can be obtained under the circumstances. People v. Alviso, 55 Cal. 230; McCulloch v. State, 48 Ind. 109; Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711; State v. Williams, 52 N. C. 446; 78 Am. Dec. 248; Gray v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 380, 47 Am. Rep. 733."

In People v. Alviso, 55 Cal. 230, the point was made by the defendants that the corpus delicti was not shown; that, the body of deceased not having been discovered, an essential fact in any charge of murder, viz. death, has not been established. In establishing a charge of murder, two facts are essential to a conviction, viz. the death of the alleged victim and the existence of criminal agency as the cause. The court, in answer to this contention of the defendants said:

"It is very seldom that a conviction occurs without positive proof of the former, either by eyewitnesses of the homicide, or the subsequent discovery of the body; and while the general rule is clearly laid down, yet the authorities concede that there may be exceptions. Thus, Wharton, in his work on Homicide, § 637, relates instances of the human body being disposed of by fire, or boiled in potash, or dissolved by acids, rendering it impossible that it should ever be produced" —and concludes:

"It is clear that in such cases the corpus delicti may be proved circumstantially or inferentially."

In this case of People v. Alviso, the body of the deceased had been burned in a fire, and in the ashes were found a few pieces of bones, "too small to be identified as human bones." But the other circumstances of the case were of a convincing character.

In the case of Mary Ann Nash, 6 English Criminal Appeal Reports, 225, it was held that a jury is entitled to infer that there has been a violent death from circumstantial evidence. In that case Mary Ann Nash was convicted on June 1, 1911, of the murder of her illegitimate son, and sentenced to death. The child was 5 years and 9 months old on June 27, 1907, the date of its murder. The body was discovered by two workmen in a well in April, 1908. The features were unrecognizable and decomposition was very far advanced. There was no evidence as to sex except from the general appearance and dress. * * * She appealed from the conviction, and Lord Alverstone, the Lord Chief Justice, in deciding the case, said:

"It has been submitted that there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury (1) of the identity of the body, and (2) of unlawful killing. As to the identity, counsel was no doubt right in admitting at the trial that there was some evidence; his argument must be that it was not sufficient to justify the jury in convicting. The facts which are undisputed (because appellant did not give or call any evidence), are that on the morning of the 27th of June, 1907, the appellant left with her child, saying that she was going to Mrs. Hillier's, that she would pass near the well where the body was found, and that a woman was seen there with the child on a day about that time. Alone those facts might not be sufficient, but she left with the child in perfect health, and when she returned she said she had left it with Mrs. Hillier; she packed up its clothes, and said she had sent them to her, and later she said the child was well. All these statements were untrue. * * * It is said that there is no evidence of violent death, but we cannot accept that. Counsel cannot have meant that there must be proof from the body itself of a violent death. His argument means that on the whole evidence the possibility is left so open that it was not safe to leave it to the jury. * * * In view of the facts that the child left home well, and was afterwards found dead, that the appellant was last seen with it, and made untrue statements about it, this is not a case which could have been withdrawn from the jury."

[2] In the case at bar the facts that Gussie Redhead and Henry Lee were last seen alive with the defendant on the night of July 26, 1917, and near the time of the homicide, and that the defendant procured a rifle early next morning, and the finding of empty cartridge shells and the jacket of a bullet, of the same caliber as this rifle, near the body of Henry Lee, and the finding of a similar jacket of a bullet in his body, and that the remains of the said Henry Lee and Gussie Redhead were found substantially in the same place, and the untrue statement made by defendant, on or about August 1, 1917, as to their going away, are facts that in our opinion are sufficient to establish the death of the alleged victim within the rules of law above referred to.

It is contended that the court erred in the admission of evidence. We have carefully examined the objections, and we find no error in any of the court's rulings.

[3] Complaint is made of the trial court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. The instruction:

"That as a prerequisite to the conviction of any person charged with the commission of a crime, it must be established that a crime of the character charged against him or a crime of inferior grade necessarily included therein has in fact been committed," etc.

—was sufficiently covered by the instructions of the court given elsewhere.

[4] The proposed instruction as to reasonable doubt was given in the court's charge to the jury, and the proposed instruction to the effect that each essential and independent fact in the chain or series of facts must be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, etc., was in our opinion covered by the instructions by the court. Thus the jury was told:

"That when the evidence against the defendant is made up wholly of a chain of circumstances, and there is a doubt as to one of the facts essential to establish guilt, it is the duty of the jury to acquit. That in order to convict the defendant upon evidence of circumstances, it is necessary, not only that all the circumstances concur to show that he committed the crime charged, but that they are inconsistent with any other rational conclusion. It is not sufficient that the circumstances proved coincide with, account for, and therefore render probable, the hypothesis sought to be established by the prosecution, but they must exclude to a moral certainty every other hypothesis but the one of guilt, or the jury must find the defendant not guilty."

The jury was also instructed:

"That defendant's plea of not guilty puts in issue every material allegation of the information, and places the burden upon, and makes it the duty of the prosecution, before a conviction can be had, to establish to your satisfaction, to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, by legal and competent evidence, each and every material fact essential to a conviction."

[5] Appellant claims that it was error for the court to instruct the jury:

"That under the information in this case the jury may, if the evidence warrants it, find the defendant guilty of * * * manslaughter."

He argues that:

"There is no evidence of manslaughter; it was murder in the first degree, or it was nothing."

But the appellant cannot complain of the giving of this instruction, as it was in his favor, as tending to reduce the charge against him. In a prosecution for murder, where the evidence shows murder in the first degree, error in instructing the jury on the law of manslaughter is favorable and not prejudicial to the defendant. People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal. App. 520, 163 Pac. 508.

"The doctrine is well settled by this court that a defendant cannot complain where the determination of his case was more favorable to him than the evidence warranted." People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128; People v. Barnhart, 59 Cal. 381; People v. Maroney, 109 Cal. 277, 41 Pac. 1097; People v. Lowen, 109 Cal. 381, 42 Pac. 32.

Criticisms are made to other instructions given to the jury, but we find these criticisms to be without merit. The jury was very fully and fairly instructed by the court, and we find no material error in the instructions.

[6] It is lastly contended that the court committed error in placing the sheriff and one of his deputies in charge of the jury during their deliberations. In order to obtain a jury to try this case, it became necessary to order a special venire. The court took evidence, and determined that both the sheriff and the coroner were disqualified, and an order was duly made appointing an elisor to summon such jurors as were required. When the case was about to be submitted, the sheriff and one of his deputies were sworn, and the jury were placed in their charge during their deliberations. There was no objection whatever made by defendant to this proceeding.

In the case of People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 233, 54 Pac. 830, it was held that a sheriff who was disqualified to summon a jury should not be intrusted with the charge of the jury when retiring to deliberate upon their verdict. In that case the sheriff was shown to be disqualified, and, when the time came for the jury to retire to deliberate upon its verdict, the said sheriff, under defendant's objection and exception, was given charge of it. This was held to be error. But in the case at bar, when it came time for the jury to retire to deliberate upon its verdict, no objection whatever was made by the defendant to the sheriff and his deputy being placed in charge of the jury. Not having objected to the proceeding at the proper time, he cannot now be heard to complain that there was any error in such proceeding.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CLARK. (Cr. 2289.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=957(5) — Misconduct of jury cannot be established by juror's affidavit or declarations.

Misconduct by the jury in reading newspaper accounts during the trial cannot be established by an affidavit of a juror, or by declarations by a juror to others, so that an affidavit by an attorney that a juror had stated to him he had read such paper does not entitle accused to a new trial.

2. Criminal law ⊂=789(11) — Instruction to believe as jurors what they would believe as men held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder, where the court had correctly instructed on the presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt, it was not erroneous to charge that the jury are to believe as jurors what they would believe as men, though such charge is needless.

3. Criminal law ⊂=1129(4) — Assignment of error to all adverse rulings need not be considered.

An assignment of error to all rulings overruling objections of counsel for accused, or sustaining objections of the district attorney, together with the giving of the instructions, does not call for consideration on appeal.

James C. Clark was convicted of murder in the first degree, and the death sentence imposed, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for new trial. Affirmed.

J. E. Strong and Neal Chalmers, both of Woodland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, James C. Clark, from a judgment of conviction of murder of the first degree, calling for the death penalty, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant was accused of having, on June 11, 1919, in the town of Esparto, county of Yolo, killed and murdered one Richard Raevell. It is shown by the record that the defendant made certain antecedent threats against the deceased. Carl Richardson, a butcher, testified that, in a conversation with the defendant on the morning of June 10, the latter told him he had "lost his money," and asked the witness whether he thought various persons, naming them, had taken it, but that he did not in any way accuse the deceased. Grady Morgan testified:

That he, the defendant, and the deceased had been drinking together the night before the killing. That the deceased had just returned from Sacramento. That defendant asked him how much money he had spent there, and the deceased laughingly replied, "I spent your $75 and $60 more." That later the same evening the three men came into Raevell's room, where defendant said to the deceased, " 'Dick, I believe you took my money,' or something like that, and Dick, he puffed up right away, and he says, 'Where in hell do you get that * * * old stuff?' " That subsequently defendant and he (the witness) repaired to the latter's room. That just before they parted for the night "He asked me * * * if I would wake him up in the morning. * * * I says, 'Where you going to work?' 'Oh,' he says, 'no place; I just got something I want to attend to.' " That between 5:30 and 6 the next morning, while the witness was still in bed, defendant came into his room and told him: "I heard Dick talking all night. * * * I never slept at all. * * * I'm satisfied Dick took my money." That about an hour later defendant again entered his room, showed him a 32-caliber revolver, and said, "Grady, I've made up my mind to kill Dick." That the witness attempted to dissuade him from his purpose, but defendant replied: " 'I want you to get up and dress and go down to the breakfast table and watch it. I'm going to kill him right in the dining room.' The last thing he said when he went out of the door was: 'Well, I've made up my mind, Grady.' "

W. C. Chilson and Charles Bloom testified that they were in the former's room about 7 o'clock on the morning of the murder, when defendant came in and said he "had a line on the fellow that got my money," and showed them a 32-caliber revolver; that both of them told him to "throw that d——d thing away; and that he went out, saying that he would. John Lewis stated:

That "a little before 8 o'clock" on the same morning he met the defendant on the street in Esparto. "He walked up there, and he sat down for a minute, I suppose, not more; and he says, 'Well, Lewis, I got a trace of my money.' And I says, 'Is that so?' He says: 'Yes; * * * Dick Raevell. I'm going to walk up and shoot him.' And just about that time Dick came walking across from the hotel [where he, the defendant, Morgan, Chilson, and Bloom were staying]. * * * Clark got up and went over where he was, and I got up and went down the street."

It appears from the testimony of Lewis, Chilson, Bloom, and Charles Mack who were eyewitnesses to the murder, that about 5 minutes before 8 o'clock they were sitting in front of a butcher shop on the east side of the main street of Esparto. Just north of the butcher shop, on the same side of the street, was a garage. Shortly after the talk between defendant and Lewis, as already detailed, the former was seen walking north on the west side of the street in company with the deceased. When about opposite the garage they crossed the street, and just before they reached the sidewalk the defendant turned aside as if to join the other men in front of the butcher shop. The deceased continued on to the sidewalk, where he stopped and stood looking into the garage, with his back to the defendant. The defendant, after taking a few steps toward the witnesses, suddenly wheeled around, pulling a revolver from his pocket, walked up behind Raevell, and fired one shot, which struck just back of his left ear. Raevell sank to the ground, rolling over on his back. His face was thus exposed to the defendant, who then stepped to the feet of the wounded man and fired a second shot into the outer corner of his left eye. The death of Raevell from these wounds followed in the course of a few hours. When the defendant was arrested by the sheriff, about 9 o'clock, while on his way to Woodland, he handed over a revolver to the officer with the remark, "This is what I shot Dick with."

The evidence above outlined is substantially uncontroverted. It was testified by several of the witnesses for the prosecution on cross-examination that the defendant was addicted to the use of intoxicants, and that on the day preceding the homicide he had been drinking heavily. This was relied on in part to establish insanity as a defense to the crime charged, and the record shows that the jury was elaborately instructed on that subject, as well as partial insanity and irresistible impulse, and the meaning of section 22 and subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 26 of the Penal Code. In view of the adverse verdict, and the absence of any suggestion in the case that the deceased had said or done anything to provoke, or to cause him to apprehend, an attack, we must assume that the jury found that the defendant was guilty of an unprovoked, deliberate, and premeditated murder, without any extenuating circumstances.

[1] 1. Appellant's first contention is that—

"The trial court erred in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial. At the hearing of this motion defendant introduced an affidavit, made by J. E. Strong, one of defendant's attorneys, in which affidavit it was alleged that one of the jurors * * * admitted to the said J. E. Strong that he had read certain articles appearing in certain newspapers"—referring to publications touching the trial, including an alleged attempt by the defendant to simulate insanity.

No other showing of misconduct was made. The contention cannot be sustained. As was said in People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 301, 308, 64 Pac. 472, 475:

"It is the settled law of this state that the verdict of a jury cannot be impeached by the affidavits of jurors showing misconduct on the part of any member of the jury. * * * Nor can a verdict be impeached by the hearsay statements of jurors regarding such misconduct. People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632. It is equally clear that defendant's affidavit as to the misconduct of the jury, based as it is solely on information and belief, is entitled to no weight. There was no competent or proper evidence of misconduct of the jury laid before the court, and the court very properly refused to grant a new trial."

The rule is thus stated in People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 524, 157 Pac. 599, 604:

"On the motion for a new trial, an affidavit made by one of the counsel for defendant was read and filed, reciting certain statements made to said counsel after the trial by one of the jurors. On this affidavit alone is based the claim of misconduct of the jury, and that the verdict has been decided by means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of all the jurors. The trial court refused to consider the affidavit on two grounds, viz. that a juror cannot be allowed to impeach his own verdict, and that the affidavit here set forth matters purely of a hearsay nature, not being made by the juror, but by another, who simply stated what the juror told him. It is definitely settled in this state, both that the affidavit of a juror cannot be received to impeach the verdict, except where it is the result of a resort to the determination of chance (People v. Soap, 127 Cal. 408, 59 Pac. 771; People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 Pac. 59), and that the same policy that prohibits a juror from impeaching his verdict by his affidavit prevents such impeachment by statements made by the juror to others (People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 Pac. 59; People v. Dobbins, 138 Cal. 694, 699, 72 Pac. 339)."

See, also, 16 C. J. 1241.

The case of People v. McCoy, 71 Cal. 395, 12 Pac. 272, cited by appellant, can have no application here. In that case the court granted a new trial upon an affidavit made by appellant's attorney stating unequivocally that he had seen certain of the jurors reading a newspaper containing "an editorial commendatory of the administration of justice in criminal actions." Here the affiant avers that one of the jurors told him he had read certain newspaper articles during the course of the trial, and states on information and belief that others of the jury read the same articles. Appellant also refers to People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 491, 39 Pac. 24, but it appears in that case that the proof of misconduct consisted of direct testimony by another that the jurors had read a newspaper. This authority is distinguishable on the same ground as the McCoy Case. Plainly the affidavit here was not admissible to impeach the verdict of the jury.

[2] 2. Appellant next assigns error in the giving of that portion of the following instruction requested by the prosecution which we have italicized:

"15. I instruct you, gentlemen, that you are to take into account, in weighing the testimony of any witness, his interest or want of interest in the result of the case, his appearance upon the witness stand, his manner of testifying, his apparent candor or want of candor, whether he is supported or contradicted by the facts and circumstances in the case as shown by the evidence. You have a right to believe all the testimony of a witness, or believe it in part, or you may reject it altogether, as you may find the evidence to be. You are to believe as jurors what you would believe as men, and there is no rule of law that requires you to believe as jurors what you would not believe as men."

Appellant claims that this language "is not a correct statement of the law." Instructions phrased in the same or substantially similar language have frequently been subjected to scrutiny by appellate courts in this and other jurisdictions. In Commonwealth v. Harman, 4 Pa. 269, the defendant had been charged with murder. Chief Justice Gibson, in instructing the jury, declared:

"All evidence is more or less circumstantial, the difference being only in the degree; and it is sufficient for the purpose when it excludes disbelief; that is, actual, and not technical, disbelief; for he who is to pass on the question is not at liberty to disbelieve as a juror while he believes as a man. It is enough that his conscience is clear."

This language was incorporated in an instruction given in State v. Collins, 20 Iowa, 85, and it was held on appeal, reversing the judgment, that—

"The detached fragment embodied in the instruction above quoted we cannot but believe to be of dangerous tendency. * * * We all believe facts as men, when we would not believe them and act upon them as jurors. The idea sought to be conveyed is that a juror is not an artificial being, whose judgment is to be governed by technical and artificial rules, but that he is a man, and should, while acting as a juror, act as a man, exercising his reason, his intelligence, his everyday judgment, and his common sense. In this sense the proposition that, if one believes as a man, he should also believe as a juror, is correct, providing that belief be founded upon and produced by the evidence in the case, and by nothing else, and is so strong, clear, and satisfactory as to exclude all reasonable doubt. If the guilt of the defendant had been fully and undeniably established, if the verdict upon the evidence were satisfactory, we might not have interfered with the judgment in consequence of the giving of the instruction under consideration. The instruction, as given, was, without explanation, calculated to mislead the jury."

We quote from People v. Whitney, 53 Cal. 421:

"At the request of the district attorney the court instructed the jury that 'a juror has no right to disbelieve the evidence as a juror while he believes it as a man. If, therefore, from the evidence in the case, you believe as men that the defendant is guilty, you should as jurors believe him guilty' [quoting from Commonwealth v. Harman, supra]. The instruction, it may be assumed, was taken mainly from the language above cited; but, by directing the attention of the jurors to the evidence, and not merely to the question of the guilt of the defendant, or even to the ultimate facts to be established by the prosecution, it avoids the objection stated by Mr. Justice Dillon in State v. Collins, 20 Iowa, 98, and in our opinion was not calculated to mislead the jury. The only objection to the instruction is that it is useless, and that, having been given, it affords the defendant an opportunity to bring it up to this court for review. It is not to be presumed that jurors would, from the charge of the court, the arguments of counsel, or anything transpiring at the trial, entertain the idea that in becoming jurors they had ceased to be men, or had acquired any new capacity by which they might test the truth of evidence. It was therefore as unnecessary to instruct them that a juror has no right to disbelieve the evidence as a juror while he believes it as a man as it would have been to charge them that in becoming jurors they had not lost the capacity which they possessd as men, to distinguish truth from falsehood or mistake."

And in People v. Worden, 113 Cal. 569, 575, 45 Pac. 844, 847, it was said:

"Of course it would be much the better course for trial judges, as has frequently been said by this court, to limit their description of reasonable doubt to language which has received repeated judicial approval; but they usually desire to add something in their own language, and in the case at bar the judge added something to the well-known definition of Chief Justice Shaw. We see nothing, however, in his charge on this subject, that was erroneous, or likely to mislead the jury, even if it did not make the matter any clearer. The judge said: 'If, after considering all the evidence, you can say you have an abiding conviction,' etc., and then immediately said as follows: 'A juror is not at liberty to disbelieve, as a juror, what he believes as a man.' This latter clause, of course, referred to a belief founded on the evidence; and a similar instruction was held in People v. Whitney, 53 Cal. 420, to be 'useless,' but not erroneous or misleading."

The instruction complained of is in the identical language of one given in Dodge v. Reynolds, 135 Mich. 692, 98 N. W. 737, where it was held that "it was not misleading, and was a proper charge." See, also, Nevling v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 322; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 3 Am. St. Rep. 461, 19 C. J. 995. In State v. Kellison, 56 W. Va. 690, 47 S. E. 166, it was said:

"Instruction No. 2 told the jury that a reasonable doubt was not a vague or uncertain doubt, and that what the jury believed from the evidence as men, they should believe as jurors. This, taken in connection with the instruction given for the defendant, saying it was the duty of the state to prove the accused guilty beyond all reasonable doubt in order to convict, states the law with sufficient accuracy. They were told that their belief must be founded upon the evidence, and that a vague and uncertain doubt is not a reasonable doubt within the meaning of the law. How there could be any difference between their belief as men and their belief as jurors is not perceptible. Being jurors, they were still men, and the only belief possible is that which fastens itself upon the human mind, and they were told that it must be belief beyond all reasonable doubt. All the authorities say that reasonable doubt is difficult to define, but that its meaning is not difficult for a jury to comprehend. State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 609, 610. * * * As the jurors were acting under oath, it cannot be assumed that they were men of such feeble understanding as to deem themselves relieved from the obligations thereby imposed by the terms of the instruction."

The judgment in this case was affirmed.

Robinson v. State [Wyo.] 106 Pac. 24, is cited by appellant. Instruction 6 contained this language:

"You are not at liberty to disbelieve as jurors, if you believe as men; your oath imposes upon you no obligation to doubt, where no doubt would exist if no oath had been administered."

The court declared:

"One of the essential elements of that instruction is lacking, viz. that the belief in the guilt of the accused sufficient to convict must be based upon the evidence."

But in the instruction here the language complained of is immediately preceded by this:

"You have a right to believe all the testimony of a witness, or believe it in part, or you may reject it altogether, as you may find the evidence to be."

It is plain that the verdict at which the jury was to arrive "must be based on the evidence in the case."

Appellant also cites on this point People v. Johnson, 140 N. Y. 350, 35 N. E. 604. We quote from the opinion in that case:

"There was a request to charge * * * that the jurors should be convinced as jurors when they would be convinced as men, and should doubt as jurors when they would doubt as men."

This "eliminates the oath and the responsibility of the jury."

The instruction was held to have been properly refused. This authority, like the Robinson Case, is distinguishable from the one at bar.

In the first instruction requested by appellant, and given, the jury were told that—

"Every intendment of the law is in favor of innocence. The law presumes the defendant to be innocent of any degree of crime until his guilt is proven beyond all reasonable doubt by competent evidence. This presumption of innocence rests with the defendant throughout all stages of the trial until the case is finally submitted to you for your deliberation, and during your deliberation and until a verdict is agreed upon. Each and every fact and circumstance relied upon by the prosecution to establish the guilt of the defendant must be proven by the evidence in the case beyond a reasonable doubt; but the defendant is only called upon to raise in your minds a reasonable doubt as to the truth of any fact relied upon by him to establish his innocence."

In the third instruction requested by the defendant, and given to the jury, the term "reasonable doubt" was correctly defined.

In the light of the foregoing authorities and the cognate portions of the charge which we have quoted, it cannot be said that the instruction in question was calculated to confuse the jury, or that it was erroneous. As in People v. Whitney, supra, the attention of the jurors was directed to the testimony, and not to the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The entire instruction pointed out the matters which the jurors should take into consideration in resolving the credibility of the witnesses (section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.; section 1102, Penal Code), and merely concluded with an injunction that in determining such credibility whatever they believed as men they were to believe as jurors, and that there was no rule of law requiring them to believe as jurors what they would not believe as men—an admonition sagely sound, but palpably unnecessary. It is not conceivable that the jury understood the instruction in any other sense than that, while passing upon the evidence as jurors, they were to be governed by the conclusions which they would reach as men. It may be observed, however, that where a jury in a criminal case has been properly instructed as to the presumption of innocence and the doctrine of reasonable doubt, an instruction like the one under review should not be given, for, as Mr. Justice Rhodes remarked in the Whitney Case:

"The only objection * * * is that it is useless, and that, having been given, it affords the defendant an opportunity to bring it up to this court for review."

[3] 3. Appellant's third assignment of error is to—

"all of the rulings of the court overruling the objections of his counsel, or sustaining the objections of the district attorney, * * * together with the giving of the instructions as they appear in the record."

No portions of the record are referred to or quoted, no authorities are cited or discussed, and, indeed, appellant does not specify wherein the court erred in the giving of the instructions or in the rulings on the evidence. We do not feel called upon to consider points so presented. See Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 Pac. 278; Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 124 Pac. 817; Born v. Castle, 175 Cal. 680;[1] Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 184 Pac. 672. But, because of the gravity of defendant's situation, we have scrutinized the record, and, apart from the assignments of error already considered, we do not find that any of the objections require discussion. The trial was conducted with marked fairness on the part of both court and counsel. The charge to the jury was complete, every one of the 21 instructions proposed by the defendant, covering a wide range of subjects, being given, and upon the evidence it does not seem that any other verdict could have been returned.

Judgment and order affirmed.

CHARLES EHRLICH & CO. et al. v. J. ELLIS SLATER CO. (L. A. 6057.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1920.)

1. Process ⟸166—Objections not made ground of motion to quash service are waived.

Objection to service of process on defendant foreign corporation, that it was not such corporation in fact at the time of service, was waived where not made a ground of motion to quash, but, on the contrary, affidavits filed by defendant in support of the motion referred to itself as a foreign corporation.

2. Corporations ⟸659 — Foreign corporation estopped to deny legality of organization to attack service.

Defendant foreign corporation, which, although it had not completed its organization under the laws of Illinois, nevertheless allowed itself to be held out in California as a corporation, conducting business in the state as such, is estopped to deny the validity of its organization, to invalidate service of process on it through an agent.

3. Corporations ⟸668(10) — Agent held to have acted for foreign corporation, to warrant service on him.

Where the agent of a foreign corporation, compensated by commissions, acted, negotiated, and made binding contracts for it, pursuant to its business of purchasing fruit in California for shipment to itself in Illinois, from the scope and extent of the business done by him, the court was warranted in holding that he sufficiently represented the company to bring it into court by service of process on him pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2.

4. Corporations ⟸668(16)—Evidence held to show agent was such for service of process.

Evidence on a motion to quash service on a foreign corporation held sufficient to show that its agent in California for the purchase of fruit was the company's business agent at the time of service of process on him, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 411, subd. 2, though his authority to sign drafts had been withdrawn.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Charles Ehrlich & Co. and others against the J. Ellis Slater Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Collier, John Schlegel, Louis F. Laberere, and Walter H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN, of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, while acting as justice pro tempore in this court in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of this court.

This is an action instituted by the plaintiffs against the appellant to recover the sum of $2,926.48 for the breach of a contract, by the terms of which the plaintiffs sold and delivered to the defendant, f. o. b. California, three carloads of fruit, for which one H. J. Martin issued three drafts, aggregating the agreed price of the fruit, upon the defendant at its office in Chicago, and which he signed "J. Ellis Slater Co., H. J. Martin."

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant is a corporation created and existing under the laws of the state of Illinois, and throughout the transcript the defendant is referred to as a corporation. The defendant was served with process in the action in the method prescribed for service thereof upon foreign corporations, viz. by delivering it to H. J. Martin as its business agent; said Martin in the transaction referred to, as well as in many others of similar character, having represented the defendant as its agent. The defendant, appearing specially for that purpose, moved to set aside and quash such service, upon the grounds that at the time thereof it was not doing business in this state, that the said Martin was not a managing or business agent of the defendant, and that the defendant had not designated him as a person upon whom process might be served. The motion was heard upon affidavits and oral evidence, and was denied. The defendant refusing to appear in the case, judgment by default was entered against it as demanded in the complaint, from which judgment defendant has appealed, and urges upon such appeal that the superior court acquired no jurisdiction of its person by the service of process so made.

Section 411, of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that a summons in a civil action must be served by delivering a copy thereof:

"* * * 2. If the suit is against a foreign corporation, * * * doing business and having a managing or business agent, cashier or secretary within the state: To such agent, cashier or secretary."

Defendant contends that it was not a corporation at the time of the alleged service of process; but that, if it is to be considered as such, it was not subject to service of process in California, for the reason that it was not doing business and had no agent in this state; also that, even if it had been doing business here, and if Martin had been its managing agent, still he was no longer such at the time of the purported service of summons. It is upon these contentions that the appellant bases its argument of lack of jurisdiction of its person in the lower court.

[1] It is provided in the Illinois statute relative to the formation of corporations for profit that a corporation is not fully organized until after certain specified papers have been filed in the office of the secretary of state and a certificate of complete organization has been issued and filed. It appears that the certificate of incorporation of the defendant had not been filed at the time of the service of process in this case, and the appellant accordingly argues that at that time, under the law of Illinois, the state of its creation, it had no legal existence as a corporation, and hence that this action is not maintainable against it. This objection was not made one of the grounds of the motion to quash. On the contrary, not only in the notice of motion, but in the affidavits filed by the appellant in support of the motion, it refers to itself as a foreign corporation. The appellant must therefore be deemed to have waived this ground of objection. Dickinson v. Zubiate Mining Co., 11 Cal. App. 656, 662, 106 Pac. 123.

[2] Moreover, the record plainly discloses that the defendant conducted business in this state in the garb of a corporation; such acts inducing the present transaction. It will not be permitted, therefore, to deny its corporate existence. Plainly, under the circumstances, it was a de facto corporation. It allowed itself to be held out as a corporation, and this is sufficient to estop it to deny the legality of its organization. Los Angeles, etc., Band v. Spires, 126 Cal. 541, 58 Pac. 1049; San Diego, etc., Co. v. Frame, 137 Cal. 441, 70 Pac. 295; 10 Cyc. 245. This also appears to be the law in Illinois. Bushnell v. Con. Ice, etc., Co., 138 Ill. 67, 27 N. E. 596; Marshall v. Keach, 227 Ill. 35, 81 N. E. 29, 118 Am. St. Rep. 247, 10 Ann. Cas. 164.

[3] As to the appellant's second contention, the evidence shows that the company was doing business in California and that Martin was its managing or business agent at the time of this transaction. It appears that, during a period antedating the present transaction and extending beyond its close, the appellant, through H. J. Martin, was engaged in purchasing fruit in California for shipment to Chicago; Martin negotiating and making contracts for such purchases with the growers in the southern part of the state, the fruit to be accepted by him f. o. b. California points. He examined the fruit so purchased, and saw to it that it was packed in accordance with the instructions of the defendant; he arranged with the railroad companies for its shipment; he fixed the wages of employés here; and for the purchase price of fruit, or any other indebtedness incurred here by him for the defendant, he drew sight drafts on the company, signed with its name "per" himself.

It is true that Martin was instructed as to the price to be paid for the fruit, as to its character and quality, how and when it was to be shipped; but as to these matters, especially upon the question of quality, his duties required the exercise of judgment and discretion. He acted, negotiated, and made binding contracts for appellant, and from the scope and extent of the business transacted by him the court below was warranted in holding that he sufficiently represented the appellant to bring it into court by service of process on Martin. Brophy v. Fairmont Creamery Co., 98 Neb. 307, 152 N. W. 557, L. R. A. 1918A, 367; Smith v. Farbenfabriken of E. Ci., 203 Fed. 476, 121 C. C. A. 598; Nelson, Morris & Co. v. Rehkopf (Ky.) 75 S. W. 203. The fact that the compensation received by Martin for his services was in the form of a commission upon the amount of his purchases is not, of course, controlling upon the question of agency; and when, as here, the representative of the foreign corporation has charge of and conducts the business of the corporation in the manner already pointed out, the method of compensating him for his service will make him none the less the business agent of the corporation, and service of summons on him as such representative will be good as against his principal.

[4] The appellant finally urges that, conceding that Martin was its business agent relative to the business conducted in California, the evidence fails to show that he was such agent at the time of the service of summons. It is true that after the purchase of plaintiff's fruit, and its rejection by defendant, and when defendant apparently expected litigation to follow, it forbade Martin to sign its name to drafts, and in a letter to Martin attempted an interpretation of their relations; but there is also evidence showing that their relations continued as before, with the exception of the right to sign defendant's name to drafts until after the time when the summons in this case was served, which was about a month after the sale of the fruit. We think it is sufficient to show that Martin was the business agent of defendant at the time of the service of process.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Corporations ⊂=96—Evidence held to show that stock was paid for by corporation and not officers to whom issued.

In action involving ownership of stock of corporation as between another corporation and certain officers thereof in whose name the stock was issued, evidence held to sustain finding that the consideration for the stock was paid by the other corporation, and not by such officers.

2. Evidence ⊂=424—Parol evidence admissible to prove consideration for stock was paid by one not a party.

In action involving ownership of stock of corporation as between other corporation and certain officers thereof in whose name stock was issued, parol evidence held admissible to prove that consideration for stock was paid by other corporation as against contention that such testimony contradicted the recitals of the minutes of the first corporation that stock was issued to such officers, and therefore varied the terms of a written contract, since the controversy was not between the two corporations, and since the rule prohibiting the admission of oral testimony to vary the terms of a written contract applies only to a controversy concerning the subject-matter of contract, arising between the parties to the contract.

3. Appeal and error ⊂=690(4)—Admission of document in evidence not considered, where document is not contained in record.

Supreme Court may refuse to consider alleged error in admitting document in evidence, where absence of document from record makes it impossible for the court to ascertain extent to which the recitals of the document were material.

4. Evidence ⊂=318(4)—Statement of assets of corporation held not hearsay.

Written statement of assets of a corporation held admissible as against contention that it was hearsay in so far as particular defendant was concerned, where there was evidence that the statement had been prepared at the request of such defendant, and that the data therefor had been assembled by such defendant and another in the office of the corporation.

5. Evidence ⊂=317(5)—Testimony as to conversation not in hearing of party inadmissible.

In action involving ownership of stock of corporation as between other corporation and certain officers thereof in whose name stock was issued, testimony as to conversation between such officers held inadmissible, in absence of evidence that the conversation was in the presence and hearing of other officer and principal stockholder of such other corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action of interpleader by the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company against the Simons Brick Company, Joseph Simons, and others, in which the defendants cross-complained. Judgment for plaintiff, and for defendant Simons Brick Company as against certain of the other defendants, and defendant Joseph Simons and such other unnamed defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. Ford and Henry G. Bodkin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Davis, Kemp & Post and Kemp & Clewett, and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Walter R. Simons, in pro. per.

LENNON, J. The corporation plaintiff in this action of interpleader sought a judgment determining the ownership of certain designated shares of its corporate capital stock. The plaintiff's complaint proceeded upon the theory that there were conflicting claims to the title of the stock in suit which were being asserted repeatedly by the defendant Simons Brick Company on the one hand and the six other defendants on the other hand. All of the defendants to the action cross-complained, and by appropriate allegations pleaded their various claims to the stock in question. The trial court found, among other things, that the consideration for the issuance of the stock in controversy was paid solely by the Simons Brick Company; that said stock was issued in the name of Joseph Simons and E. O. Simons as trustees for the owner thereof, namely, the Simons Brick Company; that the latter, as the owner of the stock, was entitled to all dividends paid thereon; and that neither defendant Joseph Simons nor the other defendants, as the heirs of E. O. Simons, deceased, had any interest in said stock or in the dividends due therefrom. The plaintiff, Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, was adjudged to be relieved from all liability for and on account of its dealings with the said stock, and judgment was rendered and entered in favor of the defendant Simons Brick Company, declaring it to be the owner of and entitled to the said stock. From this judgment an appeal has been taken upon the judgment roll and bill of exceptions, a reversal being urged primarily upon the ground that the evidence does not sustain the findings in the particulars: (1) That it does not appear from any competent evidence that the defendant Simons Brick Company was the actual owner of the stock; (2) that there is no evidence that the consideration for the stock was paid by the defendant Simons Brick Company. The two questions involved in this contention are so closely interwoven as to justify a single discussion of the evidence bearing upon that phase of the case.

Upon behalf of the Simons Brick Company and in support of its claim of ownership of the stock in suit evidence was adduced to the effect as follows: The plaintiff, Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, was incorporated about the 17th day of February, 1908, and at that time the defendant Simons Brick Company was a corporation of which the defendant Joseph Simons and E. O. Simons were directors and, respectively, president and secretary. Aside from purely nominal stockholders, all of the stock in the Simons Brick company was owned by three brothers, Joseph Simons, Walter Simons, and E. O. Simons, since deceased. The Bituminized Brick & Tile Company was organized and incorporated under the laws of the state of California pursuant to an agreement entered into by and between the Simons Brick Company, Fairchilds-Gilmore-Wilton Company, and one George P. Griffith, whereby it was understood and agreed that the parties to the agreement would respectively advance proportionately the money needed to establish and maintain the new corporation in the business of manufacturing bituminized brick. The defendant Simons Brick Company advanced to the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, from time to time in keeping with said agreement, the sum of two thousand and sixty-odd dollars in cash or the equivalent of cash. At its organization meeting, the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company caused to be issued 40½ shares of its capital stock in the name of E. O. Simons and the defendant Joseph Simons. At the time of the issuance of said stock said Joseph and E. O. Simons were, respectively, the president and secretary of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company. After the issuance of the said stock to the said Joseph Simons and E. O. Simons, the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company levied an assessment thereon, which was paid by the defendant Simons Brick Company. When issued the said stock was deposited in the safe of the Simons Brick Company, and remained there up to the time of the commencement of the action, and was at all times carried as a corporation asset on the books and bank statements of the corporation. Prior to the commencement of this action, Walter Simons purchased from the other stockholders of the Simons Brick Company all of the stock in the said Simons Brick Company with the exception of the shares of the minor children of E. O. Simons, deceased, and the 1 share of stock apiece held by the members of the board of directors to enable them to qualify. The question thereupon arose as to whether the shares of stock in the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company passed as assets of the Simons Brick Company, or whether they were personal holdings of the parties in whose names they were issued, namely, Joseph, Walter, and E. O. Simons. The defendants Laura Simons Garfield, Joe Taylor Simons, and Helen Simons, the two last-named persons being minors, and Laura Simons Garfield, the guardian of the persons and estates of the minors, were, during all of the times involved in the controversy concerning the stock, the sole legatees and devisees by last will and testament of the estate of E. O. Simons, deceased, who died in or about the month of June, 1913. They were the widow and children of E. O. Simons, deceased, and were made defendants in this action in his place and stead.

The minutes of the organization meeting of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company show that the president and secretary thereof namely, Joseph and E. O. Simons, were authorized to issue the shares of stock in controversy here to said Joseph and E. O. Simons "in consideration of moneys to be paid by said parties for the building of the plant of this company." Apparently it is upon this latter piece of evidence that counsel for appellant rely primarily to support their contention that the initial agreement to advance the needed funds for the establishment of the business of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company was purely personal to Joseph and E. O. Simons, and was not the corporate conduct and contract of the Simons Brick Company. Standing alone, the minutes of the organization meeting mentioned might suffice as prima facie evidence of the fact that the agreement to advance the money was the personal and individual obligation of Joseph and E. O. Simons. But, taken and considered in conjunction with established circumstances concerning the conception and consummation of the initial agreement, the conclusion is inescapable that the Simons Brick Company, as represented by Joseph and E. O. Simons, was the real party obligated and to be benefited by the initial agreement, and not Joseph and E. O. Simons individually. Incidentally, it should be noted that the record is barren of any evidence showing or tending to show that Joseph and E. O. Simons individually and directly gave any consideration for the issuance of the stock in suit, or that any consideration was given therefor aside from the money or its equivalent advanced by the Simons Brick Company to the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company. Moreover, there is evidence that, when the cross-defendant Walter Simons discovered that the stock in suit stood in the names of Joseph and E. O. Simons upon the books of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, and not in the name of the Simons Brick Company, he made objection thereto, specifying as grounds thereof that "it was the Simons Brick Company's money that went into the investment," and insisted that "the stock belongs to the Simons Brick Company." To this objection and claim of Walter Simons, Joseph and E. O. Simons replied, "All right, we will straighten it out," and thereupon, so some evidence shows, agreed with the said Walter Simons that the stock in suit should be "divided up in the names of Joe Simons, Elmer Simons, and Walter Simons, * * * and that it would be held by the Simons Brick Company in that way." The stock was accordingly returned and reissued by the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company to Joseph, E. O., and Walter Simons in certain specified proportions. There is evidence tending to show that the purpose in causing the stock to be issued in the names of the three brothers, rather than in the name of the corporation, was to enable the former to qualify as officers of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company.

It may be conceded, as counsel for appellant contend, that the manner of making the several payments or advancements, either in cash or the equivalent of cash, claimed to have been made by the Simons Brick Company, coupled with the character of the bookkeeping entries of the several amounts which went to make up the sum total of $2,060, might have supported the inference that said sum and the several items thereof were carried by the Simons Brick Company as an open account with the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, rather than as an entry of the passing from the Simons Brick Company of the consideration called for by the initial agreement. On the other hand, there was much evidence in explanation of said several payments which, when coupled with the circumstances, unnecessary to be detailed here, preceding, attending, and following the creation of the new corporation, tended to show, and consequently warranted the inference which the trial court apparently made, that the said several items were entered and carried upon the books of the Simons Brick Company as evidence of the passing of the consideration called for by the initial agreement to promote the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company.

[1] True, there is some evidence in the record which would have supported a finding contrary to that made by the trial court, and, while counsel for appellant argue with much vigor that the preponderance of the evidence adduced upon the whole case should have compelled the trial court to make findings favorable to the appellant, of course, such an argument necessarily involves a weighing of conflicting evidence in order to determine where the preponderance may rest. That, however, was solely the province of the trial court. In short, a careful consideration of the evidence adduced upon the whole case satisfies us that there exists a substantial conflict of competent evidence, which was directed to the issue of the ownership of the stock in controversy, which issue, of course, involved the subsidiary issue of the source and character of the consideration for its issuance. Confronted, as we are, with this condition of the evidence, it is idle to argue here in this court that there is no evidence to support the trial court's finding "that the consideration for said stock was paid by the Simons Brick Company, a corporation, and was not paid for by the said Joseph Simons, or the said E. O. Simons, or either of them, but said stock was issued in the name of E. O. Simons and Joseph Simons, as trustees for the Simons Brick Company, and the Simons Brick Company has at all times been and now is the owner of the said stock since the issuance thereof to the said E. O. Simons and Joseph Simons." Needless to say, these findings being supported by some sufficient evidence, it follows necessarily as a matter of law that the judgment is supported by the findings, and it goes without saying that the finding of ownership in the Simons Brick Company of the stock in suit is ample support for the other and further finding that the Simons Brick Company was and is entitled to the dividends emanating from said stock.

[2] Concerning the competency of some of the evidence to support the assailed findings, it is suggested, rather than contended, that the minutes of the organization meeting of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company constituted a contract in writing between that corporation and Joseph Simons and E. O. Simons, which contract completely evidenced the intent and covenant of the parties thereto, and consequently that the trial court erred in permitting parol evidence for the purpose of contradicting the recitals of the contract. In response to this it will suffice to say that, conceding the minutes of the organization meeting to be a contract, the rule prohibiting the admission of oral testimony to vary the terms of a written contract applies only to controversies concerning the subject-matter of the contract arising between the parties to the contract. Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 51, 44 Pac. 354; Smith v. Goethe, 159 Cal. 628, 632, 115 Pac. 223, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1205; Massy v. Chatom, 163 Cal. 772, 777, 127 Pac. 56; In re Smith's Estate, 176 Cal. 729, 171 Pac. 289. Obviously the controversy here was not between the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company and Joseph Simons and E. O. Simons, and consequently the rule referred to has no application to the facts of this case.

It is contended upon behalf of appellant that, even though it be conceded, as we find, that there was evidence sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the consideration for the stock in controversy was paid by the Simons Brick Company, nevertheless, the evidence adduced upon the whole case shows, it is claimed, that after the stock was issued there was an amicable agreement by and between Walter Simons, Joseph Simons, and E. O. Simons, who were practically the owners of the entire capital stock of the Simons Brick Company, to apportion unto themselves and hold and own individually the stock of the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company, and that, as a consequence of that agreement, Walter Simons, as one of the parties thereto, is estopped from questioning the validity of the agreement. The answer to this contention is to be found in the fact that the record shows, as previously indicated, evidence to the effect that, when Walter Simons protested the assumption of individual ownership of the stock in suit by Joseph and E. O. Simons, the latter agreed, not only that the stock should be held in certain designated proportions in the names of Joseph, E. O., and Walter Simons, but that it should be so held by them as the property and asset of the Simons Brick Company. We need not stop, therefore, to consider the doctrine of estoppel as perhaps it may be applied to a situation where the stockholders of the corporation voluntarily and unanimously consent to a distribution of all or a part of the corporate assets among themselves in a manner and under circumstances which in no way impair the rights of creditors.

[3] Complaint is made of the ruling of the trial court admitting in evidence a document produced from the files of the Simons Brick Company, claimed to be a statement of the assets of the Simons Brick Company for which the data was assembled by the three brothers, Joseph, Walter, and E. O. Simons. Objection was made to the document in evidence upon the ground that it was but a copy of an original statement sent to a bank for the purpose of obtaining credit, and therefore was not the best evidence. To what extent the recitals of the document were material we can only surmise, for, while it was "ordered received in evidence and marked 'Defendant's Exhibit 1'" we have been unable to find it in the record, and therefore we might dispose of the claim of error in this particular upon the ground that the record before us does not show affirmatively all the facts upon which the claim of error is predicated. However, assuming, as may be fairly inferred from the record as a whole, that the document in question was the statement of assets frequently referred to throughout the testimony adduced upon the whole case, wherein the stock in suit was listed as a corporate asset of the Simons Brick Company, the objection to its admission upon the ground stated was not well taken. This is so for the reason that it was ultimately shown that the document in question was not a copy, but an original statement filed among the papers of the corporation, a copy of which was delivered to the bank.

[4] It was, as the trial court ruled, an original document. The contention that the subject-matter of the document in question was hearsay in so far as defendant Joseph Simons was concerned is effectively and adversely answered by the record itself, which shows the foundation evidence for the introduction of the document in evidence to be that it had been "prepared by the Simons Brick Company at the request of the president Joe Simons," and that the "data" therefor was "assembled" by "Mr. Joseph Simons * * * and Elmer Simons in the office of the Simons Brick Company."

[5] There is no merit in the contention that the trial court erred in refusing to permit defendant Joseph Simons to narrate a conversation purporting to have been had between himself and E. O. Simons as to whether or not they would take the stock in suit from the Bituminized Brick & Tile Company and keep it as their individual personal property or take it on behalf of and for the Simons Brick Company. It was not shown, nor attempted to be shown, that this conversation was had in the presence and hearing of the defendant Walter Simons, and therefore as to him it was hearsay, and consequently properly rejected upon that ground, which was the ground of objection made in the trial court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BRAUN v. CREW et ux. (L. A. 6083.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 22, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⟸283(1)—Relation of principal and surety arises on assumption of mortgage debt by mortgagor's purchaser.

Assumption by mortgagor's purchase of payment of the mortgage debt makes both mortgagor and purchaser personally liable therefor and creates the relation of principal and surety between them; the purchaser being the principal and the mortgagor the surety.

2. Mortgages ⟸283(2)—Change in obligation between mortgagee and mortgagor's purchaser relieves mortgagor.

Where mortgagor's purchaser has assumed payment of mortgage debt, any contract or arrangement between purchaser and mortgagee which has the effect of materially altering the terms of the obligation to pay the mortgage debt, to which mortgagor does not consent, operates to release mortgagor.

3. Mortgages ⟸282(1) — Purchaser not assuming payment of mortgage debt not personally liable.

Where mortgagor's purchaser does not assume payment of mortgage debt, the purchaser is not personally liable therefor.

4. Mortgages ⟸278—Land primarily liable, where sold subject to mortgage.

Where land is sold subject to mortgage, the land becomes, so far as the mortgagor is concerned and as between mortgagor, the mortgagee, and the purchaser, primarily liable for the payment of the debt, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, mortgagee's debt cannot be collected by action except by foreclosing the mortgage, in which case mortgagor is liable only for such balance as may remain unpaid after the money realized on the foreclosure sale has been applied on the debt and costs.

⟸For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

5. Mortgages ⟸278 — Mortgagor released from personal liability by mortgagee's agreement with mortgagor's successor extending time for payment.

Where land has been sold subject to mortgage agreement between mortgagee and purchaser's successors extending the time of payment without mortgagor's consent releases mortgagor from personal liability in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2836, 2840, since in such case the relation of principal and surety exists between the land and the mortgagor; the mortgagor being the surety and the land the principal debtor.

6. Principal and surety ⟸104(1)—Surety released by creditor's extension of time.

Where there is an extension of time by the creditor to the principal without the consent of the surety, the question of the extent of the injury which the surety sustains therefrom cannot be inquired into, and the creditor cannot show that the principal debtor was then wholly or partially insolvent and remained so; the surety being released by the mere fact that the contract is materially altered without his consent.

7. Mortgages ⟸278 — Extension of time for payment completely releases mortgagor, regardless of value of land.

The rule that the mortgagor, on mortgagee's unauthorized extension of time for payment to one who has purchased land subject to mortgage, is released only to the extent of the value of the land, so that mortgagor, to show his complete release, must show that value of land is equal to or greater than amount of mortgage debt, does not, in view of Civ. Code, § 2819, obtain in California, but the ordinary rule of principal and surety, that any unauthorized extension releases the surety completely, applies, and the value of the land is immaterial in such case.

8. Mortgages ⟸278 — Extension to mortgagor's grantee released grantor though conveyance contained no covenant against incumbrances.

Where land was sold subject to mortgage, mortgagee's unauthorized extension of time for payment given mortgagor's successor in interest released mortgagor under Civ. Code, § 2819, regardless of whether conveyance by mortgagor to his successor contained any covenant against incumbrances.

9. Mortgages ⟸278—Agreement for extension of time must be founded on consideration.

Agreement between mortgagee and mortgagor's successor, extending the time for payment of mortgage debt is not valid, so as to discharge the mortgagor if given without mortgagor's consent, unless founded on some new and valuable consideration.

10. Mortgages ⟸278—Presumption that written agreement, extending time for payment, was based on consideration not conclusive.

Under Civ. Code, § 1614, written agreement between mortgagee and mortgagor's successor, extending time for payment of mortgage debt is presumptively based on a consideration, so as to operate to discharge the mortgagor if unauthorized, but such presumption is not conclusive, and the contrary may be shown by other evidence.

11. Mortgages ⟸278 — Payment of part of mortgage debt after maturity not consideration for extension.

The payment of a part of a mortgage debt after maturity would not be a sufficient consideration for extension of time for payment between mortgagee and mortgagor's successor in interest, for such extension to discharge the mortgagor, if given without his consent.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Catherine Braun against Thomas Crew and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and from that portion thereof which provides for a deficiency judgment against defendants, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Geo. M. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

G. A. Gibbs, of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint states a cause of action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the two appellants to the plaintiff. The court gave judgment foreclosing the mortgage and providing for a deficiency judgment against the two appellants in case the foreclosure sale did not satisfy the debt. The appellants do not complain of the portion of the judgment foreclosing the mortgage. Their objection is to the provision for the deficiency judgment against them, their claim being that they have been released from personal liability on the debt by an extension of time made by the plaintiff to a subsequent holder of the land under the appellants, after said purchase and without the consent of the appellants.

The mortgage and the note which it was given to secure were executed by the appellants on September 13, 1912. The debt was due three years after date. Afterwards Crew and wife sold the property to one Peters, and thereafter by subsequent transfers Clyde E. Cate became the owner thereof, and while he was such owner, on October 20, 1915, at his request and without the knowledge or consent of the appellants, the plaintiff, by a written agreement with Cate, extended the time of payment of the mortgage debt for the term of two years from that date. These facts appear from the findings. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. The value of the land was not put in issue, and does not appear from the findings or elsewhere in the record. It is not alleged or found that the purchaser of the land from the mortgagor, or any subsequent purchaser thereof, assumed or agreed to pay the mortgage debt, or that the same constituted a part of the consideration of either of the respective transfers. Neither does it appear that the conveyance made by Crew and wife to Peters contained any covenant that the land was free from incumbrance, or that Peters, or any subsequent purchaser, took subject to the mortgage, by the contract of transfer. The mortgage, however, was duly recorded, and therefore their interest in the land was necessarily subject to such mortgage.

[1, 2] Where the purchaser from the mortgagor assumes the payment of the mortgage debt, both are personally liable therefor. It is settled by many decisions in this state that in such a case the relation of principal and surety at once arises between the mortgagor and the purchaser, the purchaser being the principal and the mortgagor the surety, and that any contract or arrangement between the purchaser and the mortgagee which has the effect of materially altering the terms of the obligation to pay the mortgage debt operates to release the surety, unless he consents thereto. Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 292, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 61, 65 Pac. 139; Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 667, 55 Pac. 683; Tulare Co. Bank v. Madden, 109 Cal. 314, 41 Pac. 1092; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 37 Pac. 411.

The case is precisely the same as any other contract to pay money executed by two persons, where one is surety for the other and the creditor is aware of that relation.

[3, 4] Where the vendee of the mortgagor does not assume payment of the mortgage debt, the vendee is not personally liable therefor, and consequently no relation of principal and surety can arise between the two, with regard to the personal liability. If such vendee takes subject to the mortgage the land thereupon becomes, so far as the mortgage is concerned, and as between him, the creditor, and the vendee, primarily liable for the payment of the debt. Under the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 726), his debt cannot be collected by action, except by foreclosing the mortgage, and he can be adjudged liable only for such balance as may remain unpaid after the money realized upon the foreclosure sale has been applied upon the debt and costs. Brown v. Willis, 67 Cal. 235, 7 Pac. 682; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 362, 30 Pac. 609. When such conveyance is made, the relation of principal and surety springs up between the land and the mortgagor, he being the surety and the land the principal debtor. Bridge v. Conn, etc., Co., 167 Cal. 782, 141 Pac. 375; Crisman v. Lanterman, 149 Cal. 651, 87 Pac. 89, 117 Am. St. Rep. 167; Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y. 616. He becomes at once entitled to all the protection which the law gives to sureties. "A surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract." Civ. Code, § 2836. "A surety is exonerated—1. In like manner with a guarantor." Civ. Code, § 2840. "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." Civ. Code, § 2819.

[5] In the light of these rules, treating the land as the principal debtor, it will be readily seen that by the agreement of the creditor mortgagee with the then owner of the land, extending the time of payment of the then matured mortgage debt for the term of two years, to which the mortgagor did not consent, the original obligation of the principal, in such a case the land, is materially altered, since the time within which it may be resorted to by foreclosure is extended two years. The right of the mortgagee to foreclose and his remedy to enforce payment of his debt in the only way allowed by law, is thereby suspended for that period. There is no escape from the conclusion that the mortgagor, standing, as he does, in the relation of surety for the payment of the debt, is by such extension of time exonerated from further liability therefor.

In Murray v. Marshall, supra, the Court of Appeals of New York, after stating that the land became primarily liable for the payment of the debt, and that the original mortgagor, after his sale to a third person who did not assume payment of the mortgage, "stands in the position and has the rights of surety," went on to say that—> "It must be steadily remembered that he can only be discharged so far as he is surety; that he holds that position only up to the value of the land; and beyond that is still principal debtor without any remaining equities."

The position of the court was that to show his complete release by an extension of time to the subsequent purchaser, the mortgagor must show that the value of the land was equal to or greater than the amount of the mortgage debt, and that if it was less, he stood released only to the amount of its value, and was personally liable for the excess, notwithstanding the extension. The point was not essential to the decision, for it proceeds to demonstrate that the findings showed that the value of land equaled the debt, and that the release was complete. The reasoning above given seems to lose sight of the main principle on which the release of the surety is grounded, which is that the surety is entitled to stand on the strict letter of the contract upon which he is liable, and that any change therein made without his consent, by which the contract is altered so as to impair or suspend the right of the creditor to proceed to enforce payment, fully releases the surety. This principle obtains, we believe, in New York as fully as elsewhere. The New York court was at liberty to ingraft this qualification upon the law of principal and surety, for it was not bound by statute. But in this state, as we have shown, the Code fixes the law, and it does not contain any such qualification. We are therefore bound by it, and the decision of the New York court on that point is not authority here.

[6, 7] The rule in this state is that where there is an extension of time by the creditor to the principal, without the consent of the surety, the question of the extent of the injury which the surety sustains therefrom cannot be inquired into. The creditor cannot show, for example, that the principal debtor, was then wholly or partially insolvent, and so remained. The surety is released by the mere fact that his contract is materially altered without his consent. Driscoll v. Winters, 122 Cal. 66, 54 Pac. 387; Tuohy v. Wood, supra, 122 Cal. 688, 55 Pac. 683, 1 Brandt on Suretyship, §§ 483, 376, 416. We are therefore of the opinion that the failure of the defendant to allege and prove the value of the land, in addition to the extension without his consent, does not impair his defense.

[8] Neither is it material that it was not shown that the conveyance by Crew to Peters did not contain any covenant against incumbrances. The creditor, by his extension of time to the purchaser, suspended his own power to enforce his remedy against the land, and this, under section 2819, operated to release the mortgagor, regardless of such covenant. While there is no direct finding that Peters and the other purchasers took subject to the mortgage, we think the fact sufficiently appears by implication from the other facts contained in the record.

[9-11] It is proper to say, in view of a possible new trial below, that the agreement extending the time was not valid unless it was founded upon some new and valuable consideration. The fact that it was a written agreement "is presumptive evidence of a consideration." Civ. Code, § 1614. But it is not conclusive. The contrary may be shown by other evidence. The debt was then due, and the payment of a part thereof would not be a sufficient consideration for such extension.

The judgment is reversed.

SILVERS v. GROSSMAN. (L. A. 5151.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1920.)

1. Accord and satisfaction ⟸19—Obligation not extinguished by "accord" till acceptance of consideration.

"Accord," defined by Civ. Code, § 1521, as an agreement to accept something in extinction of an obligation, does not by provision of sections 1522, 1523, extinguish the obligation, till fully executed by acceptance of the consideration of the accord, constituting satisfaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accord.]

2. Accord and satisfaction ⟸18—Offer to perform or tender not enough.

An offer to perform an accord, or an actual tender of performance, will not sustain the defense of accord and satisfaction.

3. Accord and satisfaction ⟸5—An act or a promise is consideration for accord.

An accord may provide for the doing of an act or the giving of a promise as consideration for extinction of the existing obligation.

4. Accord and satisfaction ⟸25(2)—Plea must allege giving and acceptance of promise.

Where accord provides for giving of a promise as consideration for extinction of the pre-existing obligation, a plea relying thereon must allege the giving and acceptance of the promise.

5. Accord and satisfaction ⟸25(2)—Plea held to merely allege an unexecuted accord.

Plea in action for personal injury held to merely allege an unexecuted agreement for satisfaction of the claim for injury by payment and acceptance of a certain sum, and so insufficient.

6. Pleading ⟸17—Matters of substance to be alleged in direct terms.

In general, matters of substance must be alleged in direct terms, and not by way of recital or general reference.

7. Pleading ⟸311—Rule against aider by attached instrument not applicable to contract on which action or defense is founded.

The rule that a defective allegation of a pleading cannot be aided by recourse to recitals in a document attached to and made a part of the pleading, unless the document is expressly referred to for the avowed purpose of aiding the defective pleading, applies only to the pleading of recitals in instruments not constituting the contract on which the action or defense is founded, or of matters of substance preliminary or collateral to the instrument pleaded.

8. Pleading ⟸32—Statement of what instrument must contain that it may be pleaded in hæc verba.

That one may plead an instrument, which is the foundation of the cause of action or defense, in hæc verba, rather than according to its legal effect, either by setting out a copy in the body of the pleading or by attaching a copy as an exhibit and incorporating it by proper reference, the instrument must show on its face, in direct terms and not by implication, all the facts which the pleader would have to allege in pleading it by its legal effect.

9. Pleading ⟸32—Definite construction must be put on ambiguous instrument, foundation of action or defense.

If an instrument constituting the foundation of the cause of action or defense is defective or ambiguous in not showing on its face in direct terms all the facts necessary to be alleged in pleading it by its legal effect, some definite construction must be put on it by averment, or the pleading will be subject to demurrer.

10. Pleading ⊂=35—Statement of when construction in pleading of attached instrument may be treated as surplusage.

It is only where an instrument attached to a pleading and made part of it is unambiguous that a construction put thereon in the pleading can be disregarded as surplusage and erroneous.

11. Pleading ⊂=35—Instrument attached ambiguous, so construction pleaded cannot be disregarded as surplusage.

The instrument attached to and made part of the answer in action for personal injury: "In consideration of the promise of G. [defendant] to pay $50 in settlement of claim for damages, I [plaintiff] hereby agree to give a release of all claim"—is not clearly an agreement to accept the promise to pay as consideration for the release, so that the construction placed thereon by the answer as an agreement that the payment of the $50 was to be accepted as such consideration cannot be disregarded as surplusage.

12. Pleading ⊂=36(1)—Pleader bound by construction placed on attached ambiguous instrument.

An instrument attached to and made part of a pleading being ambiguous, the pleader is bound by the construction thereof, of which it is readily susceptible, put on it by the averments of the pleading.

13. Pleading ⊂=205(1) — Answer relying on accord and satisfaction, by failure to allege payment and acceptance, is subject to general demurrer.

Defect in answer, in action for personal injury, construing an ambiguous agreement, attached to and made part of the pleading, as an agreement that payment of $50 was to be accepted by plaintiff as consideration for release of the claim for injury, in not alleging payment and acceptance of the money necessary for satisfaction of the accord, is not a mere variance between the averments of an answer, stating facts sufficient for a defense, and the terms of an attached agreement, which is merely a defect of uncertainty or ambiguity that can be reached only by a special demurrer, but is a failure to make a necessary averment, and therefore subject to general demurrer.

14. Appeal and error ⊂=1040(13)—Error in overruling demurrer to defense on which judgment is based prejudicial.

Error in overruling a demurrer to a defense is prejudicial; it appearing from the record that judgment for defendant was made and based entirely on findings in support of such defense.

15. Appeal and error ⊂=672—Record showing that pleading was demurred to, specification that it did not support finding and judgment available.

Though appeal is on the judgment roll, so that it cannot be said that there was objection at the trial to introduction of evidence, it appearing from the record that the pleading on which is based the finding and judgment was questioned by demurrer, specification of error that the finding and judgment are unsupported by the pleadings is available.

16. Pleading ⊂=432 — Not aided by finding where questioned by demurrer.

The doctrine of aider by findings has no application to a pleading the sufficiency of which was questioned by demurrer.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Carrie Silvers against Harry Grossman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

J. W. Hocker and Robert E. Austin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Seth B. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages in the sum of $20,000 for injuries received in an accident alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligent operation of an automobile. Defendant made answer, in which he denied negligence, pleaded contributory negligence, and, for a third and separate defense, alleged that plaintiff and her husband entered into a written agreement with defendant, through his attorney, "whereby the plaintiff and her husband agreed to receive and accept from defendant, and defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff and her husband, the sum of $50, in full satisfaction, settlement, and payment of any and all claims plaintiff and her husband, or either of them, had or claimed to have against this defendant by reason of the collision or accident hereinbefore referred to in defendant's first and second defenses in this answer contained; * * * that by the terms of said agreement plaintiff and her husband were fully compensated by the payment to them by the defendant of the said sum of $50." The answer then alleged a tender of the said sum of $50, a refusal to accept the same on the part of plaintiff and her husband, and defendant's readiness and ability at all times to pay the said sum. A general demurrer to the third defense was overruled, and the case was thereupon tried. The court found the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to be true, save and except as to the amount of damages suffered by plaintiff, which was found to be $1,000, but rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. Said judgment was based upon the finding that—

"prior to the beginning of this action, to wit, on the 17th day of February, 1916, as set out in defendant's amended answer under the title

'Third and Separate Defense,' the defendant gave to plaintiff his promise in writing to pay the sum of $50 in full settlement of all claims for damages plaintiff held against the defendant by reason of that certain accident sued upon and set out in plaintiff's complaint herein, and that said plaintiff then and there accepted said promise in writing in full settlement and satisfaction thereof."

Plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll, specifying as error (1) that the demurrer to the third defense was erroneously overruled; (2) that the judgment is not supported by the pleadings.

[1-4] The reports are replete with authority to the effect that accord alone, by which is meant a mere agreement to accept something in extinction of an existing obligation, is insufficient as a defense to an action on the original obligation, and that such original obligation is not actually extinguished until there has been an acceptance of the consideration agreed upon, or, in other words, satisfaction. Civ. Code, §§ 1521, 1522, 1523; Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 Pac. 58. Neither an offer to perform nor an actual tender of performance will sustain the defense of accord and satisfaction (White v. Gray, 68 Me. 579), and a plea which avers an unexecuted accord fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense (Holton v. Noble, supra). The terms of the accord may provide either for the performance of an act or the giving of a promise as the consideration for the extinction of the existing obligation. In the latter case, the giving and acceptance of the promise is the execution of the accord, and therefore, if the promise per se is relied upon, the giving and acceptance of the promise in satisfaction of the pre-existing obligation must be averred in the pleadings. White v. Gray, supra; Gowing v. Thomas, 67 N. H. 399, 40 Atl. 184; B. & W. Ry. Co. v. Clem, 80 Ga. 534, 7 S. E. 84; 1 C. J. 577.

[5] The sufficiency of the third defense of the answer in the case at bar must be tested by the application of these well-established rules. The answer, as is evidenced by the excerpts therefrom which appear above, merely alleges an unexecuted agreement for the satisfaction of plaintiff's claim by the payment and acceptance of a specified sum of money. Nowhere in the answer is there an averment that there was any agreement to accept, in satisfaction of said claim, defendant's mere promise to pay, and the reading of the context will not permit such construction.

[6-9] Nor was the necessary averment supplied by attaching a copy of the agreement to the answer and making it a part thereof. In general matters of substance must be alleged in direct terms, and not by way of recital or general reference, and defective allegations of a pleading cannot be supplied by recourse to recitals in a document attached to and made a part of the pleading, unless the document is expressly referred to for the avowed purpose of aiding the defective pleading. City of Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298; Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151; Hibernia S. & L. Soc. v. Thornton, 117 Cal. 481, 483, 49 Pac. 573; Est. of Cook, 137 Cal. 184, 190, 69 Pac. 968. This rule, however, applies only to the pleading of recitals in instruments which do not constitute the contract upon which the action or defense is founded, or of matters of substance which are preliminary or collateral to the instrument pleaded. It in no way conflicts with the rule that a written instrument which is the foundation of a cause of action or defense may be pleaded in hæc verba, rather than according to its legal effect, either by setting forth a copy in the body of the complaint or other pleading or by attaching a copy as an exhibit and incorporating it by proper reference. Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 294; Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. 327; Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502, 23 Pac. 50, 227; Santa Rosa Bank v. Paxton, 149 Cal. 195, 86 Pac. 193. "But to enable the pleader to adopt this latter mode, the instrument which is thus adopted as a part of the complaint must show upon its face in direct terms, and not by implication, all the facts which the pleader would have to allege under the former mode of pleading by averment" (Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 250, 253), and if the instrument is not free from defect or ambiguity in those particulars, some definite construction must be put upon it by averment, or the pleading will be subject to demurrer (Durkee v. Cota, 74 Cal. 313, 16 Pac. 5; Lambert v. Haskell, supra; Merkeley v. Fisk, 179 Cal. 748, 178 Pac. 945; Hill v. McCoy, 1 Cal. App. 159, 81 Pac. 1015).

The instrument attached to the pleading now under consideration reads as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., February 17, 1916.

"In consideration of the promise of Geo. Grossman to pay $50 in settlement of claim for damages, I hereby agree to give a release of all claims in his favor.

"[Signed] Carrie Silver.
"J. A. Silver.
"Ivan Kelso,
"Attorney for Mr. Grossman."

[10-12] It is contended that any defect in the answer, by reason of the failure to allege that the promise of payment was the consideration for the release, is cured by the recitals of the agreement. It will be noted that by its terms plaintiff in consideration of a promise of payment agrees to give a release. It does not appear from the face of the instrument whether the claim was actually released in consideration of the promise per se or whether the agreement was preliminary in nature; that is to say, a promise to give a release in the future in consideration of the promise of payment, the release not to be given, however, until payment of the money. In this respect, which is vital under the circumstances of the case, the instrument is defective and ambiguous as a matter of pleading, for it does not contain a recital, in sufficiently definite language, of an acceptance of a promise of payment in satisfaction of plaintiff's claim against defendant.

Accordingly defendant has, in compliance with the rule above stated, eliminated the ambiguity of the instrument by putting a definite construction upon it by averment in the pleading, and by way of interpretation, has alleged that it was agreed that the payment of the sum of $50 (not the promise to pay) was to be accepted as the consideration for the release. The allegations thus construing the instrument cannot be disregarded as surplusage, as may be done where the instrument is unambiguous and the construction is an erroneous one. Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 294, 303. On the contrary, inasmuch as the instrument is ambiguous, and the construction put upon it by the averments of the answer is one of which the instrument is readily susceptible, the pleader is bound by the interpretation adopted by him and set forth in his answer.

"Presumptions are always against the pleader, and all doubts are to be resolved against him, for it is to be presumed that he has stated his case as favorably as possible to himself." Joseph v. Holt, supra.

Taken as a whole, therefore, the answer alleges nothing more than an unexecuted accord.

[13, 14] It follows that the defect in the pleading now under consideration is not a mere matter of variance between the averments of an answer, which states facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and the terms of a written agreement attached thereto. Such a defect is merely one of uncertainty or ambiguity, and can be reached only by a special demurrer. Blasingame v. Insurance Co., 75 Cal. 633, 17 Pac. 925. Here, however, the third defense of the answer is lacking in a necessary averment, and is therefore subject to general demurrer. Inasmuch as it appears from the record that the judgment in favor of defendant is made and based entirely upon findings in support of said third defense, the error in overruling the demurrer was obviously prejudicial to plaintiff. Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 112 Cal. 1, 44 Pac. 339.

[15, 16] But one point remains to be considered, namely, the question of the conclusiveness upon appeal of the findings of the trial court. The trial court found in effect that there was an executed accord, in that defendant's promise to pay was accepted in satisfaction of the claim sued upon. It is therefore not claimed that the finding is repugnant to the judgment in favor of defendant, but that the finding and judgment are not supported by the pleadings. Ordinarily findings outside of the issues will be disregarded. Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. 200. Where, however, it appears from the record that the case was tried upon the theory that the pleadings were sufficient to raise certain issues, and no objection was made in the court below to the introduction of evidence upon these issues, the point cannot be raised for the first time upon appeal that the findings are not within the issues raised by the pleadings. Moore v. Campbell, 72 Cal. 251, 13 Pac. 689; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 687, 47 Pac. 695. And where the appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, so that the record fails to disclose whether or not, at the trial, objections were interposed to evidence as not within the issues, it has been held that it will be presumed in support of the findings and judgment that the pleadings were treated as sufficient to raise the issues upon which the findings were made and that evidence in support of such issues was introduced and went in without objection (Ill. T. & S. Bank v. Pac. Ry., 115 Cal. 285, 296, 47 Pac. 60; McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 154, 159, 64 Pac. 278; Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 332, 70 Pac. 175), although the rule may be different where such a presumption would result in the reversal of the judgment (Rudel v. Los Angeles Co., 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400).

This rule however is based upon the theory of waiver or estoppel, and can have no operation where it appears from the record that objection to the sufficiency of a pleading to raise a particular issue was seasonably urged in the court below either at the trial upon the introduction of evidence, or by demurrer, as in the case at bar. When the sufficiency of a pleading has been questioned by demurrer, the pleading must, upon appeal on the judgment roll, be judged by itself alone and the doctrine of aider by findings or verdict does not apply. Pittsburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Moore, 152 Ind. 345, 53 N. E. 290, 44 L. R. A. 638; 31 Cyc. 765. It follows that it must be held that the judgment is not supported by the pleadings.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the third defense of defendant's answer, with leave to the defendant to amend, if he be so advised.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SLOANE, J.; WILBUR, J.

OLNEY, J. I concur in ordering a reversal of the judgment, but do not concur in directing further proceedings in the trial court. I believe judgment should be entered for the plaintiff upon the findings. Every fact necessary for that purpose is found, and the only reason for not doing so that is or can be given is the finding of the trial court upon the point of accord and satisfaction. Even if further proceedings were necessary for a determination of this point, the further proceedings should certainly be confined to a determination of this issue alone. But in truth there is no occasion for retrying even this issue. The main opinion says that the finding as to accord and satisfaction was in effect that there was executed accord, in that defendant's promise to pay was accepted in satisfaction of the claim sued on. I do not think this construction should be put upon the finding. It reads:

"That prior to the beginning of this action, to wit, on the 17th day of February, 1916, as set out in defendant's amended answer under the title 'Third and Separate Defense,' the defendant gave to plaintiff his promise in writing to pay the sum of $50 in full settlement of all claims for damages plaintiff held against the defendant by reason of that certain accident sued upon and set out in plaintiff's complaint herein, and that said plaintiff then and there accepted said promise in writing in full settlement and satisfaction thereof."

This finding must be construed in connection with, and in the light of, the third and separate defense to which it refers, and the issues presented which it was designed to meet. It seems to me plain enough that all that was intended by the finding was to find an accord and satisfaction "as set out in defendant's amended answer under the title 'Third and Separate Defense.'" It should be borne in mind that the court had previously overruled a demurrer to this portion of the answer, holding that it stated a good defense. I do not think it occurred to counsel or to the court that there was any difference whatever between the facts found and those pleaded. The facts pleaded, as the main opinion shows, were wholly insufficient to constitute accord and satisfaction. They, in fact, showed affirmatively that there was none.

Furthermore, I think it plain enough that the defendant cannot amend his answer, so as truthfully to allege accord and satisfaction, and that he could not prove his answer if he did amend. The supposed accord and satisfaction were carried into a writing which constitutes the final memorial of the transaction. That writing is pleaded, and is set out in the main opinion, and by its terms it not only does not show that the plaintiff gave a release in reliance upon the defendant's promise, or accepted the defendant's promise, to pay $50, as distinguished from the actual payment of the $50, as a final settlement, but does show just the contrary. It declares in so many words that the plaintiff agrees to—that is, will—give a release in consideration of the defendant's promise to pay $50; that is, when he pays the $50. The release and the payment were plainly to be concurrent, and there was to be no release unless the money were paid. If there were to be a release—that is, a final settlement by the plaintiff, then and there, in consideration of the plaintiff's promise alone—there was no sense in making the writing in the form in which it was made. The plaintiff would have made a release at the time, instead of an agreement merely to make one.

Summing the matter up, the only reasonable interpretation of the writing is that the matter was not to be closed out between the parties, and the plaintiff's claim settled, until the sum agreed upon was actually paid. Such an agreement is an accord, but not a satisfaction; and, finally, it is not open to the defendant to show any different arrangement, because to do so would be to vary the terms of the writing, which is the final memorial of the arrangement, and is alone competent evidence of what the arrangement was.

This being the case, there is no reason for permitting the defendant further to litigate the point, and judgment should be directed against him.

LAFARGUE v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 8732.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 21, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜978(2) — Conclusion that misconduct of attorney did not necessitate new trial not to be disturbed.

Conclusion of the trial court that statements made by counsel for plaintiff in an action for personal injuries, though improper, were not such as to vitiate verdict and necessitate new trial, held not to be disturbed by the appellate court, in view of the circumstances, as trial court is in better position to determine whether verdict was affected by the misconduct.

2. Street railroads ⊜113(1)—Whether company refused to maintain injured person at hospital immaterial.

Question whether defendant street railway refused further to maintain plaintiff at a hospital, so that he was forced to leave, held a matter not material, and inadmissible, except possibly on cross-examination of witnesses from the hospital, who might testify that plaintiff, when discharged, was recovered so as to no longer require hospital treatment.

3. New trial ⊜44(2) — Misconduct of juror not such as to necessitate new trial.

In an action for personal injuries against a street railroad, misconduct of juror, in asking questions as to why plaintiff was discharged from a hospital where he had been maintained by defendant during examination of plaintiff, and in making statements thereon, held not to have so prejudiced the case with the jurors as to call for new trial.

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1048(6)—Cross-examination held harmless.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries to plaintiff wagon driver collided with, cross-examination of defendant's witness, eliciting the fact that the particular car in question was one of a line which went further before reaching its destination, and traveled faster than ordinary cars, held harmless to defendant.

Olney, Wilbur, and Lennon, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Louis Lafargue against the United Railroads of San Francisco, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This action is one brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in a collision between a wagon driven by him and one of defendant's cars, said collision being alleged to have been due to the negligent operation of the car by defendant's motorman. There was a trial by jury, which rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. Defendant appeals from the judgment entered on such verdict.

Upon all material issues, including that of contributory negligence, there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and no claim is made that the evidence was insufficient as matter of law to sustain the verdict.

The claim apparently principally relied upon by learned counsel for appellant for a reversal is alleged misconduct on the part of plaintiff's attorney during the trial, by reason of which, it is urged, the defendant's case was prejudiced in the minds of the jurors. Many instances of such alleged misconduct were specified in the affidavits presented on motion for new trial. Of these the most important is the matter relative to the discharge of plaintiff from St. Luke's Hospital, after being there some six weeks, having been taken to that hospital immediately after the accident. Some two or three weeks after being discharged he went to the French Hospital, where he remained for about five months. The St. Luke's Hospital bill for care and maintenance was being paid by defendant. The extent of his injuries was a matter of serious dispute, concerning which there was a great deal of conflicting testimony. He was claiming disability and suffering covering the whole time up to his leaving the French Hospital, and even later, while defendant was claiming that he had practically recovered from the effect of his injuries when discharged from St. Luke's Hospital. Apparently feeling that the unexplained departure of plaintiff from St. Luke's Hospital might prejudice plaintiff's case on that question, by reason of the inference that might be drawn by jurors from the fact of such discharge that he was then practically recovered, plaintiff's attorney sought to show why he left, and that "it was not because he was cured." He was allowed to show by plaintiff that he (plaintiff) was told to leave by the hospital authorities. He then asked plaintiff who paid the bill there, and this being objected to, said the object was to show "why he was put out of the hospital." The objection was sustained, but the statement of counsel was assigned as misconduct. Nothing further occurred with reference to this matter until some time later, when a medical witness for plaintiff was testifying as to the condition of plaintiff and as to what was shown by certain X-ray pictures, when a juror intervened with the question, "Why is it that he was at the St. Luke's and thrown out and goes to the French Hospital and was there 60 days?" The controversy that immediately ensued includes the principal assignments of misconduct. Plaintiff's attorney said: "I want to show that the railroad was paying for him, and they wouldn't pay any longer for him." After some further discussion, the court asked the juror whether there was any subject upon which he wanted any testimony, and the juror answered: "Well it strikes me that the St. Luke's people must have been terribly off to let him go away without treatment." The court then asked him if he wanted some evidence as to why St. Luke's Hospital discharged the patient, and he answered, "Yes," and the court saying that he thought the request should be complied with, the medical witness was withdrawn and the plaintiff recalled for examination on that subject. Plaintiff's attorney said that the juror came to the conclusion that "they put him out of there (the hospital) because he was well," and asked the juror if that was his idea. This was assigned as misconduct. Plaintiff's attorney then said, substantially, that if the juror made a criticism he had the right to inquire as to what it was, and he had asked the juror if that (meaning, evidently, that plaintiff was discharged because he was thought to have recovered) was his idea, and the juror had shaken his head affirmatively. The court then said that the juror had asked why the plaintiff was discharged from the hospital when, as he (plaintiff) stated, he was not entirely well, and plaintiff's attorney said, "But the gentleman had his criticism; he says it looked bad for them;" and this was assigned as misconduct. An altercation between counsel followed, the court finally saying that he would permit no further question except that the juror's question might be asked any witness. Plaintiff's attorney said that was what he was trying to do, and asked plaintiff, "What reason did they give you for sending you out of the St. Luke's Hospital?" An objection that this was hearsay was sustained. Plaintiff's attorney then asked, "What can I do?" and was told by defendant's counsel, "You can call the St. Luke's people themselves," to which plaintiff's attorney answered, "Your people, eh?" This was assigned as misconduct. He then asked him who paid his bills at the hospital, and an objection to the question was sustained. Plaintiff's attorney then said: "That is all; step down sir. If you cover it up, it will remain covered up." And this statement was assigned as misconduct. The court admonished the jury to disregard the statement. Plaintiff's attorney said: "I have been trying these cases for some time, and I never got into any trouble, but I am not going to have it clouded and besmirched if I can bring out the truth." And this statement was assigned as misconduct. The court then said:

"I do not care to be repeating to the jury time and time again. Statements of this kind are not evidence, and you will not take them as the truth or as any evidence of any fact or the lack of fact or the existence or nonexistence of any fact; they are not evidence at all, gentlemen. They will be eliminated entirely from your mind."

Subsequently it was shown, without objection, that the defendant paid to St. Luke's Hospital the bill of the hospital for plaintiff's care and maintenance at that place. There was also given testimony on the part of the surgeon of St. Luke's Hospital substantially to the effect that from his examination of plaintiff and the data concerning him he had concluded that plaintiff did not need any further hospital treatment, and suggested that he go home or to a free hospital where he could rest longer if he desired. This was apparently the general view of the St. Luke's Hospital people at the time of plaintiff's discharge.

[1, 2] The trial court denied a motion for a new trial based upon the ground, among others, of misconduct of plaintiff's attorney. In doing this the court must be deemed to have concluded that no prejudice was suffered by defendant by reason of any of the matters to which we have referred. Conceding some of the statements made by counsel, whatever the provocation thought by him to exist therefor, were improper, we are satisfied that this conclusion of the trial judge should not be disturbed by an appellate court. The trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct as we have here, and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong. This, we think, may not fairly be said here. We certainly cannot say that there was any intent on the part of counsel to get before the jury matters which he knew were inadmissible. It seems to us from the record that he was acting in perfect good faith upon the theory that he was entitled to rebut the inference of recovery which might be drawn by jurors from plaintiff's discharge from St. Luke's Hospital, by showing that he (plaintiff) was discharged because defendant was not willing to be further responsible to the hospital for the cost of plaintiff's care and maintenance there. This apparently was the main purpose of counsel, and in so far as any possible prejudicial effect on the jury with relation to defendant was concerned, the only basis of any reasonable claim of possible injury. We are satisfied that the question whether defendant refused to further maintain plaintiff at the hospital was not a matter material to the issues being tried, and was not admissible in evidence, except possibly on cross-examination of witnesses from the hospital, who might testify that plaintiff at the time of his discharge was sufficiently recovered to no longer require hospital treatment. But we can well see how, under the circumstances, counsel for plaintiff might have felt that he was entitled to show that this was the real reason for the discharge, to rebut the possible inference of complete recovery which might be drawn from the fact of discharge. As to the matter of prejudice to the defendant it may well be claimed that it is difficult to conceive how defendant could be prejudiced by a showing that, notwithstanding its absolute disclaimer of all responsibility for the accident it charitably bore the cost of plaintiff's maintenance at a hospital until such time as it was advised by the hospital authorities that he no longer needed hospital treatment, when it refused to be further responsible therefor. Assuming that certain statements of counsel for plaintiff reflected unfavorably upon the hospital, counsel for defendant urge that counsel for plaintiff endeavored to create the impression that defendant owned the same or had some voice in its management, but we fail to find any good basis in the record for this claim, or for a conclusion that any juror could have come to any such conclusion. It is true that counsel for plaintiff on one occasion, when he was advised by counsel for defendant that he could call "the St. Luke's people themselves," very improperly retorted, "Your people, eh?"

but this hasty and ill-advised remark, made in the heat of contest and with the apparent desire to have the last word in a conflict with opposing counsel, cannot fairly be said to show any such design or to have created any such impression. At most, it was an improper insinuation that the St. Luke's people were, in this case, friendly to defendant, and might color their testimony accordingly, a very improper insinuation it is true, but one which the trial judge was amply justified in concluding in no way affected the verdict. We have considered all of the many assignments of misconduct, and we find therein no justification for overruling the decision of the trial judge in denying the motion for a new trial in so far as the same was based thereon.

[3] The motion for a new trial was also based upon the alleged misconduct of the juror who asked the questions and made the statements set forth in our discussion of the question of the misconduct of plaintiff's attorney, the idea being that he thus openly prejudiced the case and expressed his criticism to his fellow jurors. The question and expression of criticism referred to an entirely immaterial matter, and the hasty criticism was of the hospital, and not of the defendant, induced doubtless by testimony then being given for plaintiff tending to show that when he was discharged from the hospital he was suffering from a fractured rib or ribs. Upon this matter the District Court of Appeal in deciding this case said:

"We are willing to concede that the juror was guilty of a violation of the instruction of the court and of his duty as a juror in making the statements. But we cannot go with appellant's learned counsel to the extent of holding that the statements necessarily showed a prejudiced mind. Neither can we concede that the incident could have ultimately affected the minds of intelligent jurors, as we must assume the jurors who heard the statements to have been, to the prejudice of defendant's cause. The whole matter was passed on by the trial court on motion for a new trial, and it was warranted in holding that the conclusion of the juror thus hastily reached and expressed, based as it was upon an absolutely irrelevant fact, could not have operated to affect the juror's mind in reaching a verdict."

In this we entirely concur.

[4] Upon the only remaining point made by defendant we are satisfied with what was said by the District Court of Appeal in its decision, the same being as follows:

"A witness for defendant, who was a passenger on the car which struck plaintiff's wagon, testified that the car was moving at a 'moderate speed.' On cross-examination of this witness plaintiff, over the objections of defendant, developed the fact that the particular car in question was one of a line which went further before reaching its destination, and traveled faster than the ordinary car that ran on Mission street. Plaintiff had testified that 'the car was going slowly' at the time his wagon was struck, and there appears to be no contradiction of this statement. Other testimony corroborating plaintiff showed that the car came to a stop within a very few feet after the occurrence of the collision. It is appellant's contention that the only possible effect that evidence as to the speed of the cars at other times and places could have produced on the minds of the jury was prejudicial, and calculated to create the impression that defendants were habitually reckless and careless in the operation of their cars without regard to human safety. We do not find that the witness fixed any definite rate of speed at which the car in question was proceeding at the time of the accident, or at which any of the cars of defendant usually ran. What he meant by the term 'moderate speed,' as applied to the car in question in comparison to the speed of other cars on the same line, was never developed. The trial court allowed the cross-examination on the theory that plaintiff had the right to ascertain what the witness meant when he was allowed to say on direct examination that the car was proceeding at a moderate speed. While the rate of speed at which the car was going was never an issue in the case, either by reason of the pleadings, or from any testimony, and the cross-examination may have been on an immaterial matter, no harm was done. 'In view of the other evidence in the case it does not seem at all probable that the jury were influenced by the testimony.' Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 645, 117 Pac. 956."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOANE, J.; LAWLOR, J.

We dissent. It seems to us that an entirely false quantity was injected into the case by plaintiff's counsel, over the repeated admonitions of the court, and that the false quantity so introduced was of a character so prejudicial to the defendant as to have prevented the jury from considering the case fairly upon its real merits. To sustain the verdict under these circumstances will, it seems to us, have the effect of encouraging similar conduct in other cases, when it should be discouraged strongly. Primarily the relief in such a case should be given by the trial judge by granting a new trial, and his right to do this should be exercised freely whenever he feels that the trial has not been fairly had. In the present case, it seems to us that the trial judge refrained from exercising this right in a case in which he should have done so. OLNEY, J.; WILBUR, J.; LENNON, J.

MOONEY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR KERN COUNTY et al. (L. A. 6466.)

1. Prohibition ⟸3(3) — Error in dismissing will contest reviewable only on appeal.

Granting of motion to dismiss a will contest on a ground erroneous in law was simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction, reviewable only on appeal, and did not render the judgment void, to lay it open to attack by writ of prohibition.

2. Wills ⟸307—Dismissal of contest on death of contestant not void, though representative not substituted.

Judgment of dismissal of will contest on death of contestant held not void for want of formal substitution of the personal representative of the deceased contestant.

3. Prohibition ⟸5(3)—Wills ⟸307—Vacation or modification of dismissal of will contest, which had become a final judgment, unauthorized and prohibited.

Where no appeal was taken from judgment dismissing a will contest, on death of the contestant without substituting his personal representative, and such judgment had become final years before any motion to vacate it was made, it was beyond the power of the superior court to vacate or modify, which threatened action will be restrained by prohibition.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by Edward Mooney, executor of the last will and testament of Margaret Mooney, deceased, against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Kern, and Howard A. Peairs, Judge thereof, to restrain further proceedings in the matter of the contest of a will. Writ granted.

Thos. Scott and J. W. Wiley, both of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

E. J. Emmons and Kaye & Siemon, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The object of this proceeding is to obtain a writ of prohibition restraining respondents from further proceeding in the matter of a contest of a will instituted in the superior court of Kern county. An alternative writ was issued. The matter was submitted for decision upon the petition and an answer, which admitted the truth of most of the allegations of the petition. There is no dispute as to any of the material facts.

Mary O'Donnell died July 6, 1909, leaving estate and a purported will. By the terms of this will Margaret McNally, who had married Edward Mooney, was the sole beneficiary and executrix. The will was filed for probate. On July 23, 1909, the surviving husband of deceased, Edward O'Donnell, filed his opposition to the probate of the will. On September 30, 1912, while the contest thus instituted was pending undetermined, said Edward O'Donnell died testate. On October 21, 1912, his wife, Elizabeth O'Donnell, was appointed executrix of his will and letters testamentary were issued to her thereon. On October 28, 1912, Margaret Mooney gave to said Elizabeth O'Donnell, as executrix of the will of said Edward O'Donnell, and her attorneys, notice of a motion to be made for the dismissal of the written opposition and contest to the probate of the will of Mary O'Donnell, on the ground, substantially, that, the contestant having died, the contest abated. In response to this notice, Elizabeth O'Donnell, as executrix of the will of Edward O'Donnell, appeared at the hearing of the motion and opposed the granting of the same on the merits. The matter was fully heard, and submitted for decision, and on February 27, 1913, an order was made and entered granting the motion and dismissing the contest. No appeal was ever taken from this judgment of dismissal.

There was never any formal substitution in the contest proceeding of any party in place of the deceased Edward O'Donnell. On March 19, 1913, after due and legal notice, an order was made admitting the Mary O'Donnell will to probate and appointing Margaret Mooney executrix thereof, and letters testamentary were issued to her. No valid appeal was ever perfected from this order. Margaret Mooney, as executrix, proceeded with the administration of the estate of Mary O'Donnell, with the result that on July 12, 1915, her accounts as executrix were finally settled and a decree of final distribution made, distributing to Margaret Mooney all of the residue of the estate, of all of which she was thenceforth possessed to the time of her death, September 19, 1917. No appeal was ever taken from this decree. On April 24, 1916, over 3 years after such judgment of dismissal had been made and entered, Elizabeth O'Donnell, as executrix of the will of Edward O'Donnell, deceased, gave notice of a motion for an order vacating the judgment of dismissal of the contest of the will of Mary O'Donnell, and for an order substituting her as such executrix in place of Edward O'Donnell as contestant. The ground of the motion was that at the time of the judgment of dismissal the contestant was dead, and neither she nor any one else had been substituted in his place, and that, consequently, such judgment of dismissal was a nullity, with the result that the contest was still pending undetermined. This motion came regularly on for hearing, and on August 8, 1916, an order was made granting the motion and purporting to vacate the judgment of dismissal, to substitute said Elizabeth O'Donnell, as executrix, as contestant, and to allow her to prosecute such contest. No appeal was ever taken from this order, The court is about to proceed with the trial of said contest. Margaret Mooney died testate September 19, 1917, and petitioner, Edward Mooney, is the sole devisee and executor under her will.

[1] The only reason suggested in support of the attempted vacating of the judgment of dismissal of the will contest and the further prosecution thereof is that, owing to the failure to formally substitute the executrix of the will of the contestant for the deceased contestant as a party, the judgment of dismissal is an absolute nullity, with the result that everything that followed in the administration, including the decree of final distribution, is likewise a nullity. We are not concerned here with any question as to the correctness of the conclusion of the court on the motion to dismiss, to the effect that the will contest abated with the death of the contestant, for, even if such conclusion was erroneous, the granting of the motion to dismiss on that ground was simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction, reviewable only on an appeal. The judgment could not be held to be void for any such reason.

[2] Nor do we think the judgment of dismissal should be held to be void for want of formal substitution of the personal representative of the deceased contestant. It is doubtful whether, under the circumstances, the theory being that, by reason of the death of the contestant the contest was ended, any substitution of a party plaintiff in place of contestant was even technically required before formal dismissal, and it may well be that all that was essential was notice of the proposed motion to the personal representative of the deceased. But, assuming that there should have been a substitution, notice of the motion for dismissal having in fact been served upon his duly qualified personal representative, she appeared and contested the motion upon its merits, thus practically making herself, in her official capacity as executrix of the will of contestant, a party to the proceeding in his place. She was in fact fully authorized to be substituted in his place; she did proceed therein, and was recognized as proceeding therein, as if formally substituted, and at most all that was lacking was the entry of a formal order of substitution. This at best was a mere irregularity in procedure, not affecting any substantial right, which, in view of the circumstances, would hardly warrant a reversal of the judgment of dismissal on appeal. Certainly it did not make the judgment of dismissal void.

[3] The court had full jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and, by reason of the due and legal notice given, of all interested parties. The judgment was in substance not one against a dead man, but one against the personal representative of the dead man. As we have seen, no appeal was taken from this judgment, and it had become final years before any motion to vacate it was made, and therefore was beyond the power of the superior court to vacate or modify.

In view of what we have just said, it is unnecessary to discuss the claim of petitioner with reference to the effect of the decree of final distribution. The will contest was disposed of by the judgment of dismissal, and this judgment having become final long before any motion to vacate was made, the purported order vacating was beyond the power of the court and void, and the threatened action of the court in regard to now proceeding with the trial of the contest is therefore in excess of its jurisdiction. We are not, however, to be understood as conceding that the decree of final distribution has not finally and conclusively settled, as between all heirs, legatees, and devisees, all questions concerning the distribution of the property of Mary O'Donnell, whatever might be the situation as to the will contest.

Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue as prayed in the petition.

We concur: LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; OLNEY, J.; SLOANE, J.; SHAW, J.; WILBUR, J.

HUNTINGTON v. DONOVAN et al.
(L. A. 4988.)

1. Evidence ⟸34 — Judicial notice taken of invalidity of grant by government to railway.

The court will take judicial notice of the invalidity of the part of the grant by the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in 1871 (16 Stat. 573) which overlaps the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railway in 1866 (14 Stat. 292).

2. Public lands ⟸117 — Patents subject to collateral attack.

The general rule is that government patents to land cannot be collaterally attacked, but the patent of land to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in 1871 (16 Stat. 573) was void and subject to collateral attack, as far as it overlapped the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railway in 1866 (14 Stat. 292).

3. Public lands ⟸120—Five-year limitation for suing to cancel patents did not protect grantees of small portions of land patented.

Acts Cong. March 3, 1891 (U. S. Comp. St. § 5113), and March 2, 1896 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4901–4903), providing that no suit could be brought to determine invalidity of patents to government land after March 2, 1901, were not intended to protect grantees of small portions of lands patented, as far as the five-year period for bringing actions was concerned, where the patent was attacked in time and decreed invalid, although bona fide purchasers are protected.

4. Public lands ⊂=120, 122—Grantee of patentee under void patent has burden of showing that he was bona fide purchaser.

The grantee of a patentee of government land claiming under a void patent has the burden of showing that he is a bona fide purchaser in order to claim the benefit of Acts March 3, 1891 (U. S. Comp. St. § 5113), and March 2, 1896 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4901–4903), which protect bona fide purchasers, whether attacked by the government or a private party.

5. Public lands ⊂=138—Purchaser of tax title obtained rights of prior owner in action to quiet title.

A purchaser of a tax title could not be considered a bona fide purchaser under Acts Cong. March 3, 1891 (U. S. Comp. St. § 5113), and March 2, 1896 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4901–4903), which protect bona fide purchasers of land claimed under void government patents, where at the time of purchase the Land Office records showed a valid desert land entry thereon, and the patent under which he claims had been declared void by decree of a federal court.

6. Evidence ⊂=353(5)—Recitals as to consideration not evidence against third person.

Recitals in conveyances of land as to consideration paid are not competent evidence against third persons not parties or privies thereto, on the issue as to whether grantees were bona fide purchasers.

7. Judgment ⊂=729—Decree in proceeding to cancel patent not evidence that prevailing party was bona fide purchaser of land expressly excluded.

A decree in a proceeding by the government to cancel a land patent in favor of a grantee, declaring the latter to be a bona fide purchaser of certain lands covered by the patent, had no tendency to prove that he was a bona fide purchaser as to other lands in the patent, especially where the validity of his title to the other lands was expressly reserved by the decision.

8. Evidence ⊂=353(5)—Statutes did not render competent recitals in deeds to show grantee to be bona fide purchaser.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, section 1963, subd. 39, and Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, merely relate to the sufficiency of the consideration to sustain a deed, and do not render recitals in conveyances competent evidence against third persons not parties or privies thereto, on the issue as to whether or not grantees were bona fide purchasers.

9. Public lands ⊂=120—Cancellation of prior patent does not pass title to subsequent patentee.

The rule that where a grantor acquires title subsequent to his grant it passes to the grantee (Civ. Code, § 1106) does not apply to a government patent, and hence title did not pass to a subsequent patentee by reason of the fact that the government subsequently acquired title to the lands by forfeiture of a prior patent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Benjamin F. Huntington against Joseph G. Donovan and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cedric E. Johnson and F. E. Dunlap, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank C. Prescott and Prescott & Prescott, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to quiet title to a quarter section of land near Del Sur, Los Angeles county, within the overlapping United States land grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railway, made by Congress in 1866 (14 U. S. Stat. 292) in aid of its proposed railroad from the Colorado river to the Pacific Ocean, and the grant made in 1871 (16 U. S. Stat. 573) to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for its "branch line" from Tehachapi to Yuma via Los Angeles. The latter grant was void as to lands in the overlapping grants, and in 1886 the rights of the former reverted to the United States, and the land was restored to the public domain (24 U. S. Stat. 123). United States v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 36 L. Ed. 1091; United States v. Colton Marble & Lime Co., 146 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 163, 36 L. Ed. 1104; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 183 U. S. 521, 22 Sup. Ct. 154, 46 L. Ed. 307; United States v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 184 U. S. 49, 22 Sup. Ct. 285, 46 L. Ed. 425.

Plaintiff claims under the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the defendant under a desert land entry made in 1910. A patent was issued to this company on January 9, 1885, in pursuance of the grant of 1871, for 33,249 acres of land, including the land in controversy. On January 28, 1890, the company by a grant deed conveyed 1,280 acres, including the land in controversy, to Nathan Cole, Jr. The latter, by deed dated February 8, 1890, recorded March 13, 1890, conveyed the land in question to C. A. Sargent. On March 17, 1890, a suit was brought by the United States against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, Nathan Cole, and other grantees and mortgagees of that company, to cancel the patent of January 9, 1885, and other similar patents. This suit was twice appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355; Id., 184 U. S. 49, 22 Sup. Ct. 285, 46 L. Ed. 425. The patents were canceled.

Plaintiff claims that he is not bound by this cancellation, because C. A. Sargent, his predecessor, was not a party to the suit, although he was the record owner, and for the further reason that the final decree excluded the land in controversy. It is true that Sargent was not bound by the decree, or by the cancellation of the patent upon which his title depends, as by an adjudication; but plaintiff's rights, so far as they are affected by the law therein declared, must be determined in accordance therewith. The Supreme Court of the United States in that case determined the effect of certain acts of Congress, and we must give to them the same construction in this case. That case turned, in part, upon the question as to whether the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad had made an effective location of its line of railroad, so as to vest in it the title of the lands along such line in such overlap.

[1] So far as this question of fact is concerned it is not open to litigation between the parties here, as we take judicial notice of the invalidity of this grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Painter, 113 Cal. 251, 45 Pac. 320. And where it appears that the land is within this overlapping grant we have held the patent to the company void. Owen v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 438, 61 Pac. 472. This court has frequently taken notice of the invalidity of these patents. S. P. R. R. Co. v. Wood, 124 Cal. 475, 57 Pac. 388; S. P. R. R. Co. v. Lipman, 148 Cal. 480, 491, 83 Pac. 445; Wilson v. S. P. R. R. Co., 150 Cal. 731, 89 Pac. 1089.

[2] Plaintiff claims that, as he holds under a United States patent to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, that patent cannot be collaterally attacked. The general rule is that patents cannot be so attacked (U. S. v. Stone, 69 U. S. [2 Wall.] 525, 17 L. Ed. 765; Michigan L. & L. Co. v. Rust, 168 U. S. 589, 593, 18 Sup. Ct. 208, 42 L. Ed. 591); but a void patent can be so attacked (Marsh v. Nichols, etc., Co., 128 U. S. 610, 9 Sup. Ct. 168, 32 L. Ed. 538; Steel v. St. Louis, etc., Co., 106 U. S. 452, 1 Sup. Ct. 389, 27 L. Ed. 226, cited in Klauber v. Higgins, 117 Cal. 451, 465, 49 Pac. 466). That this patent is void and subject to collateral attack is clear, for its invalidity results from the fact that the lands covered thereby had been previously granted by act of Congress to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad, and the title thereto was in such railroad when the patent was issued (1885) to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Marsh v. Nichols, supra; S. P. R. R. Co. v. U. S., 168 U. S. 1, 41, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355.

Plaintiff also claims that, even if the patent is invalid, Congress has declared by acts passed in 1891 (26 U. S. Stat. 1093 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4992]), and in 1896 (29 U. S. Stats. 42 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4901–4903]) that no suit can be brought to determine such invalidity after March 2, 1901 (five years after the act of March 2, 1896), and that the effect of this limitation is to validate the patent after that date. In this connection appellant calls attention to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in U. S. v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., 209 U. S. 447, 28 Sup. Ct. 579, 52 L. Ed. 881, in which it was held that the failure of the United States to bring a suit to cancel a void patent results in confirming title in the patentee. The court said:

"We can see no reason for doubting that the statute (26 Stat. 1099, c. 561, § 8), which is the voice of the United States, had that effect. It is said that the instrument was void and hence was no patent. But the statute presupposes an instrument that might be declared void. When it refers to 'any patent heretofore issued,' it describes the purport and source of the document, not its legal effect. If the act were confined to valid patents, it would be almost or quite without use. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, 599."

[3] In the case at bar, however, the patent relied upon by appellant was attacked by the government in 1890, and in that suit was decreed to be void and canceled. It is evident from the act itself that this 5-year period for the bringing of actions to cancel patents was not intended to protect grantees of small portions of the lands patented, where the patent was attacked in time and decreed invalid. If such grantees are bona fide purchasers, they were protected by elaborate provisions of the act by which they could secure title from the government.

No case has been called to our attention, and we have discovered none, in which the federal courts have been called upon to determine the effect of the 5-year limitation upon the rights of a grantee of a portion of the patented premises where the patent itself has been canceled in an action between the government and the patentee, and the grantee is not made a party to the action in which the patent was canceled. In the case of United States v. Norris, 222 Fed. 14, 19, 137 C. C. A. 552, an action had been commenced against the patentee to cancel the patent within the 5-year period. After the expiration of that period the grantee of the patentee was made a party and it was held that he was protected by the 5-year limitation, and that, not having been made a party until after the expiration of that period, the suit as to him must fail because begun too late. In that case, however, the patent had not been canceled at the time the grantee was made a party and the action failed because the grantee had taken the title to the entire tract.

The Supreme Court of the United States has construed with strictness the 5-year limitation upon the power of the government to bring suit to annul a patent. United States v. New Orleans Pac. Ry. Co. et al., 248 U. S. 507, 39 Sup. Ct. 175, 63 L. Ed. 388. The rule is thus stated in United States v. St. P., M. & M. Ry. Co., 247 U. S. 310, 313, 38 Sup. Ct. 525, 526 (62 L. Ed. 1130):

"Laying aside other questions raised by the government, we have reached the conclusion that, having regard to the general principle which requires a strict construction to be given to legislation in derogation of the public right, and in view of the legislative history of this particular enactment, the proviso must be given the effect of a curative measure confined to lands theretofore patented, and not granting dispensation for frauds or mistakes thereafter occurring. It will be observed that the proviso is not a mere statute of limitation, but an absolute bar of suits by the United States; not merely of suits to vacate and annul patents, but of suits to recover either the land or the value thereof; not merely in favor of bona fide purchasers, but also of the immediate recipient of an unlawful certification or patent. The general principle of public policy applicable to all governments, that the public interest should not be prejudiced by the negligence or default of public officers, which underlies the rule of strict construction for statutes of limitation, applies with peculiar force to a statute of this character. United States v. Knight, 14 Pet. 301, 315; Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 92, 99; United States v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486, 489; Fink v. O'Neil, 106 U. S. 272, 281; United States v. Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry. Co., 118 U. S. 120, 125; United States v. Whited & Wheless, 246 U. S. 552."

[4] The purpose of this remedial legislation fixing a limitation within which patents may be attacked and exempting a bona fide purchaser from the results of the invalidity of the patent is fully accomplished as to plaintiff if he is allowed in this action to prove that he is in fact a bona fide purchaser and thus show title. It remains to be determined whether he is protected as a bona fide purchaser under acts of Congress passed for that purpose. The law of March 2, 1896, confirmed the title of bona fide purchasers from the railroad company. United States v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. (C. C.) 117 Fed. 544, affirmed 200 U. S. 341, 26 Sup. Ct. 296, 50 L. Ed. 507, supra; U. S. v. Winona, etc., R. R., 165 U. S. 463, 477, 17 Sup. Ct. 368, 41 L. Ed. 789. Under the previous acts of 1887 and 1891, for the protection of a bona fide purchaser, it was necessary for the purchaser to take some affirmative action to secure a patent in order to fully protect himself (San Jose Land and Water Co. v. San Jose Ranch Co., 129 Cal. 673, 62 Pac. 269, affirmed 189 U. S. 777, 23 Sup. Ct. 487, 47 L. Ed. 765); but this was unnecessary under the act of March 2, 1896, supra. Without some such affirmative action, however, it is necessary for the grantee of the patentee to show that he is a bona fide purchaser in order to claim the benefit of this remedial legislation. The burden of proof of his good faith is on such purchaser when attacked by the government (Wright-Blodgett Co. v. United States, 236 U. S. 397, 35 Sup. Ct. 339, 59 L. Ed. 637), or by a private party (Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Hower, 236 U. S. 702, 35 Sup. Ct. 465, 59 L. Ed. 798; Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1869, 2061, subd. 5).

[5-9] Is the plaintiff shown to be a bona fide purchaser or grantee thereof? By mesne conveyances from C. A. Sargent title was in Susana and Isabel Schell from and after 1892. If they were bona fide purchasers their title was confirmed by Congress the first Monday in March, 1896 (March 2). The land was assessed for state and county taxes for the year 1896, which became a lien on the first Monday in March of that year. Previous thereto it had not been taxable. People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 645; San Jose Land & Water Co. v. San Jose Ranch Co., supra. The land was sold to the state for these taxes (1897), and deeded to the state July 3, 1902, and sold by the state to C. W. Eastman February 21, 1912, and by the latter to the plaintiff July 31, 1912. The plaintiff on June 13, 1913, secured a decree quieting his title against Susana and Isabel Schell, in whom by mesne conveyances the title of the railroad company had vested, and still remained subject to such tax deed. Defendants' vendors made a desert land entry of the land at the United States land office at Los Angeles on June 2, 1910, and thereafter proof of annual work was filed. Margaret G. McCartney assigned her rights to the defendant November 8, 1913. He has made final proof.

Plaintiff claims as a bona fide purchaser of the tax title. Although such title was purchased for a valuable consideration, he cannot be considered a bona fide purchaser within the meaning of the act of 1896 for two reasons: First, at the time of his purchase the United States land office records showed a valid desert land entry thereon; second, at that time the patent under which he claims had been declared null and void, and the decree was of record in the office of the clerk of the United States district court of Los Angeles. Plaintiff visited the land and found no evidence of occupation; but this did not make him a bona fide purchaser. His rights, then, must depend upon the decree to quiet title, in which, in effect, he secured the title of the Schells, but not by a bona fide purchase. If they had title plaintiff should prevail in this case. To establish this it was necessary for plaintiff to prove that they or their predecessors were purchasers in good faith.

The only evidence on that subject is the recitals of consideration in the various conveyances and the fact that in the suit to invalidate the patent Nathan Cole, Jr., was held to be a bona fide purchaser as to certain other land in the grant to him. Recitals in these conveyances are not competent evidence against third persons, not parties or privies thereto. Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 437, 12 Sup. Ct. 239, 35 L. Ed. 1063; Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218; 4 Ency. of Ev. 188, § 12; 22 C. J. 859, § 1028. The decree in favor of Nathan Cole, Jr., declaring him to be a bona fide purchaser of land other than that in his deed to Sargent, plaintiff's predecessor, has no tendency to prove he was such purchaser as to other land. Moreover, the validity of his title to the land involved here was expressly reserved by the decision. Plaintiff relies on certain sections of our code. Section 1962, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; sections 1614, 1615, Civ. Code. See, also, section 1963, subd. 39, Code Civ. Proc. But these sections merely relate to the sufficiency of the consideration to sustain the deed. It follows that plaintiff failed in an essential particular to establish his title.

Appellant also claims title because the United States, having acquired title to the lands by forfeiture in 1886, the title passed under its previous patent of 1885 to the Southern Pacific Railroad under the rule of our Civil Code, to the effect that where a grantor acquires title subsequent to his grant it passes to the grantee. Civ. Code, § 1106. This rule does not apply to a government patent. If so, all the decisions in the litigation between the United States and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company were erroneous.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.

OLNEY, J. (concurring). I concur for the following reasons: The plaintiff and the defendants claim under conflicting rights from the United States. The plaintiff's chain of title runs back to a patent by the government to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. That patent was void, but by the act of Congress of March 2, 1896 (29 U. S. Stats. 42), the title of any bona fide purchaser for value from the railroad company was confirmed to him. This act was in effect a grant to bona fide purchasers for value of such portions of the land as they had purchased from the railroad company. All other lands covered by the patent were public lands open to entry.

The defendants claim under entry upon the particular lands in question here as public lands open to entry, the entry being made in 1910. No question is made but that, if these lands were in fact public lands when entry was so made, the entry was valid and the defendants have the superior right. It is evident that whether or not they were public lands open to entry turns on whether or not at that time the title or claim of title of the railroad company had come into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value. The plaintiff purchased subsequently, so that whether he purchased for value or not is immaterial. Unless some predecessor of his in his chain of title prior to 1910 was a bona fide purchaser for value, the lands were public lands when the defendants' entry was made. The burden of showing this rested on the plaintiff. No evidence whatever was introduced upon the point, unless the deeds of mesne conveyance from the railroad company down may be so considered. They each recite a consideration, and a consideration would also be presumed for the purpose of supporting them.

But, as the main opinion states, neither the presumption for that limited purpose nor a recital of consideration can operate to prove that the grantees were bona fide purchasers for value. The result is that it must be held that the lands were public lands open to entry at the time of the entry under which the defendants claim, and that the plaintiff has no interest therein.

I concur: SHAW, J.

Ex parte TIFFANY. (Cr. 737.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 10, 1920.)

Habeas corpus ⊂=94—Recitals of service and appearance by parent in juvenile court cannot be impeached.

Recitals, in a judgment of the juvenile court declaring a minor to be a ward of the court, that the citation was served on the parent as required by Juvenile Court Act, and that the parent appeared, cannot be impeached on collateral attack by habeas corpus proceedings to secure the release of the minor.

Application by James E. Tiffany for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to May C. Sprague, as Matron of the Maude Booth Home, to secure release of William McFarland Tiffany from the custody of the juvenile court. Writ discharged.

W. W. Judd, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.
Paul Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. The petition recites that James E. Tiffany is the father and proper guardian of William McFarland Tiffany, who is restrained of his liberty by the judge of the juvenile court of Los Angeles county, the referee, probation officer, and May C. Sprague, matron of Maude Booth Home in Los Angeles. The detention is alleged to be illegal, in that a petition under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Act was filed on August 28, 1919, and the boy found by the referee to be a ward of the juvenile court, without the knowledge of this petitioner, and that no citation was served upon the father as required by law.

The respondent May C. Sprague, matron of the Maude Booth Home, answered to the writ, stating that the boy was in her custody by virtue of a judgment entered in the juvenile court on September 5, 1919. Attached to her answer is a certified copy of the judgment, which recites that notice was served on James E. Tiffany more than 24 hours before the hearing, and that he was present at the time specified in the citation. By the judgment the boy is declared a ward of the court and ordered committed to the Maude Booth Home, in custody of the probation officer.

The Juvenile Court Act (Stats. 1915, p. 1225) provides that upon the filing of a petition, stating that any person under the age of 21 years has no parent or guardian willing to exercise or capable of exercising proper parental control over him, a citation shall issue and be served on the parent or guardian having custody of the child at least 24 hours before the time therein specified for a hearing. Service of citation may be waived by voluntary appearance, and entry thereof made in the minutes of the court, or by written waiver filed with the clerk. On the hearing, the child may be declared a ward of the court and committed to the custody of the probation officer as in the act provided, subject to be returned to the court for further proceedings whenever deemed necessary or desirable. Any order so made by the court may be changed, modified, or set aside, as to the judgment of the court may seem proper.

The judgment in this case recites that the steps prerequisite to jurisdiction were taken, and on collateral attack the recitals are conclusive on this court. The petitioner in this proceeding is not permitted to prove that any statement contained in the judgment is false, and no evidence can be received to contradict the judgment, except it be in a proceeding in the superior court, brought directly for that purpose. Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, 19 Pac. 275, 11 Am. St. Rep. 251. The judgment being valid on its face, it cannot be impeached in this proceeding.

Writ discharged.

BLANEY v. CLINE, Sheriff. (Civ. 3390.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 10, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⊜622—Time for filing transcript not expired, where proceeding for settlement of exceptions pending.

Under rule 2 of the Supreme Court and District Court of appeal (176 Pac. vii), where appellant's proceeding for settlement of the bill of exceptions is pending in the superior court, the time for filing transcript has not expired; counsel for appellant having been reasonably diligent in pressing hearing on the settlement, and any delay having been occasioned by the absence of respondent's attorney from the county.

Action by Hattie F. Blaney against John C. Cline, Sheriff of Los Angeles County. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appealed, and defendant moves to dismiss. Motion denied.

Harold Ide Cruzan, of San Francisco, and Moote & Patterson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. L. Sacks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Motion to dismiss appeal. The notice of motion was served on appellant June 30, 1920, and was heard on July 12, 1920. Attached to the notice is a certificate of the clerk of the superior court, stating that the notice of appeal was filed March 3, 1919, that an order granting five days additional time to prepare a bill of exceptions was filed March 13, 1919, and that no further action was taken.

Counsel for appellant presented an affidavit setting forth that his proposed bill of exceptions, and amendments thereto, suggested by respondent, was filed with the clerk of the court in which the action was tried on April 7, 1919, and that no date has been set by the judge for settling the bill. The affidavit states that at one time affiant appeared in court with Joseph Pacht, who claimed to represent respondent's attorney, and requested the judge to settle the bill, whereupon the court was informed by Pacht that he was going to San Francisco, where respondent's attorney was then living, and would there secure sufficient information upon which to act. On two subsequent occasions affiant communicated with Pacht regarding the matter, and was finally informed that respondent's attorney was expected to return to Los Angeles soon. The affidavit states that respondent's attorney returned to the city several months prior to the filing of the notice of motion, but that affiant was not aware of his return until about June 1, 1920, when affiant met him on the street and requested that he take up the matter in court. This counsel refused to do, informing affiant that he intended to move to dismiss the appeal. No affidavit in opposition to the statements of appellant's attorney was filed.

The ground of the motion is that the appeal has not been perfected by filing the transcript within the time provided by law. Rule 2 of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal Rules (176 Pac. vii) provides that appellant, within 40 days after perfecting his appeal, shall file his transcript, but that, if a proceeding for the settlement of a bill of exceptions which may be used in support of the appeal is pending, the time shall not begin to run until the settled and authenticated bill of exceptions has been filed. The record here shows that appellant has complied with the terms of section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by filing with the clerk the proposed bill and amendments, and that the delay in presenting the same to the judge for settlement was occasioned by the absence of respondent's attorney from the county. Counsel for appellant appears to have been reasonably diligent in pressing a hearing on the settlement, having more than once requested action from the other side. It is true that he might have insisted on the settlement of the bill, or compelled the judge to act, by mandate; but under the circumstances of the case we do not deem that he was guilty of negligence in failing to take such steps. As the proceeding for settlement of the bill is still pending in the superior court, the time for filing the transcript has not expired.

Motion denied.

COLE v. WOLFSKILL et al. (Civ. 3179.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 7, 1920.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⊜12—Relation to patient is confidential, and transactions will be scrutinized.

The relation between physician and patient is confidential, and the law demands the strict good faith in all transactions arising therefrom, and will scrutinize closely all dealings between the parties; but, if it is satisfactorily shown that the patient has freely and voluntarily disposed of his property in accordance with his wishes, and his capacity is apparent, the existence of the confidential relation will not prevent a disposition to the physician.

2. Contracts ⊜88—Mere fact of confidential relationship does not overcome presumption of consideration.

Under Civ. Code, § 2235, creating a presumption that transactions by which a trustee obtains any advantage from his beneficiary are without consideration and under undue influence, the mere fact that a confidential relationship existed between the parties is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of consideration for a written instrument created by Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, but it must also be made to appear that the relationship was used to obtain an unfair advantage, or that the confidence was violated.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⊂=24(4)—Witnesses ⊂=139(14)—Instructed verdict, in action on patient's note, proper; plaintiff incompetent to testify in action on decedent's note for fees.

In an action on a note for physician's fees brought against the executors of the maker, the physician's testimony as to the transaction is excluded by Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, and, although it does not appear that the physician disclosed to the patient the amounts which he paid to his assistants for the services, an instructed verdict for plaintiff is proper, where it appears that the patient was in full possession of her faculties, acting freely and voluntarily.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⊂=21—Where no undue influence, adequacy of consideration for patient's note immaterial.

In the absence of undue influence, the adequacy of consideration for a patient's note to her physician in payment of his account is immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by George L. Cole against Matt A. Wolfskill and another as executors of the will of Susanne B. Wolfskill, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff on instructed verdict and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Davis & Rush, G. Harold Janeway, Hunsaker & Britt, and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wheaton A. Gray, William Alvin Bowen, and E. S. Williams, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WELLER, J. This appeal is from a judgment entered on an instructed verdict. The complaint alleged that the decedent in her lifetime executed to plaintiff her promissory note for the sum of $12,500, and that a claim based on such note was presented to the defendants, as executors, and rejected. In the answer defendants pleaded the relationship of physician and patient between the decedent and plaintiff, and that the execution of the note was procured by undue influence and without adequate consideration.

From the testimony of witnesses at the trial, it appears that decedent was a widow, about 71 years of age, and without business experience until after her husband's death, when she administered his large estate, with the assistance of agents and attorneys. She was of a confiding and generous disposition, possessed of a strong will, and was bright, capable, and clear-headed. The plaintiff had been for many years her family physician and a neighbor; but though their relations were very friendly, there was nothing of a business nature between them prior to the execution of the note in question, except with regard to his fees, which she had paid. In May, 1915, the doctor amputated one of decedent's legs with the assistance of three other physicians, whom he called for the purpose. Mrs. Wolfskill recovered sufficiently from the effect of the operation to make a trip to the Orient, accompanied by a servant, returning some time in December, 1915. Subsequent to her return she contracted the illness which resulted in her death in January, 1916. During her convalescence after the operation, and in the month of July, 1915, the doctor visited decedent one day, and, in the presence of the nurse, jokingly inquired of Mrs. Wolfskill how much he owed her for his visits, to which she responded by inquiring how much she owed him. At this point the nurse left the room, and did not hear the conversation that ensued. Several days later the doctor again called, bringing with him the note, which Mrs. Wolfskill signed. At the time of the signing of the note decedent offered to secure payment thereof by a mortgage on her Pasadena home, which offer, however, the doctor rejected, stating that her signature would be sufficient and that she should keep her home clear. The doctor also informed Mrs. Wolfskill that he had paid the other physicians, and on delivery of the note to him, gave her a receipt for $12,500 for professional services, which, by its terms included payment of the three assistants. After his departure Mrs. Wolfskill remarked to the nurse that she thought the charge reasonable, that she would not have been surprised if it had been $20,000, and expressed appreciation of what the doctor had done for her.

The two sons of the decedent, executors of her will, testified that their mother had a clear, strong mind, a positive character and that she was a good house manager. She had administered her husband's estate, which was appraised at $2,600,000, in a satisfactory manner and no criticism was made of the conduct of any of her business affairs. From this undisputed testimony it is sufficiently established that Mrs. Wolfskill was fully capable of contracting, that the plaintiff had rendered her valuable services, and that the note was voluntarily executed by her in settlement therefor, in the belief that the charge was reasonable. There was no evidence introduced tending to show any incapacity or weakness of mind on the part of Mrs. Wolf-skill, or that she was unduly influenced by the doctor in making the note.

It is contended by appellants that, by reason of the proof that the note was executed by a patient to her physician during such relationship, the presumption arose that it was obtained by undue influence and without sufficient consideration, and that the burden then shifted to plaintiff to prove that the transaction was voluntary and based upon an adequate consideration.

[1] It undoubtedly is the established rule that the relation of physician and patient is confidential, and the law demands the strictest good faith and fair dealing in all transactions arising from that relationship. Once this relation is shown to exist, all dealings between the parties will be closely scrutinized, to ascertain if the confidence of the trusting party has been betrayed, or his mind unduly influenced to his prejudice. But when satisfactory proof has been made that a person has freely and voluntarily disposed of his property in accordance with his wishes, and his capacity and volition are apparent, the existence of the confidential relation will not prevent the consummation of his desires. Estate of Wickes, 139 Cal. 195, 72 Pac. 902.

[2] Under the provisions of section 2235 of the Civil Code, all transactions by which a trustee obtains any advantage from his beneficiary are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence. It has been held that the fact must be alleged and proved that the client has suffered some injury through the abuse of confidence by his attorney. If it were enough to show that a contract was entered into during the relationship, and that thereupon the presumption would arise that it was fraudulent, it would follow either that all contracts between an attorney and client or physician and patient are voidable, or that a party is entitled to relief on the ground of fraud without showing that damage resulted from the fraud. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 425, 91 Am. Dec. 644. A written instrument is presumptive evidence of consideration (section 1614, Civ. Code), and the burden of showing want of consideration to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it (section 1615, Civ. Code). To overcome the presumption of consideration evidenced by a writing, it is not sufficient to show merely that the confidential relation existed, but it must be made to appear that the relationship was used to obtain an unfair advantage, or that the confidence was violated. Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97, 37 Pac. 189. The rule is less stringent where it appears that the trustee was not advising the beneficiary in the conduct of business, but assumes a hostile attitude, and is urging the payment of a debt due himself. Johnson v. Fesemeyer, 3 DeG. & J. 22.

The result of a drastic application of the rule invoked here would be to preclude a physician from bargaining with a patient in regard to his fees, and to deprive persons occupying confidential relations of the power of contracting with each other for compensation, which, in all cases, would of necessity be fixed by a court or jury regardless of the circumstances under which the parties arrived at an agreement between themselves.

[3] Counsel argues that it does not appear in this case that Mrs. Wolfskill was informed as to the amounts paid to other physicians or what services were performed by the plaintiff, although peculiarly within his knowledge. It must be borne in mind that this is an action to recover a debt due from an estate; and the lips of the plaintiff are sealed as effectually by the terms of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, as the voice of the decedent is stilled by the Grim Reaper. What he knows can never be revealed to an earthly tribunal; and what occurred between the parties must ever remain undisclosed to mortal judge.

[4] But it does appear by the undisputed evidence that the decedent was in full possession of all her faculties, acting freely and voluntarily, with knowledge of all the doctor had done for her during her illness, and in grateful appreciation of his services she executed the note in payment of his account, believing it to be a reasonable charge. In the absence of undue influence, the adequacy of the consideration is immaterial. Silveria v. Alexander, 25 Cal. App. 506, 144 Pac. 303.

Under the circumstances, we are of the opinion that the trial court was justified in its instruction to the jury to find for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

BAKER v. SLOCUM. (Civ. 3268.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 13, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⊂=373(1)—Under the alternative method, notice of appeal need not be accompanied by the undertaking, regardless of how the transcript is made up.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, the filing of a notice of appeal without the undertaking required by section 940, gives the appellate court jurisdiction, and after the jurisdiction has thus vested appellant may elect to prepare his transcript under section 950, instead of by the alternative method authorized by section 953a, without affecting the validity of his appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by S. A. Baker against Thos. A. Slocum. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied.

James R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur H. Blanchard, of Santa Paulo, for respondent.

WELLER, J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal because of the failure of appellant to file the undertaking for costs required by section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Notice of appeal was filed with the clerk of the superior court November 16, 1919, and the printed transcript, containing the judgment roll and two bills of exceptions, was filed in this court on December 24, 1919.

The filing of the notice of appeal without an undertaking complied with the provisions of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, and thereupon this court acquired jurisdiction of the appeal. After jurisdiction is thus vested in this court, the appellant may elect to prepare his transcript under section 950, Code of Civil Procedure, instead of adopting the alternative method permitted by section 953a of the same Code, without affecting the validity of his appeal. PEOPLE v. FUSKI. (Cr. 525, 2333.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing, Sept. 29, 1920.)

1. Prostitution ⊂=1—Elements of offense of "pimping" stated.

To constitute the offense of "pimping," under St. 1911, p. 10, the defendant must be a male person, have knowledge that a certain female person is a prostitute, and there must be earnings from her prostitution, and defendant must derive his support and maintenance in whole or in part from such earnings, knowing them to have been the proceeds from prostitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Pimp.]

2. Indictment and Information ⊂=60—Indictment must enable accused to suitably prepare defense.

The main purpose of requiring the various elements of a crime to be set out in an indictment or information is to enable the defendant to suitably prepare his defense, being presumed to be innocent, and therefore to have no independent knowledge of the facts that constitute the offense.

3. Indictment and information ⊂=101—Sex of subject of crime must be alleged, if necessary element.

If a crime be of such character that it can be committed only against the person of a male being, or of a female, the sex of such third person must plainly appear in an indictment or information.

4. Prostitution ⊂=3—Sex of accused need not be alleged in indictment for pimping.

In a prosecution for pimping, under St. 1911, p. 10, an allegation that accused is a male person would be of no aid to him, and it is not necessary to so allege, being a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge.

5. Criminal law ⊂=742(1)—Credibility of witnesses for jury.

The truth or falsity of testimony of men of loathsome character is for the jury.

6. Criminal law ⊂=1032(7)—Objection of variance should be made on trial.

Where there was no objection at the trial that there was a variance between the proof and averments of the indictment, and no request to instruct the jury to acquit on such ground, it is too late to make such point on appeal.

7. Prostitution ⊂=3 — That one accused of pimping was manager of house mere incident, not necessary to be alleged.

In a prosecution for pimping, under St. 1911, p. 10, the gist of the offense was in receiving money from a prostitute for defendant's support, knowing the source from which it came, and the fact, if it existed, that defendant was the keeper or manager of the house, was a mere additional incident, not necessary to be alleged.

8. Criminal law ⊂=404(1)—Sex could be determined by jury from appearance.

In a prosecution for pimping, under St. 1911, p. 10, a claim that there was no evidence that defendant was a male person, or that the alleged prostitute was a female person, was of no merit, where the jurors had the parties before them.

9. Criminal law ⊂=306(1)—Court not required to indulge in repetitions in directing jury.

The court cannot be expected to indulge in vain repetitions in directing the jury in a criminal case.

10. Criminal law ⊂=834(2)—Instructions need not be in exact language of request.

If an accused proposes an appropriate instruction, it should be given, but not necessarily in the exact language as proposed.

11. Criminal law ⊂=1158(3)—For trial court to determine whether juror having opinion was qualified.

Where a juror in a criminal case stated that he had a definite opinion which it would take evidence to remove, but declared very clearly that he would entirely disregard such opinion and be guided solely by the evidence in the case, it was for the trial court to determine whether he was qualified juror.

12. Criminal law ⊜126(2)—Refusal of change of venue justified.

Where, in refusing a motion for a change of venue in a prosecution for pimping, the court stated that it would be overruled temporarily, and a right to renew would be given at any time after it should appear that the defendant could not have a fair and impartial trial, and the record of the impanelment of the jury shows beyond question that no greater difficulty than ordinarily occurs was encountered, and that a fair and impartial jury was selected, the court was justified in denying the motion.

13. Criminal law ⊜627½ — Official reporter not required to deliver to accused transcript of statements made in district attorney's office.

In a criminal prosecution, there was no error in refusing to require the official reporter to deliver to accused's counsel a transcript of his notes of statements made by the prosecuting witness in the office of the district attorney.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

14. Prostitution ⊜3—Indictment for pimping need not allege that accused wholly or in part derived support from prostitute.

In a prosecution for pimping, under St. 1911, p. 10, it was entirely unnecessary to allege in the indictment whether the defendant "wholly" or "in part" derived support and maintenance from the prostitution of the woman named; it being entirely sufficient to allege that the defendant "did then and there willfully and unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly derive support and maintenance from the earnings and proceeds," etc.

15. Prostitution ⊜3—Allegations as to knowledge by one accused of pimping held not fatally defective.

Allegation in an indictment, under St. 1911, p. 10, that accused, "knowing one E., a female person, to be a prostitute, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly derive support and maintenance from earnings and proceeds of the prostitution of said E.," etc., on the question of the knowledge of the defendant as to the source of the moneys, was at most only an imperfect allegation of a material fact, rather than of a total failure to set forth an essential element.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime denounced by an act of the Legislature passed in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 10). The charging part of the indictment is as follows:

"The said Joe Fuski on the —— day of November, A. D. 1919, at the county of Sacramento, in the state of California, and before the finding of this indictment, did then and there knowing one Esther Greely, a female person, to be a prostitute, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly derive support and maintenance from the earnings and proceeds of the prostitution of said Esther Greely; she, the said Esther Greely, being then and there a prostitute."

There was no demurrer to the indictment, but a motion was made in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment is fatally defective. The points made on the appeal from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are:

"(1) That the matters alleged in the indictment do not constitute a crime or public offense. (2) That the evidence does not sustain or justify the verdict of conviction. (3) That the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion for change of venue. (4) That the trial court erred in overruling the defendant's challenge to the talesman Benning. (5) That the court erred in refusing to permit Joseph E. Piepher, court reporter, to furnish defendant for the purpose of cross-examination, a transcript of the statements made by the prosecuting witness in the office of the district attorney. (6) The court erred in its instructions to the jury. (7) The court erred in refusing instructions requested by defendant."

[1] As stated by appellant, the elements or conditions that must exist to constitute the offense are: (1) The defendant must be a male person; (2) he must have knowledge that a certain female person is a prostitute; (3) there must be earnings from her prostitution; (4) the defendant must derive his support or maintenance in whole or in part from such earnings, knowing them to have been the proceeds from prostitution. These essentials, it is claimed, should, by suitable averment, appear in the indictment. Herein the first objection is that it is not alleged that defendant is a male person. The Attorney General answers that the fact is sufficiently implied in the use of the name "Joe." The authorities, though, including at least two decisions in this state, are generally opposed to that view. Ellis v. State, 65 Tex. Cr. R. 480, 145 S. W. 339; People v. Martin, 180 Ill. App. 578; People v. Carroll, 1 Cal. App. 2, 81 Pac. 680; People v. Allison, 25 Cal. App. 746, 145 Pac. 539; 22 Cyc. 343.

[2-4] It is manifest, however, that there is a distinction as to the importance and necessity of such allegation between the case of the defendant himself and that of a third party. The main purpose of requiring the various elements of a crime to be set out in an indictment or information is to enable him to suitably prepare his defense. He is presumed to be innocent, and therefore to have no independent knowledge of the facts that constitute the offense. For instance, if the crime be of such character that it can be committed only against the person of a male being or of a female, of course the sex of said third party must plainly appear. But herein the allegation that the defendant is a male person would be of no aid to him, since that is a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge, and, whether guilty or innocent, he is equally apprised of his sex. From a practical standpoint it would be just as important to inform him that he is a human being as to allege that he is a male person. No doubt, indeed, he would be quick to resent the imputation that he is not a human being or that he is a female.

The other objections to the indictment are that it fails—

"to allege whether the defendant in whole or in part lived or derived his support or maintenance from the earnings or proceeds of the prostitution; also what sum or sums of money were received by him from such source for such purpose; and also that defendant knew, when he applied the money to his support and maintenance, that it was derived from the earnings and proceeds of the prostitution."

It may be conceded that the indictment is somewhat defective in all these respects, and that more care should have been exercised in its construction; but we are satisfied that is not fatally objectionable, and that no prejudice resulted to appellant from any of the imperfections in said pleading. We may add that the absence of a specific allegation as to whether defendant was wholly, or only partially, supported by said earnings, and as to what sum of money he thus received, constitutes the ground simply for a special demurrer, and was therefore waived. As to his knowledge that the money he obtained was derived from said source, while it is true that an explicit allegation to that effect would be desirable, yet no one would have any difficulty in understanding from the indictment as a whole that such was the intended charge of the pleader. The case is one of an imperfect allegation of a material fact rather than of a total failure to set forth an essential element. People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 Pac. 521.

Finally, as to all the criticisms of the indictment, the suggestion may be made that any defect therein was rendered innocuous and is shown to have been without prejudice by the evidence at the trial. People v. Bonfanti, 181 Pac. 80; Reid v. Superior Court, 186 Pac. 634.

It is not an unfair inference from the evidence that appellant derived his support, in part at least, from the illicit earnings of said prostitute. Various circumstances detailed by the witnesses indicate such to be the fact. There is also the positive testimony of one Joe Costello, as follows:

"Q. What, if anything, did Esther do when Joe and she and you went together in the front room? A. Well, one time she set down there on the bed and played with the dog, and another time she came in and gave him 50 cents. Q. Gave who 50 cents? A. Joe Fuski. Q. That is the defendant here? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did Joe Fuski do with the 50-cent piece? A. Put it in his pocket."

It also appears from the testimony of this same witness that a portion of said earnings was placed in a certain trunk and a part of that money was delivered to appellant, who "spent it buying something to eat and gambling."

[5] True, appellant claims that Costello was an accomplice, and that his testimony, therefore, required corroboration. But it cannot be said as a matter of law that he participated or was concerned in the commission of the particular offense charged against appellant. At least, it was a debatable question, and proper to be submitted to the jury. People v. Lawlor, 21 Cal. App. 63, 131 Pac. 63. Unquestionably the witness appeared in rather an unenviable light. He would not be selected as a model for a Sunday school class, but even men of the most loathsome character sometimes tell the truth, and we can see nothing incredible in his statements. The jury undoubtedly believed him, and they were apparently justified in doing so. In this connection, we may state that the court was warranted in declining to give an instruction that Costello was an accomplice, but properly left it for the jury to determine under the general instructions given on the subject.

Another claim of appellant is that "the evidence in the case, taken most strongly against defendant, goes no further than to show that the money paid to him by the prosecuting witness, Esther Greely, was money charged her by the keeper and manager of a house or place where prostitution was practiced and allowed," and that this is an entirely distinct offense from that charged in the indictment. Appellant concludes that there was a fatal variance between the proof and the averments of the pleading, and the judgment must be reversed for that reason.

[6, 7] As to this contention it may be said that no such objection was made at the trial, nor was the court requested to instruct the jury to acquit on said ground. In fact, the case was tried upon the theory that this particular condition was covered by the indictment, and it is now too late to make the point. Moreover, the evidence introduced by the defendant was to the effect that he was not the manager or keeper of the house, and hence there was a conflict as to that question. Besides, the gist of the offense was in receiving such money for his support, knowing the source from which it came, and the fact, if it existed, that he was the keeper or manager of the house, was a mere additional incident not necessary to be alleged.

[8] Appellant is clearly in error in the claim that "there is no evidence that defendant is a male person, nor that Esther Greely is a female person." In the first place, the jurors had before them these parties, and from their appearance, no doubt, their sex could be determined. People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161. Moreover, it does appear very clearly, from the use of pronouns and otherwise, that Joe was and is a male, and Esther a female. Counsel for appellant will not resent the kindly suggestion that his talents might be better employed than in urging a point of so little merit.

[9, 10] Appellant complains of the action of the court in refusing to give certain proposed instructions, but after an examination of the charge we are satisfied that every principle of law necessary for the enlightenment and guidance of the jury was clearly and accurately presented by the trial judge. The court could not be expected to indulge in "vain repetitions" in directing the jury. If the defendant proposes an appropriate instruction, it should be given, of course, but not necessarily in the exact language as proposed. To show how insubstantial is the criticism of appellant in this respect, we notice that he complains because of the court's refusal to instruct that the prosecution must prove that the defendant was a male person, and that he derived support in whole or in part from money received from said Esther Greely, and yet we find this direction to the jury:

"The court therefore instructs you that, before you can find the defendant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment herein, you must be satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt: (1) That the defendant is a male person, and that Esther Greely is a female person; (2) that the said Esther Greely was at the time and place as charged in the indictment a prostitute; (3) that the defendant, at the time and place as charged in the indictment, knew of his own personal knowledge that the said Esther Greely was then and there a prostitute; (4) that the said defendant did, as charged in the indictment, derive support or maintenance in whole or in part from the earnings or proceeds of the prostitution of such prostitute, and that the defendant knew, as charged in the indictment, that such earnings or proceeds so received by him from her were the earnings or proceeds of the prostitution of such prostitute; and (5) that the defendant used the same for his own support or maintenance, either in whole or in part, all as charged in the indictment herein. Should you entertain a reasonable doubt as to all or any of the matters set forth in the indictment, or in this instruction set forth, then you will return a verdict of not guilty."

[11] The court committed no error in overruling the challenge to the juror Benning. While he at first stated that he had a definite opinion in the case, which it would take evidence to remove, he subsequently declared very clearly that he would entirely disregard said opinion, and be guided solely by the evidence in the case. It was for the trial court to determine whether he was a qualified juror. People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 371, 92 Pac. 853.

[12] There is no reason to hold that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for a change of venue. In making its ruling the court said:

"Now, the motion will be overruled temporarily, and the right to renew will be given at any time, if, during the subsequent impanelment of the jurors, it should appear that the defendant cannot have a fair and impartial trial in this county."

It may be stated that a large number of affidavits and of counter affidavits was filed on the hearing of the motion, upon which conflicting opinions might be based as to the probability of securing a fair jury for the trial. But the record of the impanelment of the jury shows beyond question that no greater difficulty than ordinarily occurs was encountered and that a fair and impartial jury was selected. In view of all the circumstances, the court was entirely justified in denying the motion. People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 Pac. 599.

[13] The last point made by appellant is that the court should have required the official reporter to deliver to defendant's counsel the transcript of his notes of certain statements made in the district attorney's office by said Esther Greely. The situation is similar to that discussed in People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 158, 72 Pac. 965, and People v. Emmons, 7 Cal. App. 690, 95 Pac. 1032, and it is sufficient to refer to those decisions for an answer to appellant's contention.

Finally, it may be said that the importance of a careful examination of the record to ascertain if the defendant was justly convicted is emphasized by the nature of the charge made against him. The crime itself bespeaks such bestial depravity that even a formal accusation by a grand jury is likely to excite the aversion of the community against the person thus accused, and to make it difficult for him to secure a fair trial. With this possibility in view, we have given the proceedings very earnest attention, and we have no hesitation in saying that no right to which defendant is entitled under the law was invaded, that the trial was conducted decorously and legally, and that the verdict of the jury is amply supported.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is denied.

[14, 15] We desire to say, in addition to what is said in the opinion, that we think that it was entirely unnecessary to allege in the indictment whether the defendant "wholly" or "in part" derived support and maintenance from the prostitution of the woman named therein, and that it was entirely sufficient in this regard to allege that the defendant "did then and there willfully and unlawfully, feloniously, and knowingly derive support and maintenance from the earnings and proceeds," etc. On the question of the knowledge of the defendant as to the source of the moneys, we entirely agree with the District Court of Appeal that the case at most is one of an imperfect allegation of a material fact, rather than of a total failure to set forth an essential element.

All concur.

PEOPLE v. KENNEDY. (Cr. 715.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ⊂688—Reopening of case for further evidence after motion to direct acquittal discretionary.

The reopening of a case for further evidence, even after motion by defendant to advise the jury to acquit, is within the trial court's discretion.

2. Criminal law ⊂687(2)—Reopening to permit state to introduce evidence not abuse of discretion.

In a prosecution for rape, action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney, after he had concluded his opening argument to the jury, to reopen the case to introduce direct evidence that prosecutrix was not defendant's wife, held not an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

R. W. Kennedy was convicted of rape, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Morgan Marmaduke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, J. Upon an information charging him therewith, defendant was convicted of rape, alleged to have been committed upon a female, a young girl of the age of 14 years, who was not his wife. From the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] It is urged that the trial court committed prejudicial error in permitting the district attorney, after he had concluded his opening argument to the jury, to reopen the case for the purpose of introducing direct evidence that the prosecutrix was not the wife of defendant. The reopening of a case for further evidence, even after a motion by defendant to advise the jury to acquit, is within the discretion of the trial court. State v. Meister, 60 Or. 469, 120 Pac. 406; State v. Hornaday, 67 Wash. 660, 122 Pac. 322; Froman v. Com., 19 Ky. Law Rep. 948; 42 S. W. 728; State v. Murphy, 9 Nev. 394; 16 C. J. 871–873. See, also, Cousins v. Partridge, 79 Cal. 228, 21 Pac. 745; People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 165, 62 Pac. 404; People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 553, 57 Pac. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783; People v. McPherson, 6 Cal. App. 265, 91 Pac. 1098.

[2] The record here discloses no abuse of the trial court's discretion. The witnesses, it is true, had been dismissed, but defendant made no request for a reasonable continuance in order that he might recall any witness to refute the evidence that the prosecutrix was not his wife. Moreover, defendant's own testimony, while a witness in his own behalf, so far precludes any idea that the relation of husband and wife existed between himself and the prosecutrix, that we feel satisfied that had the court voluntarily suggested to him that he recall his witnesses, he would have put none of them upon the stand to testify that the prosecutrix was his wife. He testified that he knew nothing whatever of any of the members of the family of the prosecutrix, except that she was the sister of a married woman with whom he admitted having had illicit relations. Asked why, when he went to his room in the hotel where he was living, he left the prosecutrix outside to tramp around the street alone, his reply was: "She did not belong to me." All the circumstances of the case preclude the existence of the relationship of husband and wife. By no possibility could defendant have been prejudiced by the reopening of the case, that direct evidence might be given that the girl was not his wife.

There is no merit whatever in the appeal. The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TINNEN. (Cr. 530, 2334.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 3, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing Oct. 1, 1920.)

1. Homicide ⟸141(2)—Word "murder" may or may not be used in indictment for administering poison with intent to kill.

It is wholly unnecessary to use the word "murder" in charging the offense of administering poison with intent to kill under Pen. Code § 216, but if used in an indictment it could not change the offense to that of assault to commit murder, if the accusatory pleading otherwise charged the offense defined by section 216.

2. Criminal law ⟸241—Commitment held one for administering poison with intent to kill, and not assault with intent to commit murder.

The words in a commitment, "assault with intent to commit murder," held merely an ineffectual or futile attempt on the part of the magistrate to characterize generically the character or nature of the crime charged in the complaint, which was that of administering poison with intent to kill.

3. Criminal law ⟸241 — Commitment and complaint to be read together.

A commitment and a complaint, on which it is indorsed, must be read together to ascertain for what offense accused is committed, where the commitment itself does not attempt to define the crime for which the accused is held, but merely in general language states that the accused is held for the crime charged in the complaint.

4. Homicide ⟸141(2) — Information for administering poison with intent to kill need not expressly allege that subject did not die.

An information, charging the offense defined by Pen. Code, § 216, of administering poison with intent to kill, need not allege that the act of administering the poison did not cause death, the very statement that the poison was administered "with the intent to kill" of necessity implying that death was not caused by the act.

5. Homicide ⟸141(2)—Information charged administering of poison with intent to kill and not assault to murder.

An information, charging administering of poison with intent to kill, "and murder," held to charge the crime of administering poison with intent to kill under Pen. Code, § 216, and not the crime of assault with intent to commit murder as defined by section 217; the word "assault" not being used.

6. Indictment and information ⟸63—Ultimate facts to be pleaded and nothing left to implication.

Sufficient facts must be directly alleged in a criminal pleading from which it can be determined that the acts complained of are wrongful and unlawful, and in construing an indictment or information nothing must be left to implication, intendment, or conclusion, and none but ultimate facts are to be pleaded, but when ultimate facts are alleged from which but one conclusion can follow, and which conclusion irresistibly follows from the facts so alleged, the pleading is not in violation of the rule if the conclusion is not expressly or directly alleged.

7. Criminal law ⟸1166½(8) — Overruling challenges for cause not reversible error, unless peremptory challenges were exhausted.

Errors committed in overruling challenges for cause are not grounds of reversal in a criminal case, unless it is shown that an objectionable juror has been forced upon the challenging party after he had exhausted his peremptory challenges.

8. Homicide ⟸257(1)—Evidence supporting conviction of administering poison with intent to kill.

In a prosecution for administering poison maliciously and with intent to kill, by the use of chloroform, under Pen. Code, § 216, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

9. Criminal law ⟸761(8)—Instruction sufficiently left to jury question whether chloroform was poison.

In a prosecution for administering poison with intent to kill under Pen. Code, § 216, an instruction, "If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did * * * administer chloroform to one C. by causing her to inhale the same, with the intent to kill said C., and that chloroform is a poison, then I instruct that it is your duty to find a verdict of guilty," held to sufficiently leave it to the jury to determine whether chloroform was a poison.

10. Homicide ⟸89(1)—Causing one to inhale chloroform was "administering poison" with intent to kill.

One causing another to inhale chloroform with intent to maliciously kill such person was guilty of "administering poison" to another within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 216, relating to administering poison with intent to kill.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Administer.]

11. Criminal law ⟸304(3)—Common knowledge that inhalation of certain narcotics will result in death.

It is a matter of common knowledge that there are narcotics which, through the process of inhalation, will produce sleep or a morbid condition of the nervous system, and which, in certain doses, will produce death.

12. Homicide ⟸292(2)—Not necessary to instruct jury to trace action of chloroform in prosecution for "administering poison."

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 216, for administering chloroform with intent to kill, it was not necessary to instruct the jury that they were required to trace the action of the chloroform in its effect upon specific organs of the body or the channels into or through which it was necessary to pass to produce death, since if the evidence showed that the chloroform was given in the usual mode of giving that narcotic, then it was "administered" by the defendant within the meaning of the statute.

13. Criminal law ⇐829(1)—No error in refusing instruction substantially covered.

There was no error in refusing to give a requested instruction, where the court in another instruction charged the jury on the matter covered substantially in the language of the requested instruction.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

14. Criminal law ⇐1166½(3)—Disallowance of challenge forced objectionable juror upon accused.

Where subsequent to disallowance of challenge to juror for cause accused exhausted his peremptories, it cannot be said that a juror objectionable to him was not forced on him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Albert Tinnen was convicted of administering poison maliciously and with intent to kill. From the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appealed. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Tehama county, in the superior court thereof, for the crime of administering poison to another person maliciously and with intent to kill said person. He was tried upon and convicted by a jury under said information, and he brings this appeal to this court from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The point first made by the appellant is that the court below erred in denying his motion to set aside the information on the ground that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate, and that he had not been committed by the magistrate for the offense charged in the information.

The information is founded on section 216 of the Penal Code, which is in language as follows:

"Every person who, with intent to kill, administers, or causes or procures to be administered, to another, any poison or other noxious or destructive substance or liquid, but by which death is not caused, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than ten years."

The point that the accused was not legally committed is founded upon the theory that there is a variance between the offense for which the defendant was committed and the offense set forth in the information. In fact, both of the two grounds upon which the motion to set aside the information was based involve practically the same question, to wit, whether the information states a different offense from that for which the defendant was committed by the magistrate.

Preliminarily, we may consider the point made by the Attorney General on the threshold of his discussion of the question now in hand, that there is not presented here a properly authenticated record upon the motion to set aside the information, and that therefore this court cannot review that question. The contention is that the complaint filed before the magistrate and the commitment issued are not authenticated according to the requirements of the law, and the rule respecting such records on appeal; hence, so it is argued, it does not appear from or in this record whether the court below, in hearing and deciding the motion to set aside the information, had before it and considered the document named. The record discloses that, in the proceeding on the motion, the complaint and the commitment were introduced in evidence, and we think it is sufficiently made to appear that the court considered said documents at the hearing and in the decision of the motion. But if it were necessary to concede that there is some doubt whether the record upon the motion to set aside the information fully complies with the rule, we shall nevertheless consider the merits of the question growing out of said motion and urged here on the order of the court denying the same.

The commitment is indorsed on the back of the complaint or deposition upon which the warrant of arrest was issued and the charge examined, and therefore, as will later be better understood, the decision of the question in hand will require a consideration of said complaint or deposition. That document reads:

"That said John Doe on the 6th day of February, 1918, and before the filing of this complaint at and in the city of Corning in the said county of Tehama, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously and with malice aforethought, administer to one Margery Cockcroft a certain deadly poison, to wit, chloroform, with the unlawful and felonious intent then and there and thereby to willfully and with malice aforethought to kill and murder the said Margery Cockcroft, all of which is contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The commitment is in the following words, the same being indorsed on the back of the complaint:

"It appearing to me that the offense of assault with intent to commit murder as charged in the within complaint has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within named Albert Tinnen charged as John Doe in the within complaint is guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer the same, and committed to the sheriff of the county of Tehama, and that he be admitted to bail in the sum of $5,000, and he is committed to the sheriff of Tehama County, until he give such bail."

[1-3] It will be observed that the complaint or deposition charges the crime of administering poison to one Margery Cockcroft with the intent to "kill and murder" said Margery Cockcroft. This is substantially in the language of section 216 of the Penal Code. The word "murder," it is true, is not in the section, and it is wholly unnecessary to use that word in charging the offense, but if used even in an indictment or an information, it could not change the offense from that denounced by section 216 to that of assault with the intent to commit murder if the accusatory pleading otherwise charged the offense defined by section 216. The commitment, however, specifically declared that the accused was held for trial for the crime charged in the "within complaint." This was sufficient as a commitment for the crime so charged. The words in the commitment immediately preceding that language, to wit, "assault with intent to commit murder," merely involved an ineffectual or a futile attempt on the part of the magistrate to characterize generically the character or nature of the crime charged in the complaint, and for which he had committed the accused. If a complaint or deposition filed before a magistrate were to charge, in legally appropriate language, a person with murder, and, that crime having been shown, the magistrate should in his commitment state, "It appearing to me that the crime of assault with intent to commit murder has been committed, as charged in the within complaint," etc., no one would for a moment contend that the commitment was not for murder, and that the erroneous designation in the commitment by the magistrate of the crime so charged would control or modify the general words indicating the crime for which the accused was held or justify the conclusion that the commitment was not for the crime specifically charged in the complaint on which the commitment was indorsed. The commitment and the so-called complaint on which it is indorsed must be read together to ascertain for what offense the accused is committed where the commitment itself does not attempt to define the crime for which the accused is held, but merely in general language states that the accused is held for the crime as it is charged in the complaint. In other words, in such case, the complaint itself becomes an essential part of the commitment, and necessarily we must look to the complaint to ascertain for what specific offense the accused has been committed. The information in this case is, as the counsel for the defendant concedes, substantially in the language of the complaint or deposition, on the back of which the order of commitment is indorsed. It, therefore, follows that, since the said complaint is made a part of the commitment or is by virtue of the language of the order of commitment an essential part thereof, the information sets forth the crime for which the defendant was committed.

It is next contended that the information does not state the offense defined by section 216 of the Penal Code, and that, therefore, it was error to overrule the demurrer thereto. It is further contended, in this connection, that the information is ambiguous and uncertain in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether therein it is sought to charge the crime defined by section 216 or that defined by section 217 of the Penal Code.

[4, 5] The attack upon the information on the general ground is based upon the proposition that that pleading fails or omits to state that death was not caused by the alleged act of administering poison to the complaining witness. There can be no doubt that the crime denounced by section 216 would not be committed if death followed from and as a result of the act of administering the poison as indicated by said section, and that the charge, when set up against a person in an indictment or an information, should, to state the offense as accurately as the statute describes it, allege that the act of administering the poison had not or did not cause death. But we think that, notwithstanding the failure to allege that fact, the information here nevertheless sufficiently shows that it was founded on section 216, and that it was not the intention therein to charge the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, as defined by section 217. In charging the last-named offense, it is not requisite to allege that death has not followed the assault as a result thereof. The mere allegation that the assault was made with the intent to kill and murder the assaulted person has always been held sufficient to state the offense, the very language of the accusatory pleading being itself sufficient to show by necessary implication that the death was not produced by the assault. And so in the case of an indictment or an information charging the offense defined by section 216, where there has been an omission to allege that the act of administering the poison did not cause death. The very statement that the poison was administered "with the intent to kill" the person to whom the poison was administered would of necessity imply that death was not caused by or was not the result of the act of administering the poison as so charged. The information here does not specifically charge an assault. It follows the language of section 216, except that it alleges that the poison was administered with the intent to kill "and murder" Margery Cockcroft, the words, "and murder," not being used in the section. The information could not well or reasonably be construed as attempting to charge the crime of assault with intent to commit murder as defined by section 217, because, as shown, the word "assault" is not therein used. To have stated the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, it would have been necessary to use the word "assault," but unnecessary to use the words "administer a certain poison," unless the act of administering the poison was itself committed in such manner as to have constituted it an assault.

[6] In thus construing the information, we have not been unmindful of the rule that sufficient facts must be directly alleged in a criminal pleading from which it can be determined upon inspecting or examining it that the acts complained of are wrongful and unlawful, and that, in construing an indictment or an information, nothing must be left to implication, intendment, or conclusion. None but ultimate facts are to be pleaded in such a pleading, a rule which applies to all kinds of pleading, whether criminal or civil, but when ultimate facts are alleged in an indictment or an information from which but one conclusion can follow, and which conclusion irresistibly follows from the facts so alleged, it is not in violation of the rule above stated if the conclusion is not expressly or directly alleged. Where the averment in a criminal pleading is that a certain named human being was killed and murdered by the accused, it is not necessary to allege the obvious fact following from such averment that the person so killed and murdered had died, as the result of being killed and murdered. As we have pointed out, where an indictment charges that a person has assaulted another with the intent to kill and murder the latter, the obvious fact follows that death did not follow from said assault as a result thereof. This is the only conclusion that could logically follow from such an averment; hence it is not necessary to allege that the intent to murder was not fully carried out. But, without further discussion or illustration of our position, we feel well justified in concluding that the information in the present case states the offense defined by section 216 of the Penal Code in such manner as to render it reasonably free from the objections urged against it on either the general or special grounds specified in the demurrer.

[7] It is complained that errors were committed by the trial court in its action disallowing challenges of Jurors Greiner and Wilcox for cause or implied bias. While an examination of the answers returned by those persons to questions propounded to them on their voir dire examination touching their qualifications to serve as jurors in the case has convinced us that the rulings of the court denying the challenges could not be disturbed on the ground that either of the jurors was disqualified to sit in the case by reason of having read about and discussed the case with other persons prior to the date of the trial, still a conclusive reply to the contention that the court erred in the instances named is that, at the time said challenges were interposed, the defendant still had left to him two peremptory challenges, by means of which he could have removed from the jury box both of the jurors named. The record shows that the defendant used one of the two peremptory challenges on Greiner and retained or accepted Wilcox. It is the settled rule that errors committed in overruling challenges for cause are not grounds of reversal, unless it be shown that an objectionable juror has been forced upon the challenging party after he had exhausted his peremptory challenges. In other words, "if his peremptory challenges remain unexhausted, so that he might have excluded the objectionable juror by that means he has no ground of complaint." Thompson on Trials, § 120; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 196, 48 Pac. 78. Indeed, the rule has even been extended further than as restricted by Judge Thompson, for, referring to the rule as it has just been stated, the Supreme Court, in People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 577, 119 Pac. 920, 921, by Chief Justice Angellotti, says:

"It is true that in People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 196, 48 Pac. 78, the defendant had not exhausted his peremptory challenges when the jury was completed, but the fact that he does exhaust them does not preclude the application of the rule above quoted. The important thing is that it does not appear that an objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant."

Here it is not shown that an objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant. Indeed, the contrary is affirmatively made to appear, since he had the opportunity of excusing Wilcox, as he had excused Greiner, but did not take advantage of that opportunity. We must presume, therefore, that Wilcox was perfectly satisfactory to him. At any rate, we cannot, after judgment, presume to the contrary. People v. Schafer, supra.

[8] The contention that the verdict is without sufficient support from the evidence cannot be sustained. There is no necessity for an extended review herein of the evidence to show this. It will suffice to state the facts briefly and in a general way.

In August, 1918, Mrs. Helen Kincaid, mother of the complaining witness, residing in Corning, and another daughter, Helen S. Kincaid, residing in the city of San Francisco, died in Corning, leaving estate, of which she disposed by will, in and by which she left the larger part thereof to Mrs. Cockcroft. Helen S. Kincaid, the other daughter, instituted proceedings in the superior court of Tehama county contesting the probate of the will, and the trial of the contest was set down for trial on the 6th day of February, 1918. The ground upon which the probate of the will was thus resisted was that the testatrix was induced to execute the testament through undue influence practiced upon her by her daughter, Mrs. Cockcroft, the complaining witness in this case.

On the 5th day of February, 1918, the defendant appeared at a hotel in Corning. It is not necessary to go into details with regard to his movements from the time he arrived in Corning until the crime charged against him was committed on the day following that of his appearance in said town, evidence as to said movements going only to his identity and his presence in Corning when the alleged offense was committed, and we will therefore take up the immediate circumstances of the alleged crime as they were given by Mrs. Cockcroft, who testified for the people as follows, summarizing her testimony: That on the morning of the 6th of February, 1918, the defendant appeared at her residence. She was alone in the house at this time, her husband, engaged in the garage business in Corning, being then at his place of business. The defendant had sounded the doorbell, and Mrs. Cockcroft responded, and, opening the door, she was confronted and asked by defendant if she was Miss Kincaid, to which she replied that she was now Mrs. Cockcroft. The defendant then stated that he was the fiancé of Miss Helen S. Kincaid, Mrs. Cockcroft's sister; that he was one of the latter's attorneys in the will contest, and that he had "come to" Corning to talk to her (Mrs. Cockcroft) about the case. The latter at first said that she did not desire to talk about the case, but he was insistent, and she then said, "I will talk with you to-morrow," she desiring to arrange to have some other person present at the interview. Defendant replied, "There will be no to-morrow," whereupon Mrs. Cockcroft said, "I will go to the telephone and phone my husband," and he replied: "No, you don't need to." She thereupon started towards the telephone, which was in an adjoining room, and the defendant followed and ran up behind her and placed his hands around her neck, at the same time saying, "Now, I have got you at last." He then placed his handkerchief, saturated with chloroform, over her nose and mouth, and a struggle between them thereupon ensued. The placing of his handkerchief over and about her face did not appear to work as effectually as he desired and he emptied a bottle filled with chloroform on her face. Mrs. Cockcroft tried to call for help while the struggle was in progress, but without result. She was finally rendered unconscious. This struggle, it will be noted, occurred in the front room of the house. When she regained consciousness, which was about an hour after the act of chloroforming was committed, as above explained, she was lying prone upon the floor with a handkerchief over her face, in the kitchen, her head lying near the kitchen stove, which at the time had a very hot fire in it. The chloroform had burned her eyes and face, and she found herself very weak. A short while after recovering consciousness, however, she succeeded in gathering enough strength to go to the telephone and call her husband. Upon the latter's arrival at his house and his discovery of his wife's condition, he called Dr. Case, a physician of Corning, who immediately went to the Cockcroft home and treated Mrs. Cockcroft. The doctor testified that when he first saw Mrs. Cockcroft her face bore a deathly pallor, and that she was very weak. He also testified that he detected the odor of chloroform on her person. The doctor testified that her condition, when he first saw her, was very serious; that her face was swollen and her heart beating "more than 120 to the minute."

The doctor testified that the use of chloroform may be fatal, and that the chances for its being fatal are increased where one to whom it has been administered is placed near a stove with a fire in it.

The above is a sufficient statement of the evidence to show that, so far as the crime charged is concerned, the verdict is thus so far supported as that this court is precluded from holding, as a matter of law, that it is not sufficiently buttressed by probative facts. As to the proof of the commission of the act by the defendant, it is to be remarked that, in addition to the testimony of Mrs. Cockcroft, who positively identified the accused as the man who committed the act, there is the testimony of other witnesses who recognized or identified the defendant as a person they saw in Corning at the time the crime was committed, one witness testifying that, in the early morning of the day on which the crime was committed, he called at her house and inquired whether she (the witness) knew a Miss Helen Kincaid, and where said Miss Kincaid resided in Corning. There were many circumstances proved which strongly tended to show that the defendant was Mrs. Cockcroft's assailant.

[9-12] It is lastly contended that the court committed prejudicial errors in the giving and the disallowance of certain instructions. In the brief of counsel for the defendant it is stated that the court, in one of the instructions (No. 2), took from the jury the determination of the question whether chloroform was a poison. It is further contended that instructions Nos. 2 and 9 are contradictory of each other. The criticisms of the court's charge in the particulars stated are without force or merit. The initial portion of instruction No. 2 merely involves a statement of the facts set forth in the information upon which the defendant was tried. By instruction No. 9, the jury were told that—"If you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did * * * administer chloroform to one Margery Cockcroft by causing her to inhale the same, with the intent to kill said Margery Cockcroft, and that chloroform is a poison, then I instruct you that it is your duty to find a verdict of guilty against the defendant."

Thus it will be observed that the court directly and in unmistakable language declared to the jury that whether chloroform was a poison was a question for them to determine. But counsel in another particular attacks instruction No. 9, and declares it to be unsound because, as is the claim, the mere causing of one to "inhale" a poison is not to "administer" poison to another, within the meaning of the term "administer" as it is used in section 216. The argument is that the actual entrance of the poison into the stomach must be shown. Some authorities are cited to support this proposition, but we have not taken the pains to examine them. We do not think the point possesses the slightest merit in so far as this case is concerned. There are certain kinds of poison which, of course, must be taken into the stomach to work fatal or serious results. The mere inhalation through the nostrils of strychnine, for instance, would not produce death or any serious derangement of the vital organs of the human body. We know as a matter of very common knowledge that there are narcotics which, through the process of inhalation, will produce sleep or a morbid condition of the nervous system and which, in certain doses, will produce death. From Dr. Case's description of chloroform it is clear that chloroform is such a narcotic, and therefore it was not necessary to instruct the jury in this case that they were required to trace the action of the chloroform in its effect upon specific organs of the body or the channels into or through which it was necessary for it to pass to produce unconsciousness or death. If the evidence showed, as it does tend to show, that the chloroform was given to Mrs. Cockcroft in the usual mode of giving that narcotic, then it was "administered" to her by the defendant within the meaning of that word as it is used in the statute.

[13] The complaint that the court erred in refusing to give defendant's requested instruction to the effect that the fact that the accused did not take the witness stand in his own behalf could not be considered by the jury as a circumstance against him is without just cause. The defendant did not become a witness in the case, and the court, in instruction No. 7, instructed the jury upon that fact substantially in the language of the instruction requested by the defendant, but disallowed by the court.

The record discloses no justification for the conclusion that the defendant was not given a fair and legal trial or was not justly convicted.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [14] We are not satisfied with the statement of the District Court of Appeal substantially to the effect that the record does not show that a juror objectionable to defendant was not forced on him. He did exhaust his peremptories, and Juror Wilcox remained on the jury. If he had peremptorily excused Wilcox, he could not have excused the last juror peremptorily challenged. But, as is held by the District Court of Appeal, there was no error in disallowing the challenge for actual bias to Juror Wilcox.

The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is denied.

All concur.

MULVILLE v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al.
(L. A. 5565.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸57—Municipality can act beyond boundaries only when empowered.

A municipality is competent to act beyond its boundaries only in cases in which it is so empowered by the Legislature, either expressly or by necessary and fair implication, which rule applies in determining whether or not bonds of an improvement district may be issued for expenditure of the proceeds outside of the district.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸277 — Improvement statute denies power to district to construct improvement beyond its boundaries; "therein" defined.

St. 1915, p. 99, providing for the formation of districts within municipalities for the acquisition or construction of public improvements "therein," denies power to construct or acquire such an improvement beyond the boundaries of the district, "therein" meaning in that place.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Therein.]

3. Statutes ⟸184—Act must be construed by attributing ordinary sense to words used.

Intent of the Legislature must be determined primarily by attributing the ordinary and popular sense to the words of the statute, where they are free from ambiguity, and the result is not absurd, though it appears probable that a different object was in the mind of the Legislature.

4. Statutes ⟸174, 175—Liberal construction does not mean enlargement of plain provisions.

Liberal construction of a statute does not mean enlargement of its plain provisions.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸450(1)—Grant of power to form improvement district closely construed.

Grant of power to municipality to form within it an improvement district, which is nothing more than a taxing district, being a delegation of control of assessment proceedings, must be closely construed, as the power of special taxation is restricted to the plain language of the statute.

Olney, Lawlor, and Sloane, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Martin Mulville against the City of San Diego and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for appellant.

T. B. Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, and M. R. Thorp, of San Diego, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff, as a resident, voter and taxpayer in municipal improvement district No. 1, of the city of San Diego, instituted this action for the purpose of enjoining the issuance and sale of certain bonds of said improvement district and of having all proceedings in relation to the organization of the district and the issuance of the bonds canceled and declared null and void.

Proceeding under the provisions of chapter 79 of the statutes of California of 1915, the common council of the city of San Diego organized the district above referred to and the qualified electors therein voted to authorize, and the city council proceeded to issue and sell, bonds of said district to the amount of $125,000 for the purpose of paying the costs and expenses of the acquisition and construction of certain improvements. These certain contemplated improvements are to be located on the water front of the city of San Diego and a large portion of them will, when constructed, be situated outside of the described boundaries of municipal improvement district No. 1. According to the findings of the trial court the improvements in question consist of a pleasure pier and loose rock jetty, each lying within the exterior boundaries of the district for a distance of about 50 feet and extending approximately 750 feet beyond the exterior boundary lines of said district; a second loose rock jetty, 100 feet of which will be located within and 1,900 feet without the said exterior boundary lines; eight groins, all of which will commence at the exterior boundary lines of the improvement district and lie entirely outside of said exterior boundary lines; and certain other improvements located wholly within the district. The trial court rendered a judgment holding the proceedings and issuance of the bonds to be valid and according to law, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

The first question to be determined is whether improvements must be physically within the boundaries of the improvement district which assumes the indebtedness for the construction thereof, or whether such public works may be situated partially or wholly outside of the exterior boundary lines of the district, provided that, as the trial court found to be the case here, the benefits to result from said improvements accrue wholly or principally to the district or the property within said district.

In support of the judgment, counsel for respondent cite cases illustrative of the principle that a particular structure is not transformed and deprived of its "public" or "municipal" character merely by reason of the fact that it is constructed outside of the boundary lines of the municipality which it benefits. People v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 475; In re Mayor, 99 N. Y. 569, 2 N. E. 642. Such cases are inapplicable to the case at bar, for the public nature of the improvements in question here is not in dispute. The mere fact that a structure erected outside of a municipal improvement district may be a "public improvement" is not determinative of the question of the existence of the power to form such a district for the purpose of raising funds for the erection of such a "public improvement" outside of the district. That is to say, while it is not and cannot be questioned that an amusement pier is an improvement of a public nature, nevertheless, the point is made that, obviously, there must be some limit beyond which a municipal improvement district cannot acquire or construct improvements, however public the improvements may be, and if the operations of such district are restricted by law to the territory within the described boundaries of the district, then such a district, whether bordering on the sea or not, cannot be formed for the acquisition, construction, or maintenance of those public improvements which are of such a character that they must, by their very nature, extend beyond the physical area of the district.

[1] In general, a municipality is competent to act beyond its boundaries only in those cases in which it is so empowered by legislative authority, and it is necessary, in passing upon the validity of acts of a municipality performed beyond its boundaries, to look to the general laws and municipal charter for the requisite authority. In certain instances, owing to the urgency of extreme expediency or necessity, express authority is dispensed with and the power of the municipality to perform certain acts beyond its boundary is implied as incidental to the existence of other powers expressly granted. Thus, it has been held that, where a municipality has power to construct sewers, it may, as an implied incident to such power, extend the same beyond its boundaries when necessary or manifestly desirable. McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 Pac. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; City of Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 474; Cochran v. Village of Park Ridge, 138 Ill. 295, 27 N. E. 939; McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 4, § 1434. McQuillin, in his work on Municipal Corporations, states the rule as follows:

"The general rule is that without legislative grant the authority of the municipal corporation is confined to its own area; hence its acts and ordinances have no force beyond its corporate limits. Thus, in the absence of such grant the municipality cannot open a street, repair a highway, grade an avenue, or aid in the construction of a plank road or bridge beyond its boundaries. Sometimes authority to act outside of the municipal boundaries may be implied on the ground of necessity, as, for example, to obtain outlets for sewers and drains. * * * Likewise a municipality, possessing power to supply its inhabitants with water, may acquire for that purpose a water supply without its territory. Certain municipalities have been held to be authorized to supply light and water to points beyond their limits." McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 4, § 1824.

Therefore, in a case of a municipality, power to act outside of the boundaries of the municipality is dependent entirely upon legislative grant; it does not exist unless expressly granted, necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted, or essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 587, 84 Pac. 41; South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 579, 590, 93 Pac. 490. By analogy the same rule applies in determining whether or not bonds of a municipal improvement district may be issued, the proceeds of which are to be used in the construction of public works outside of the boundaries of the district.

The proceedings attacked in the instant case were taken under a statute (Stats. 1915, c. 79, p. 99) entitled "An act to provide for the formation of districts within municipalities for the acquisition or constructon of public improvements, works and public utilities therein; for the issuance, sale and payment of bonds of such districts to meet the cost of such improvements; and for the acquisition or construction of such improvements." Section 1 of this act provides:

"Any portion of a municipality incorporated under the laws of this state may be formed into a municipal improvement district for the purpose of creating an indebtedness, to be represented by bonds of said district, the proceeds from the sale of which shall be used for the acquisition or construction therein of any public improvement work or public utility which such municipality is authorized by law to acquire or construct."

Section 2 of the same act provides that the ordinance of intention, required by the act, shall contain, in addition to other information, a description of the exterior boundaries of the proposed municipal improvement district, and "a general description of the improvement work or public utility proposed to be acquired or constructed therein." (Italics ours.)

[2, 3] The statute does not expressly grant the power to form an improvement district for the purpose of erecting or acquiring public works or utilities outside of the district, nor does the construction of a pleasure pier come within the rule applicable to the construction of outlets for sewers or sources of supply of light and water, for it cannot be classified as a matter of necessity or extreme expediency. We are of the opinion that the statute in question goes further and, in effect, denies the power to construct or acquire such an improvement beyond the boundaries of the district, thus preventing the application of the doctrine of implied power to act beyond those boundaries, assuming that that doctrine could be extended to improvements of the nature here contemplated. In construing a legislative enactment the intent of the Legislature must be determined primarily by attributing the ordinary and popular sense to the words of the statute where they are free from ambiguity and the result is not absurd, and this must be done even though it appear probable that a different object was in the mind of the Legislature. Eureka v. Diaz, 89 Cal. 467, 469, 26 Pac. 961; Smith v. Union Oil Co., 166 Cal. 217, 224, 135 Pac. 966; Sacramento v. Glann, 14 Cal. App. 780, 789, 113 Pac. 360.

[4] A liberal construction does not mean enlargement of the plain provisions of the law. In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 419, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 6 L. R. A. 594. It is clear that the words "public improvement work" and "public utility" as used in the statute do not refer to intangible benefits to be derived from a public work, but they obviously designate a material structure which is to be constructed or acquired. The act thrice mentions that these public works or utilities are to be "therein," the accepted meaning of which is "in that place" (Webster's Dictionary; Standard Dictionary), and this word appears in such context as to compel the conclusion that the "place" to which it refers is the improvement district provided for by the act. The term "therein" was judicially interpreted in the case of In re Streets and Alleys in Borough of Parkersburg, 124 Pa. 511, 17 Atl. 27, where a general borough law gave the authorities of the boroughs power to enact and ordain streets and alleys "therein." The court there said:

"By streets, alleys, etc., 'therein,' is meant such only as begin and end within the limits of the municipality. This exclusive provision does not extend to public roads, laid out through or to a point within the limits of a borough, of which only a part is within the borough lines."

The statute now under consideration therefore provides that an improvement district can be formed for the construction or acquisition of public works or utilities within the limits of the district, that is to say, which begin and end within the boundaries of the district. A structure physically without the district, in whole or in part, may be an improvement thereto, but it is not an improvement therein.

[5] Our conviction of the correctness of the above construction is reinforced by the fact that we are not dealing with a municipality or quasi public corporation, for the municipal improvement district authorized by the statute is nothing more than a taxing district within a municipality. The power of a municipality, to form such a district arises solely from the legislative grant. This grant, being a delegation to municipalities of control over local assessment proceedings, must be closely construed, for it is well settled that the power of special taxation is restricted to and can extend no further than the plain language of the legislative enactment upon which it is based. In re Unger, 22 Okl. 755, 98 Pac. 999, 132 Am. St. Rep. 670; Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 84 Pac. 41; McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 5, § 2052. The necessity of firmness and strictness on the part of the judiciary in cases involving the exercise of the power of special taxation was expressed as follows in the case of Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352, 364 (8 Am. Rep. 255):

"The examination I have just made into the power of special taxation, it seems to me, tends to confirm and strengthen what was so well reasoned in Hammett v. City [65 Pa. St. 146]. Indeed I consider it a fortunate circumstance that that case came up, for it led to an inquiry into the power of special taxation, which was in danger of running wild by insensible degrees, and leading, before we had become aware of it, into the exercise of a bastard power, dangerous to the right of private property, and violative of the provisions in the Bill of Rights, placed there for its protection. In questions of power exercised by agents, it is sometimes the misfortune of communities to be carried, step by step, into the exercise of illegitimate powers without perceiving the progression, until the usurpations become so firmly fixed by precedents, it seems to be impossible to recede or to break through them."

The case of Moulton v. Parks, 64 Cal. 166, 30 Pac. 613, affords a good illustration of the rule of strict construction which must be applied to legislative enactments permitting proceedings which are in their nature in invitum. In that case the act under consideration was "an act to provide for the protection of certain lands in the county of Sutter from overflow," and by its terms it conferred power on the board of supervisors of the county of Sutter to establish levee districts within that county. The act also provided that the board of supervisors of Sutter county were authorized to adopt a plan for the protection of any levee district created under the act. In construing the act the court said:

"The power to adopt a plan is not in terms limited to the adoption of a plan which shall provide for the construction of levees or other works only within Sutter county, nor is the power conferred upon the board to contract for the construction of levees without the county, unless such power is conferred by the general terms of the grant. * * * The eighth section of the act empowers the board to take possession of any land within the district that may be necessary for any levee or work of reclamation. It also empowers the board to take possession of any land outside the district and within the county that may be necessary or proper to furnish material for the construction of a levee, or other work of protection, within a district. * * * The act imposes the duty of keeping the levees and other works in repair, and of levying and collecting taxes upon all the property within the district for the purpose of raising funds to keep them in repair. If the supervisors of Sutter have power to cause to be erected and kept in repair a levee, or part of a levee, in Colusa, they have power to erect and keep in repair levees, all but one of which shall be in other counties than Sutter. * * * Our conclusion is that the officers of the county of Sutter had no power to cause a levee to be built in the county of Colusa."

It has been suggested that in the instant case the authority conferred by the act to establish an amusement pier within the designated district is but an idle grant of power in that respect if the pier must be constructed wholly within the district. In other words, that no effective plan for the establishment of an amusement pier could be put into operation and effect which did not provide for the construction of such a pier beyond and outside the limits of the improvement district. The answer to this suggestion is found in the case of Moulton v. Parks, supra, where it was said:

"It may be that, in the opinion of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, no efficient plan for the protection of levee district No. 5 could be carried into effect which did not provide for the construction of a levee outside of the district and outside of the county, and it may be argued that such a condition of things must have been anticipated by the members of the Legislature, when the general power of adopting plans, and constructing works in accordance therewith, was given to the board. But the board of supervisors of Sutter county had the right to employ only such power, with respect to the adoption of plans and construction of works, as was conferred by the act of the Legislature, and in inquiring whether the grant is limited we should consider as well the whole act as the nature of the official powers, under the Constitutions and laws, of the supervisors, as legislative and executive public agents."

It is quite conceivable that, in the instant case, the Legislature, in placing a new method of local improvement assessment within the field of municipal control, intended the restriction as to the location of the improvements as a precautionary limitation upon the delegation of the taxing power. At any rate, whatever the legislative purpose, it is apparent that the formation of a district and issuance and sale of bonds thereof with the purpose of using the proceeds for the construction of public works outside of the boundaries of the district is a proceeding wholly without the terms of the statute embodying the legislative grant.

Appellant also contends that the city of San Diego itself lacks the power to construct a pleasure pier in the Pacific Ocean at the particular point where the improvements now in question were to be constructed. The argument is therefore advanced that the proceedings are invalid for the further reason that the statute permits the organization of a municipal improvement district for the purpose of the acquisition or construction of only such improvements as the municipality itself is authorized by law to acquire or construct. Inasmuch as we hold that there was no authority to organize the district for the purpose of constructing public works outside of the district, it is unnecessary to determine the question of whether or not the city itself has power to construct the improvements.

In view of the fact that by far the greater part of the improvements (i. e., over nine-tenths of the pleasure pier and loose rock jetties and all the eight groins) would lie outside of the boundaries of the improvement district, the relief prayed for must be granted, because, as we hold, the act provides for and permits only such public improvements as may be constructed wholly within the district.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; WILBUR, J.; SHAW, J.

OLNEY, J. (dissenting). I dissent. The facts are that a part of the city of San Diego bordering on the ocean was organized into a municipal improvement district. The city was authorized by statute to issue bonds of the district for the purpose of supplying the funds with which to construct "therein" an improvement of the character of that involved here, to wit, a wharf or pier. The city sought to issue bonds of the district for the purpose of making this improvement, and its action is now nullified solely because the pier projects out into the ocean beyond the legal boundary of the improvement district, so that it is not physically wholly "therein" with respect to the district. I cannot agree with such a narrow and absolutely literal construction of the statute. The main opinion concedes that if the improvement had been a sewer instead of a pier it might have projected without the limits of the district, into the ocean, for instance, and still would have been an improvement within the district within the meaning of the statute. Why the difference?

In Cochran v. Village of Park Ridge, 138 Ill. 295, 300, 27 N. E. 939, 940, the court, in overruling the objection to a village constructing a sewer extending beyond its limits, said:

"But what is the object and true scope of the improvement under consideration? Is it one within or outside of the incorporated limits of the village? The object was to furnish sewerage for the inhabitants of the village. The improvement was for the benefit of those residing within the incorporated limits of the village, and for them alone. But in order to make the sewer a success, in order to make the improvement of any benefit to any person in the village, it must have an outlet. No outlet could be found within the incorporated limits. It became, therefore, absolutely necessary to extend the sewer a short distance outside of the incorporated limits in order to allow an outlet. In order to carry out the true scope and object of the ordinance providing for the improvement, it became necessary to expend money outside of the incorporated limits of the village. But it does not follow because that is the case that the assessment here is made for an improvement outside of the village. The construction of the sewer from the incorporated limits of the village to the Desplaines river is not an improvement in that territory, but is one for the village, rendered a necessity from the geographical condition of the land upon which the village is located."

The construction of the pier from the dry land within the district out into the ocean is not an improvement of the ocean or the land beneath it, but is one for the district, and is one whose projection beyond the shore line which is the legal limit of the district is necessary if its object is to be accomplished and if it is to be of any benefit to the district. In every sense but a most technical one, a pier or wharf projecting out into the ocean over no man's land is a part of and within the territory on the shore from which it starts.

The main opinion proceeds on the hypothesis that if the legal limits of the district had been extended out into the ocean to or beyond the end of the pier, the proceedings under attack would have been valid. But requiring the limits of the district to be so extended is a wholly futile thing. The district is in effect nothing more than an assessment district. The extension of its limits out into the ocean would mean merely the inclusion within the district of lands beneath the ocean, belonging to the state and incapable of private ownership, and upon which no assessment could by any possibility be laid. For the purposes of assessment, and that is the real purpose of the district, the situation would not be changed one iota by the inclusion of these lands.

LAWLOR, J. (dissenting). I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice OLNEY. It is not to be questioned that within the purview of the act a district bordering on the ocean may be formed for an amusement pier. Manifestly, the authority to create such an improvement is barren if the structure may not project beyond the shore line, provided, of course, it be limited to the boundaries of the city of San Diego. Stats. 1889, p. 644. The fact that the pier is erected over the water instead of above the shore line would not, in any true sense, constitute an additional burden on the taxpayers. It would be more in keeping with the legislation to connote the term "therein" according to the character of the particular improvement so that in such a case as this, or of sewers or water supply systems, it may extend beyond, and in the case of streets, alleys, parks, museums, auditoriums, or the like, be confined to the physical area of the district.

SLOANE, J. (dissenting). I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice OLNEY. The only point in dispute is as to the power of the district to vote bonds for an improvement that is not wholly confined in its physical location within the boundaries of the district. The right of this district to incur an indebtedness for a pleasure pier within its boundaries is not disputed. It appears from the record that in order to project this pier beyond the dry sands of the beach it was necessary to extend it into the ocean beyond the district boundaries. This extension is not upon other taxable territory, but into the tidewaters held in trust by the state for just such uses. For all beneficial purposes and use and control it is within the prescribed territory. It is conceded that in the construction of a sewer by such a municipal district the outlet might be lawfully carried to such a distance beyond the corporate boundaries as the necessities of its use requires. This case presents no difference in principle. The extension of the wharf beyond the boundary of the district is absolutely essential to any beneficial purpose for which it is intended. The limitation of the statute applies as much to the one improvement as the other, and the courts may not draw a distinction upon their own estimate of the relative importance of sewers and pleasure piers.

VAN NOSTRAND et al. v. COLLINS et al. (S. F. 9600.)

Elections ⟸173 — Majority candidates not entitled to be segregated on ballot.

Under Direct Primary Act, § 23, providing that the number of majority candidates, if less than the number of persons to be elected to the office, together with additional names of other candidates equal to twice the difference between the number of majority candidates and the number to be elected, shall be printed on the ballot, the majority candidates are not entitled to be segregated as such candidates on the ballot.

In Bank.

Application by John J. Van Nostrand and others against Charles J. Collins and others for writ of mandate against the respondents as the board of election commissioners and registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco, requiring them to segregate as majority candidates the names of petitioners on ballot. Writ denied.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

I. Harris, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The language of the Direct Primary Act (St. 1913, p. 1379) material on this application (section 23) is such as, beyond any question whatever, to sustain the position of the board of election commissioners and registrar. It is declared that—

"If the number of such 'majority candidates' falls short of the number of persons to be elected to such office, the names of said 'majority candidates' shall be printed on the ballot at the ensuing November election, together with such number of additional names only of such other candidates receiving the next highest number of votes for nomination to such office as may make the number of such additional names equal to twice the difference between the number of such 'majority candidates' and the number to be elected, or a smaller number, if the list of said other candidates is exhausted." (Italics are ours.)

The language is clear and unambiguous, and the courts, as well as the respondents, are bound thereby.

The application is denied.

PUCCINELLI v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 9606.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1920.)

Elections ⟸154(2) — Primary law confines contest to recount and excludes evidence of fraud.

Under Direct Primary Law, § 28, on contest of nomination for the Republican candidate for assemblyman, the court is limited to the recount of the ballots cast at the precincts as to which recount may be sought, and cannot receive evidence to sustain contestant's allegations of fraud and misconduct on the part of election officers and the reception of illegal votes.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Rinaldo Puccinelli against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Frank J. Murasky, Judge thereof, to compel respondents to receive certain evidence in an election contest. Application denied.

Leo R. Friedman, R. M. J. Armstrong, and Jos. O'Rourke, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon Samuels, Jos. Taaffe and Chas. McDonnell, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner, a candidate at the primary election of August 30, 1920, for the Republican nomination for assemblyman from the Thirty-third assembly district, instituted a contest of the nomination of one Badaracco as the Republican candidate for said office at said election, under the provisions of section 28 of the primary law. In addition to demanding a recount of all the Republican votes cast in the various precincts of said assembly district, he alleged many irregularities on the part of election officers in certain precincts, which he claims should cause the votes from the precincts to be excluded, and also that eight named persons, registered as voters in one of the precincts, were allowed to vote therein, although they were not then residents therein, and that they voted for Badaracco. The contest is now on trial in the superior court of San Francisco before Judge Murasky. The Republican ballots have all been recounted by the court, such count showing a majority of 43 votes for Badaracco. Thereupon petitioner sought to introduce evidence to sustain his allegations of fraud and misconduct on the part of election officers and the reception of illegal votes. The contestee objected to the introduction of any such evidence on the ground that such matters may not be inquired into in a contest under the direct primary law. The court sustained such objection. This is an application for mandate to compel the superior court to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered in support of his allegations of fraud and misconduct, and claim of illegal votes.

Assuming but not deciding that mandate will lie in such a situation, we are nevertheless of the opinion that the position of the learned judge of the trial court is correct. Section 28 of the direct primary law (St. 1913, p. 1409), the only provision of law relative to a contest of nomination, is, to our minds, entirely plain in this regard. It provides only for "a recount of the ballots cast" in the precincts as to which a recount may be sought. This is as far, apparently, as the Legislature saw fit to go in providing a judicial review of the returns of the election officers of a primary election, possibly deeming that in the brief time afforded for any review between the declaration of the result of the official canvass and the printing of the ballot for the general election a more extended inquiry would be impracticable. In any event, we think it clear that they so limited the subject-matter of the inquiry.

The application is denied.

MARCH v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al. (Sac. 3151.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 27, 1920.)

Elections ⟸126(1)—Names of candidates who received majority vote at primary only ones that may be printed on ballots.

Where there were three judges of the superior court of a county to be elected at a general election, and each of three of the candidates at the primary election received the votes of a majority of those participating, and no other candidate received a majority vote, the names of such three candidates are the only names of candidates for the office that may lawfully be printed on the ballot for the general election, under Direct Primary Law, § 23, excluding names of two other candidates whose names were printed on primary ballot and name of a write-in candidate, none of whom received majority vote.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by John C. March against the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County and Henry W. Hall, County Clerk of said County, to require respondent to place the name of petitioner on the ballot. Application denied.

Martin I. Welch, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petition shows that, there being three judges of the superior court of Sacramento county to be elected at the general election to be held November 2, 1920, each of three of the candidates for such office at the primary election held on August 30, 1920, received the votes of a majority of those participating in such primary election. No other candidate received a majority vote. This being the situation, the names of these three candidates are the only names of candidates for such office that may lawfully be printed on the ballot for the general election (section 23, Direct Primary Law [St. 1913, p. 1404]), with the result that the names of the other two candidates whose names were printed on the primary ballot and the name of petitioner, a "write-in" candidate not receiving a majority vote, may not be printed on such ballot.

The application is denied.

GARCIA v. CALIFORNIA TRUCK CO. (L. A. 5158.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1920.)

1. Pleading ⟸291(2)—Though due execution was admitted by failure to deny, other defenses available.

While the genuineness and due execution of a release annexed to defendant's answer was admitted by the failure of plaintiff to serve and file an affidavit denying the same, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 448, yet it was open to plaintiff on trial without further pleading to introduce evidence to sustain any legitimate defense, except want of genuineness or due execution.

2. Release ⟸24(2)—Release cannot be rescinded without return of amount paid.

Civ. Code, § 1691, requiring as a condition of rescission of contract the restoration of anything of value received thereunder, applies to a release for personal injuries claimed to have been obtained as a result of fraud, and in such case the party injured cannot retain the amounts paid and at the same time rescind the release; it not being void ab initio.

3. Release ⟸24(2) — Sums paid under rescinded release cannot be retained because of recovery of greater sum.

A sum paid as consideration for a release of a claim for personal injuries cannot be retained by the party injured, who at the same time sought on the ground of fraud to rescind the release, because he recovered a greater amount; the principle that a party is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain, having no application.

4. Release ⟸57(2)—Evidence held insufficient to show that release was procured by fraud.

In an action for personal injuries, where defendant relied on release, evidence held to show that the release not only was not void ab initio, but the evidence was insufficient to support finding that it was procured through the defendant's fraud; it appearing that defendant acted fairly throughout, making no misrepresentations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Felix Garcia against the California Truck Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles (Meserve & Meserve and Harold G. Ferguson, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

W. Ona Morton, of Los Angeles, and J. F. Moriarity, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This action was initiated April 19, 1915, by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff when, while upon a public street in Los Angeles on April 20, 1914, he was struck and run over by a horse belonging to defendant, which through defendant's alleged negligence was permitted to run away at large upon such street. In its answer, in addition to denying the allegations of the complaint as to negligence and damage, defendant set up an absolute release of "any and all causes of action, costs, charges, claims, or demands of whatever name or nature, in any way arising or growing out of" the accident, executed by plaintiff in writing on July 20, 1914, in consideration of the sum of $350 then paid to him by defendant. It was stated therein that it was intended to cover, not only all injuries or sickness occasioned by said accident of which plaintiff was then cognizant, but any sickness or injury which might thereafter develop, that the instrument had been read to him and translated from English into Spanish, his native language, and that he knew the contents thereof, and accepted the same "in compromise of my claim against said California Truck Company."

[1] The genuineness and due execution of this instrument, a copy thereof being annexed to the answer, was admitted by the failure of the plaintiff to serve and file an affidavit denying the same, as provided in section 448, Code of Civil Procedure. Under our system of pleading, it was, however, open to plaintiff on the trial, without further pleading, to introduce evidence to sustain any legitimate defense, except want of genuineness or due execution, to the new matter relative to the release set up in the answer. Baird v. Pacific Electric Railway Co. (App.) 179 Pac. 449. He did introduce evidence in support of a theory that the release was obtained by fraud. The trial court, finding against the release and in favor of plaintiff with regard to the allegations of injury from negligence of defendant, and that he had suffered damage in the sum of $1,510, also found that he had received from defendant $710 ($350 paid him upon the execution of the release and $360 theretofore paid him, partly in cash and partly for his care and maintenance while disabled), which it deducted from the amount of damage found, giving judgment for the balance, $800. This is an appeal by defendant from the judgment.

[2] The only questions upon this appeal are in relation to the contract of release, which, of course, unless avoided in some legitimate way, constitutes an insuperable bar to recovery in this action for damages for injuries caused by the negligence of defendant. At no time prior to the commencement of the action did plaintiff attempt to rescind this contract of release, and his complaint in this action for damage for the original tort was altogether silent regarding it. At no time has he restored or offered to restore to defendant any part of the consideration paid by defendant therefor, or attempted to show any reason why he should not be compelled to do this as a condition precedent to rescission. The claim of defendant is that plaintiff cannot maintain this action for damages in the absence of a rescission of the contract of release, and that the facts just stated are fatal to any claim of rescission. If there was a valid contract of release, it would seem, notwithstanding that it was voidable because the consent of the plaintiff thereto was obtained by a fraudulent representation, that rescission was essential to its extinguishment, and that there could be no rescission without restoration of the consideration. Our statute is explicit on the subject of rescission. Section 1691, Civil Code, provides that rescission of a contract, when not affected by consent, can be accomplished only by the use, on the part of the party rescinding, of reasonable diligence to comply with certain specified rules, one of which is that "he must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind," if free from duress, etc., and aware of his rights, and the other of which is stated as follows:

"He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract, or must offer to restore the same," etc.

We are aware of no good reason why this express statutory provision is not as fully applicable to a contract of release of claim for damages for personal injuries as to any other contract. Notwithstanding expressions in some of the many decisions on this question which might be taken as intimating a contrary view, an examination of the cases shows that this is generally accepted as true, especially in the presence of such a statutory provision as we have in this state. We are speaking, of course, of contracts of release that are not absolutely void from the beginning for illegality, or total want of competency to contract on the part of the party purporting to release, or any other cause warranting a conclusion that the purported contract was never an executed contract, but a mere "scrap of paper," without binding force, that could be entirely disregarded without any rescission. There are decisions in this state which include in the class of cases where recission is not essential a case where by fraud or deceit the party has been induced to execute a release of his cause of action upon the understanding and belief that the written instrument was a release of something other than the cause of action sued on, and that it was not a release of such cause of action.

Such was the situation in Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 58 Pac. 1042, where the plaintiff was so induced to execute for $25 a release of all claims on account of his injuries, being made by fraud to believe and believing that he was discharging only such claim as he might have for loss of time. It was held that in such a case "the contract * * * will be held to be what the maker of it intended it should be, and not what it was made to appear by the deception practiced," and that consequently there was no release of the cause of action involved in the action, which as the complaint was framed did not include any claim for loss of time, with the result that no rescission or restoration of the money received was essential. The plaintiff there, it was said, was "not attempting to avoid a contract which he has made, but is showing that he did not make the contract which he apparently made." In such a case the written instrument, in so far as it purports to release causes of action not understood by the party executing it to be included, is held to be void ab initio, and so to come within the class of cases where the doctrine of rescission and restoration has no application.

But the doctrine of Meyer v. Haas, supra, has no application where the party releasing thoroughly understood that the release he was executing was what it purports to be, a release of the very cause of action he seeks to enforce by action, notwithstanding a misconception on his part induced by fraud as to some other statements in the writing. In other words, if the situation is such that reforming the release to make it read as it would have read except for the fraud upon the plaintiff, the release would still purport to be a bar to the plaintiff's cause of action, then in order to maintain his action he must rescind and avoid the release, and for rescission an offer of restoration is necessary.

In the case at bar we have a lawful contract executed by competent parties, which at most is voidable only by reason of the party releasing and intending by the instrument to release all causes of action, having been induced to enter into the same by a fraudulent representation that the instrument contained a provision as to his employment by the defendant, which would have in no degree made the instrument anything other than an absolute release of all causes of action. Such is the case before us. We are saying this, notwithstanding the finding of the trial court on this subject, to which we shall refer later. In such a case the contract stands, unless extinguished in some mode allowed by law, and to accomplish a rescission thereof the statutory provisions relative to rescission must be complied with.

[3] It is claimed to be thoroughly settled that a party is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain. This is a well-recognized rule (see Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 739, 744, 82 Pac. 436, and cases there cited), but the difficulty is that it is not applicable under the facts of this case. As stated in the case of Kley v. Healy, 127 N. Y. 555, 561, 28 N. E. 593, 595, cited approvingly in Matteson v. Wagoner, supra, the rule is as follows:

"A more satisfactory answer, however, may be found in the principle that one who attempts to rescind a transaction on the ground of fraud is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain either by virtue of the contract sought to be set aside, or of the original liability."

The action was one for the rescission of a release of judgment given upon the payment of an amount smaller than that to which "she was concededly entitled" under the judgment. The court said:

"In any event, therefore, she had only that which, without dispute, belonged to her." (Italics are ours.)

This case well illustrates the meaning of the rule. The money received by the party belonged absolutely to her at the time of the commencement of the action, whether received as the consideration for the release of the judgment or retained as part payment on the original judgment. It was hers by right in either event. The situation was practically the same in Matteson v. Wagoner, supra, an action for the cancellation of certain notes and a mortgage given plaintiff and a recovery of the money loaned thereon, where, as shown by the opinion, if the plaintiffs failed in their action they would be entitled to retain the $165 paid as a payment of interest on the notes. The money was theirs at the commencement of the action in either event, received as interest on the notes if they failed, retained as partial restoration of the money loaned if they succeeded. In discussing this rule the Court of Appeals of Kentucky said in Fox v. Hudson, 150 Ky. 115, 150 S. W. 49, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 832:

"Where the claim is for unliquidated damages, or when the settlement is made to adjust a matter in dispute, or where there is a controversy as to the amount owing, and the parties agree upon a sum that shall be paid in settlement, the amount so paid must be returned, if the party settled with seeks to avoid the settlement on the ground of fraud. But when there is no dispute as to the sum due, and the creditor is induced by fraud to accept a less amount than his whole debt, he may attack the settlement without returning what he has received."

See, also, Brocklehurst, etc., Co. v. Marsch, 225 Mass. 3, 10, 113 N. E. 646.

These cases show the true meaning of the rule. In the case at bar the plaintiff originally had a claim for unliquidated damages for personal injuries. Solely in consideration of the settlement and release of this claim, which he now seeks to avoid, he received $350 from defendant. The simple rescission of the contract of release would leave him with a disputed claim for damages, and with no right whatever to retain this money paid him for an abandonment of all claim for damages. This was the situation at the time of the commencement of the action. The money paid was not his in any event, but was his only in the event that there had been a valid release of the claim for damages that he was then endeavoring to assert, and which would constitute a complete bar to his action. It seems clear to us that the rule relied on has no application to such a case as this, and that if in this case there was a voidable contract of release, as distinguished from a contract void ad initio, plaintiff could not avoid the same on the ground of fraudulent representations, without rescinding promptly upon the discovery of the fraud and restoring the money paid as a consideration.

[4] That the contract of release was at most a mere voidable contract on account of fraudulent representation, as distinguished from one void ab initio, seems to us to be beyond question in view of the evidence. The finding of the trial court was substantially to the effect that while the plaintiff, who was a Mexican and could neither read nor write English, signed this release, which was written in the English language, he was misled, tricked, and deceived by an interpreter in the employ of defendant into signing a contract different in its terms and object from the contract which he had made with defendant, and which he then understood he was executing, in that he was led to believe and did believe that the instrument contained an agreement on the part of defendant to employ him for the balance of his natural life at a wage of $2.50 per day, and further that plaintiff did not release or acquit or discharge defendant from or on account of any damage sustained. In view of what we have said, the finding as to the understanding of the plaintiff as to the contents of the instrument is not sufficient to warrant the absolute disregard of the contract of release as void ab initio.

However, after a most careful consideration of the record, we are satisfied that it must be held that the findings on the issue of release are without substantial support in the evidence. There is not even a shred of evidence to show that plaintiff was ever told, or ever believed or understood, that the contract of release contained any provision whatever for his employment by defendant, or that he was in the slightest degree deceived as to the contents of the instrument. Although examined as a witness on his own behalf at the trial, he gave no testimony whatever with relation to this agreement, or as to his understanding as to its contents. His wife, who was present at the execution, was not called as a witness. The son, a boy 13 years old at the time of the release, and whose testimony is the sole reliance of plaintiff in this regard, did not testify as to any misrepresentation being made as to the contents of the instrument. Even according to the boy's testimony, the question of the employment of plaintiff by defendant was a matter not intended to be specified in the contract of release, but was a mere promise of employment for life at $2.50, to be evidenced by a separate "receipt" or "guaranty." Except for the testimony of the boy, the evidence is overwhelming as to the fairness of the dealings of defendant with plaintiff in the matter of the settlement, negotiated at the solicitation of plaintiff several weeks after the accident, and at the office of defendant, to which place he went with his wife and son for the very purpose of effecting a settlement.

According to the testimony of all except the boy, the proposed release was fully read to plaintiff by an interpreter (deceased prior to the trial), who translated it into Spanish for him, and then given to the boy to explain to his father. The boy himself signed a statement, written by himself thereon, that he had read it to his father, but testified that he did not so read it, and wrote and signed the statement because he was told to do so. The boy's testimony as to the reading of the release by the interpreter to his father is exceedingly vague and indefinite, and admits that the interpreter did read "four or five lines," but not all. According to the other testimony, the matter of employment was not mentioned as a condition of the release at all, but after the release was signed the president of the defendant company, which had treated plaintiff with the utmost consideration and generosity from the time of the accident, told him he would give him employment, and had written and given him a paper saying:

"To Felix Garcia: We will put you to work as soon as you are physically able, either in our corral or on our San Fernando ranch.

"California Truck Company,
"By George S. Safford."

The boy's testimony was that this was given to his father before the execution of the release, on the father's request for a "receipt" or "guaranty" for work for life at $2.50 per day. The plaintiff did go to work for defendant for $2.25 per day, and continued in such employment for 6 weeks, when, a reduction in employés becoming necessary, he was discharged. Apparently he never demurred as to rate of wage or discharge until more than 7 months had elapsed from the date of his discharge, when this action for $51,000 damages was instituted. The evidence is such as to indicate very strongly that there was no promise of permanent employment, and, except for the boy's testimony, that there was no promise of employment as an inducement to the execution of the contract of release. However this may be, it is clear to us that there was no substantial testimony to sustain the findings we have referred to. Accepting the testimony of the boy in the light most favorable to plaintiff, we have at best a contract of release, the execution of which was induced by an independent promise of future permanent employment. As we have seen, such a contract cannot be treated as naught in the manner here attempted, and unless extinguished in some mode authorized by law it operates as a bar to plaintiff's action for damages. In so far as the record shows, it has not been so extinguished.

The judgment is reversed.

183 Cal. 757

BAILEY v. CITY OF HERMOSA BEACH et al. (L. A. 5393.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹269(1)—Carrying street across ravine authorized by Vrooman Act.

A street improvement, being for the purpose of carrying a street across a ravine, is authorized by the Vrooman Act, § 2, under the term "bridges in streets," and also any work deemed necessary to improve a street or any portion of it.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹304(2)—That improvement termed a "viaduct" instead of "bridge" immaterial.

So long as an improvement of a street ordered under Vrooman Act, § 2, was in fact a "bridge," it is immaterial that in the proceedings it was termed a "viaduct," which terms are almost exact equivalents.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bridge; Viaduct.]

3. Statutes ⟹181(2) — Construction permitting unjust working can be rejected only where doubtful.

The rule that rejection of a construction may be warranted by the fact that such construction would permit the statute to work unjustly is confined to the case of a statute of doubtful meaning, and does not apply to one of plain intent.

4. Appeal and error ⟹843(2)—Moot question as to bridge assessment not considered.

Where assessment for bridge extending street over ravine is according to benefits, the question whether the statute permits an assessment on a frontage basis, and, if so, is in that respect invalid, is moot.

5. Municipal corporations ⟹474—Omission of property not benefited does not invalidate assessment for street improvement.

An assessment according to benefits for a street improvement is not invalid because all the land in the assessment district is not assessed; such an assessment involving omission of property not benefited.

6. Municipal corporations ⟹437—Statute does not require railroad right of way to be assessed if not benefited.

Provision of the Vrooman Act that the right of way of a railroad within an assessment district shall be assessed in the same manner as other lands in the district merely requires that the land be not omitted because used for railroad right of way, and not that it be assessed, though not benefited.

7. Municipal corporations ⟹444—Assessment not invalidated by delay in filing affidavits of mailing of notices of resolution of intention.

Under Vrooman Act, § 3, requiring the city clerk to mail notices to landowners of resolution of intention to improve, and that their lands would be assessed therefor, and file affidavits of mailing, but providing that failure to mail them shall not invalidate the assessment, it is not invalidated by failure to seasonably file such affidavits where the notices are mailed.

8. Municipal corporations ⟹474—Assessment not invalidated by arrangement that railroad lands be not assessed.

Arrangement between a city and railroad company that a street improvement should be without expense to company does not invalidate assessment of other lands, where it does not have the effect of throwing onto them a portion of the expense which they should not bear, and so not where the company's lands were not benefited.

9. Municipal corporations ⟹519(2) — Assessment warrant held seasonably returned by contractor.

Assessment warrant is returned by contractor for street improvement within 30 days from date, as required by Vrooman Act, § 10, to preserve the lien where it is in fact returned in such time, but on its return, the question as to its original validity having arisen, it was redelivered to the contractor, and again returned by him within 30 days from the second delivery, though more than that time after the first delivery; it having been valid at least at the time of the second delivery.

10. Municipal corporations ⟹519(2)—Failure of return to show demand as to certain lots does not destroy lien as to other lots.

The return by the contractor for street improvement of the assessment warrant required by the Vrooman Act, § 10, to show the contractor's demand for payment, does not destroy the lien of the assessment as to lots for which it shows the demand made, because not showing it as to lots of others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Bruce C. Bailey against the City of Hermosa Beach and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. W. Phelps, Arthur M. Ellis, Crouch & Crouch, and Paul S. Honberger, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an action by the owner of certain lots in the city of Hermosa Beach to enjoin the issuance by the city of certain street improvement bonds which, if issued, would purport to be a lien upon the plaintiff's lots. The defendants are the city and certain of its officials and the assignee of the contractor who did the work in payment for which the bonds were to be issued. Judgment went against the plaintiff, who appeals. His contentions on appeal are that the assessment pursuant to which the bonds were to be issued is void for several different reasons, and also that even if the assessment were originally valid, the lien securing it has been lost for certain failures in procedure subsequent to the levy of the assessment.

[1, 2] The first and most fundamental contention of the plaintiff is that the assessment is invalid because levied for work not authorized by the act under which the assessment proceedings were taken. The work was the building of a viaduct with its approaches over the right of way and tracks of a railroad company which enters the city, and the act under which proceedings were taken was the street improvement act known as the Vrooman Act. Stats. 1885, p. 147; Deering's General Laws, Act 3930. It seems that the continuity of Eighth street of the city was broken by the right of way of the railroad company, whose tracks at this point are in a cut or ravine some distance below the ground and grade of the street on each side. The city arranged with the railroad company for the right to extend the street across the latter's right of way and tracks by the viaduct mentioned, without expense to the railroad company, and, pursuant to this plan and arrangement, the proceedings under attack were taken and the viaduct built.

The section of the Vrooman Act which specifies the kind of work which may be authorized by proceedings under it is section 2. Its material portions, as amended in 1915 (Stats. of 1915, p. 1400), read as follows:

"Whenever the public interest or convenience may require, the city council is hereby authorized and empowered to order (1) the whole or any portion * * * of any one * * * of the streets * * * of any such city graded or regraded to the official grade, planked or replanked, paved or repaved, macadamized or remacadamized, graveled or regraveled, piled or repiled, capped or recapped, oiled or reoiled, and (2) to order the construction or reconstruction therein of sidewalks, crosswalks, culverts, bridges, gutters, curbs, steps, parkings and parkways, sewers, ditches, drains, conduits and channels for sanitary and drainage purposes or either or both thereof, * * * tunnels, viaducts, conduits, * * * to protect the same from overflow or injury by water, * * * and (3) the construction or reconstruction in, over or through property or rights of way owned by such city, of tunnels, sewers, ditches, drains, conduits and channels for sanitary and drainage purposes or either or both thereof, * * * and (4) to order any work to be done which shall be deemed necessary to improve the whole or any portion of such streets. * * *"

The numerals in parentheses are not found in the act, but are inserted by us in the quotation for the purpose of distinguishing what appear to us to be clearly the leading subdivisions of the section. Subdivision 1 covers such work in general as grading or paving. Subdivision 2 covers the construction in the street being improved of such things as sidewalks, bridges, etc. Subdivision 3 covers the doing, other than in the street itself, of such work as tunnels, etc., for sanitary or drainage purposes, necessary or convenient in connection with the street or its improvement, and also the doing of other work the enumeration of which we have here omitted from the quotation as immaterial to the present case, but which likewise is necessary or convenient in connection with the street or its improvement. Subdivision 4 is, of course, a general provision covering by its terms all work necessary to improve the street. It was undoubtedly intended to cover by it any work of that character which had failed of previous specific enumeration.

It will be noted that subdivision 2 specifically enumerates bridges as one of the structures, the construction of which in the street may be ordered under the act. It will also be noted that the words "for sanitary and drainage purposes," which occur at the end of the subdivision, and of necessity operate to limit the purposes for which the structures referred to by them may be ordered, refer back only to "sewers, drains, conduits and channels," and do not refer back to "bridges." This is clear, since between the enumeration of bridges and the specification of the limited purposes of sanitation and drainage there occurs the enumeration of "steps, parkings and parkways," to which plainly the requirement that the structure be for sanitary and drainage purposes is not applicable. The act, then, authorizes the construction of bridges in the streets of a city without any limitation other than the general implied one that the bridges be for street purposes.

The structure ordered by the city council in this case, while it might be thought to be a bridge, was not so called in the proceedings authorizing it, but was termed a "viaduct." Upon this designation the plaintiff's first contention turns. It is that the only viaducts enumerated in section 2 of the act are enumerated in conjunction with "tunnels," that it was held in Thompson v. Hance, 174 Cal. 572, 163 Pac. 1021, that the purposes for which tunnels could be built under the Vrooman Act were limited by the subsequent words "to protect the same [the street] from overflow or injury by water," and that it follows that the same limitations must be placed upon the purposes for which viaducts may be constructed. The present viaduct was, of course, not for protection against water.

But the conclusion urged by the plaintiff does not follow from his premise. It is true the word "viaducts" as used in the act must be held to authorize only structures for protection against water, and, if it were this word alone that had to be looked to for authority to order such a structure as the one here involved, it would follow that such a structure was authorized only when required for that particular purpose. But the word "viaduct" is not the only word that can be looked to for authority. There is also: First, the word "bridges"; and, second, the general grant of subdivision 4 authorizing the ordering of any work deemed necessary to improve the street.

It is wholly unimportant that the proceedings ordering the structure call it a viaduct, and not a bridge. The only material question is: Does the structure in fact come within the designation "bridge" as used in the act, no matter by what term it may be designated in the proceedings of the city? If it is in fact a bridge, its construction is authorized by the statute under that designation. The two terms "viaduct" and "bridge" are almost exact equivalents. There are slight shades of difference in their common use, one of which is that a structure for carrying water above the surface of the ground is more generally spoken of as a viaduct than as a bridge. This probably accounts for the act designating such structures as vidaucts. But in designating structures for carrying roadways, such as the present, either word may be aptly used, although the word "viaduct," probably because of its Latin origin, is, when applied to such structures, rather confined to those of some size or to those of the Roman type of brick, masonry, or concrete arches. But its synonym of more humble Anglo-Saxon origin, "bridge," covers all such structures, great or small, whatever their type of construction, and the present structure comes squarely within its usual meaning.

The structure in question was also authorized under the general grant of subdivision 4. That the bridge or viaduct was an improvement of the street would seem to be plain. The tunnel involved in Thompson v. Hance, was held not to be such an improvement because, while it carried the traffic of the street, it was considered that it acted as a substitute for the street and in lieu of it. Here the viaduct is not a substitute for the street, or in lieu of it; it is for the purpose of carrying the street across the ravine which it spans, and is in truth the very street itself at that point. Our conclusion as to the first contention of the plaintiff is that the strucure was authorized by section 2 of the act, both because it comes within the specific enumeration of "bridges," and because it comes within the general grant of authority to order an improvement of the street.

[3, 4] Before concluding our discussion of this subject, however, there is a further argument of counsel which perhaps should be noticed. It is that, if such a structure as that involved here may be ordered by proceedings under the Vrooman Act, it would follow that the assessment for paying for it might be levied on a frontage basis, since the act provides that work authorized under it may be paid for by assessment levied in that manner. Such an assessment in such a case as this would be manifestly most unjust, but the question as to its validity is moot, since the assessment in question is not of that character. It is true that, in construing a statute, the fact that a certain contruction will permit of the statute working in an extreme and unjust manner may well warrant the rejection of that construction. But that rule is confined to cases of construction where the meaning of the statute is doubtful. It has no application to such a case as the present, where the intent of the act to authorize such work as the bridge under consideration is plain. It may be that the statute does not in fact authorize a frontage assessment in such a case as this, where the work is of more than local benefit, or that, if it does, it is in that respect invalid; but these questions are not presented. The act does plainly authorize the work, and the objection that the assessment to pay for the work might have been on a frontage basis cannot be made, since the assessment was not of that character.

[5, 6] The second objection of the plaintiff to the assessment is that it is invalid because the land of the railway company forming its right of way adjoining the bridge was not assessed although within the assessment district. The answer is that this point was determined adversely to the contention of the plaintiff in the recent case of Larsen v. San Francisco, 186 Pac. 757. There, as here, an assessment was levied upon the land within an assessment district to pay for a public improvement, upon the basis of the assessment being in proportion to the benefits accruing. There, as here, an appeal lay from the action of the subordinate official or officials apportioning the assessment in the first instance to the legislative body of the city. There, as here, some of the property within the assessment district was not assessed, and the point was made that the omission rendered the assessment invalid. It was also urged that the assessment was invalid because not in fact made according to benefits. The two points were answered together, and they are in fact one; for it would seem plain that making an assessment according to benefits involves an omission from assessment of property not benefited. Reclamation District v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 640, 4 Pac. 676. The answer made to these points in Larsen v. San Francisco was that, in the absence of a showing of fraud or mistake, the assessment as levied in the first instance was valid unless appealed from, and, if appealed from, was valid as finally approved by the legislative body of the city. In the present case fraud or mistake was not shown. The trial court found in fact that the omitted land was not benefited, a finding very apparently justified in view of the character of the property omitted and its physical situation with reference to the bridge. The conclusion is that the omission in question did not invalidate the assessment. This conclusion is not affected by the provision of the statute that the right of way of a railroad within an assessment district shall be assessed in the same manner as other lands within the district. All that the statute requires is that such lands be not omitted because they are used for railroad right of way, and that, if benefited, they be assessed like other lands.

[7] The third objection by the plaintiff to the assessment is that the city clerk did not file until long after the termination of the proceedings affidavits of the mailing by him to property owners within the assessment district of notices of the passage of the resolution of intention to do the work and that their lands would be assessed therefor. The objection is trivial. Section 3 of the act requires the city clerk to mail such notices and file affidavits of mailing, but it also provides that the failure of the clerk to mail the notices shall not invalidate the assessment. It is true that it does not provide that a failure to file affidavits of mailing shall not invalidate the assessment, but the substantial thing was the mailing, and if the assessment were valid even if the notices were not mailed, it would certainly not be invalid when they were mailed, but formal proof of that fact merely was lacking. Smith v. Lightston, 186 Pac. 769.

[8] A number of objections to the assessment are made by the plaintiff under different heads which all reduce themselves to the one objection that the lands of the railway company were either omitted from the assessment district entirely or else were not assessed, because of the arrangement between the city and the company that the bridge should be built without expense to the company. That arrangement in itself was a perfectly proper one. It would of course not be permitted, because of such an arrangement, to throw onto the other property owners the portion of the expense properly assessable against the lands of the railway company. If the lands of the railway company would be benefited by the improvement so that a portion of its expense should be assessed against them, then the arrangement would have to be carried out in some other manner than by failing to assess those lands. But, if the lands of the railway company are not benefited by the improvement, then the failure to assess them does not have the effect of throwing onto other property owners a portion of the expense which they should not bear, and this is the only thing of which the other property owners would have the right to complain. As we have said, the trial court found in this case that the lands of the railway company were not benefited. This is a complete answer to the plaintiff's objection.

[9] The contention of the plaintiff that, even if the assessment were valid, the lien of it has been lost, is based upon the alleged facts: (1) That the assessment warrant was not returned by the contractor within 30 days after its date; and (2) that the return of the warrant when made showed a failure to make the necessary demand upon certain property owners. Section 10 of the Vrooman Act provides that the contractor, upon delivery to him of the warrant, shall make demand for its payment, either by personal demand upon the owners of the lands assessed, or by publicly demanding payment on the premises assessed. It also provides that the contractor shall return the warrant to the superintendent of streets within 30 days of its date, with a verified indorsement thereon stating the nature and character of the demand made. It further provides that, if the contractor fails to return the warrant within the time and in the form prescribed, he shall thenceforth have no lien.

In regard to the alleged failure of the contractor to make the return within the prescribed 30 days, it is stated in the brief of plaintiff's counsel that the facts are that the warrant was dated September 19th, and delivered to the contractor on that day, but was not returned until October 20th, or more than 30 days thereafter. If this were all, the lien of the contractor was of course lost. But it is not all. The actual facts would seem to be that, while the warrant was dated September 19th, it was returned on or before September 27th; that upon its return some question seems to have arisen as to the original validity of the warrant; that thereupon, to avoid any question, it was redelivered to the contractor, new demands were made, and a second return made on October 20th. It is apparent from these facts that, if the warrant was originally valid and validly issued, it was returned on or before September 27th and within the requisite time. On the other hand, if it were not valid until issued the second time, that is, on or after September 27th, then it was returned on October 20th, that is, within 30 days. On either alternative, and there are but the two alternatives, it was returned within the requisite time.

[10] As to the point that the return failed to show the necessary demand, the statement in counsel's brief is that the return shows a failure to make a demand on the owners of certain lots. The natural inference is that among these lots were those of the plaintiff; for it is plain that the lien of the assessment on the plaintiff's lots could not be lost by the failure of the contractor to make demand on the owners of other lots. An examination of the record, however, shows that the lots as to which it is claimed the return shows a failure to demand payment of the assessment are all lots owned by others than the plaintiff. The plaintiff therefore has no right to complain of the defect in the return in this respect, if in fact such defect exists.

Judgment affirmed.

BROWN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. et al. (L. A. 5284.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 28, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law ⊂⊃86—Undertaking establishments may be controlled and prohibited under police power.

Inasmuch as one of the purposes of the organization of governments is to secure to men the "inalienable right" of "pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness" (Const. art. 1, § 1), the establishment of undertaking parlors in thickly settled communities and residential districts may constitute such an invasion of this inalienable right of the inhabitants thereof as to bring the regulation and control, and if necessary the prohibition thereof, within the well-recognized police power of the state.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃611 — Invalidity of one-lot zone does not invalidate large zone for undertaking parlors.

Assuming that the city of Los Angeles acted arbitrarily in creating one-lot zones outside of a large zone where undertaking parlors could be maintained, and that such one-lot zones were invalid, such fact would not aid one, maintaining an undertaking parlor outside of the large zone, in an attack on the ordinance creating the large zone.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃611—Undertaker maintaining parlor in heart of city could not complain of invalidity of prohibited zone as affecting outlying territory.

An undertaker, having selected a location in the heart of a city for his parlor, cannot complain that an ordinance, creating a zone within which undertaking parlors could only be maintained, is invalid, in that there are vast tracts of uninhabited land in outlying districts, in which the ordinance in effect prohibits the establishment of undertaking parlors.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃625—Ordinance creating zone not void by reason of there being similar districts outside zone.

The mere fact that there is territory outside of a zone in a city in which a business subject to police power is permitted, exactly similar to that inside the district, does not render the ordinance fixing the boundary between these two similar districts void because unreasonable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by W. A. Brown against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan and H. L. Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert Lee Stephens, Wm. P. Mealey, and Erwin W. Widney, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought by the proprietor of an undertaking establishment to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, No. 31746, New Series, prohibiting the locating of such establishments at any place in the city of Los Angeles outside of certain zones. The injunction was denied, and plaintiff appeals.

A prior ordinance was enacted, on July 13, 1904, No. 9695, New Series, prohibiting the maintenance of undertaking establishments within the city of Los Angeles, excepting within a certain zone specifically described in the ordinance. This zone has subsequently been enlarged by amendment, until it now contains some 60 blocks, including practically all of the business and some of the semi-business property in the central portion of the city. This district is about 2½ miles long and half a mile wide. In addition to the amendment increasing the size of this zone, which is described in the present ordinance as district No. 1, other amendments to the ordinance were enacted from time to time, creating smaller districts in which the maintenance of undertaking establishments was permitted. These new zones in other portions of the city, 13 in all, with one exception, have consisted of a single lot described in the amendment to the ordinance in question, and in each instance was enacted for the purpose of permitting an undertaking establishment upon such lot. District No. 2 covered the property of the Highland Park Undertaking Company at 5860 Pasadena avenue. District No. 3 covered the property of Vesper & Harm, 1930 East First street. District No. 4 covered the property of Gates & Crane, 1733 Highland avenue in the Hollywood district. District No. 5 covered the property of W. M. Strother, 6430 Hollywood boulevard. District No. 6 covered the property of Goodrich & Bryant Undertaking Company at San Pedro, the same having been annexed to the city of Los Angeles, the business having been theretofore established. District No. 7 covered a district in Wilmington, upon which an undertaking establishment was being conducted at the time of its annexation to Los Angeles. It is alleged that districts 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 were each similarly created for the purpose of permitting some particular individual to conduct an undertaking establishment upon his property so described in the ordinance. The appellant had conducted an undertaking establishment within zone No. 1, but, his lease having expired, he sought a new location, and secured a lot immediately south, distant 170 feet, of the southerly boundary of zone No. 1. He applied to the city council for an amendment to the ordinance by which the property he had purchased would be excepted from the operation of the ordinance. Opposition developed in the neighborhood to such an establishment; and, although a favorable report has been made upon plaintiff's application, it was subsequently denied. Notwithstanding such denial, he erected such establishment, and has been conducting his business at the new location. Having been frequently arrested for a violation of this ordinance, he brings an action to enjoin its enforcement.

[1] The first question that arises is as to whether or not the business being conducted by the appellant is such that its regulation properly comes within the police power of the state. No case has been called to our attention in which this matter has been expressly decided, although such an establishment has been abated as a nuisance at the instance of the property holders aggrieved thereby. Densmore v. Evergreen Camp, 61 Wash. 230, 112 Pac. 255, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 608, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1206; Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 34 N. E. 765, 22 L. R. A. 182; Beisel v. Crosby (Neb.) 178 N. W. 272. The nature and extent of the police power has been so often discussed by the courts of this and other states that we deem it unnecessary to enter into any general discussion thereof, particularly in view of the fact that in his petition for rehearing the appellant concedes that the business of operating an undertaking establishment is subject to police regulation. It has been held that livery stables, laundries, soap and glue factories, carpet-beating establishments, lumber yards, brickyards, billboards, cemeteries, private hospitals for inebriate, insane, and tubercular patients are subject to regulation under the police power, and that in the exercise of such power their maintenance may be prohibited. The same reasoning which would lead to the conclusion that these establishments are subject to police regulation would also point to the conclusion that undertaking establishments are subject to such regulation, and may be prohibited in thickly settled communities and in residential districts. Odd Fellows Cemetery Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 230, 73 Pac. 987; Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 464, 93 Pac. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 58, 14 Ann. Cas. 1024; Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 Pac. 714; In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 Pac. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130; Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 132 Pac. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248; In re Barmore, 174 Cal. 286, 163 Pac. 50, L. R. A. 1917D, 688; Cusack v. Chicago, 242 U. S. 526, 37 Sup. Ct. 190, 61 L. Ed. 472, L. R. A. 1918A, 136, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 594; Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 38 Sup. Ct. 16, 62 L. Ed. 149, L. R. A. 1918C, 210, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 1201; St. Louis Poster Advertising Co. v. St. Louis, 249 U. S. 269, 39 Sup. Ct. 274, 63 L. Ed. 599; Shepard v. Seattle, 59 Wash. 363, 109 Pac. 1067, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 647; Everett v. Paschall, 61 Wash. 47, 111 Pac. 879, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 827, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1128. Inasmuch as one of the purposes of the organization of our state and federal governments is to secure to men the "inalienable right" of "pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness" (Const. California, art. 1, § 1), we entertain no doubt that the establishment of undertaking parlors in thickly settled communities and residential districts may constitute such an invasion of this inalienable right of the inhabitants thereof as to bring the regulation and control, and, if necessary, the prohibition thereof, within the well-recognized police power of the state.

[2-4] It is claimed, however, in this case that the ordinance is arbitrary, unreasonable, and discriminatory. Appellant thus states the issue in his petition for rehearing:

"The issue in this case upon this appeal is whether or not courts will receive evidence that in a particular case the exercise of police regulation over an acknowledged subject of such power is in fact in the particular case arbitrary and unreasonable."

This question was raised by numerous offers of proof, by allegations in the complaint not denied by the answer, and by calling attention to those facts of which the court takes judicial notice regarding the city of Los Angeles. Varcoe v. Lee, 181 Pac. 223. These numerous points, however, amount in substance to the claim that the location in which the appellant has established his business is no different in character and situation from the southerly portion of zone No. 1, and from the various smaller zones created by amendment to the original ordinance. With reference to these smaller zones created for the express purpose of allowing the maintenance of undertaking establishments by particular individuals, we may assume that the exercise of such authority by the city would amount to a special permit to an individual, and therefore would be an unreasonable exercise of the police power. This assumption, however, does not aid the plaintiff, for the reason that if we assume the invalidity of the amendments to the ordinance permitting the location of particular undertaking establishments outside of zone No. 1, we would still be confronted by the ordinance prohibiting undertaking establishments outside of zone No. 1, which, if valid, is being violated by the appellant in the operation of his establishment outside of this district. The attack upon the ordinance limiting the establishment of such business to zone No. 1 is based upon the proposition that territory outside of this zone is similar in every respect to that around the location selected by the plaintiff. It is also pointed out that there are vast tracts of uninhabited land contained in the annexed districts of Los Angeles city, and that the ordinance in effect prohibits the establishment of undertaking parlors in these localities. If appellant was located in this uninhabited and outlying territory he would be in a position to raise that question, but, having selected a location in the heart of the city, he is not concerned with the validity of the ordinance as affecting such outlying territory. In re Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 222, 118 Pac. 714. The plaintiff's claim, then, results in this, that where there is territory outside of the district in which a business subject to police power is permitted, exactly similar to that inside the district, the ordinance fixing the boundary between these two similar districts is void because unreasonable. This, of course, cannot be the law. In support of his contention he cites Ex parte Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 145 Pac. 1029, and Curtis v. Los Angeles, 172 Cal. 230, 156 Pac. 462, although admitting that in Re Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 132 Pac. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248, this court held that the mere failure to include similar property within a district did not invalidate the ordinance. In Curtis v. Los Angeles, supra, the city had established eight zones in which livery stables were authorized upon the receipt of a permit from the proper city authority. Curtis, who had established a livery stable outside of these districts where they were not prohibited, was subsequently included within a new district, No. 9, and thereafter the livery stable business was prohibited in this one zone, while permitted in the other eight and in the balance of the city. It was upon this discrimination by which in this district alone livery stables were absolutely prohibited, while permitted in eight districts similarly situated, as well as the balance of the city, coupled with the fact that there was no reason in the nature and character of the location which would justify the discrimination, that the court based its conclusion that the ordinance was unreasonable and void. Ex parte Throop, supra, involved the location of a stone crusher. It appeared that the city of South Pasadena had established a small district in the heart of the business and poorer residential district in which stone crushers were permitted, and prohibited them in the balance of the city. The stone crusher in question was located on the petitioner's property in the Arroyo Seco, a property which was only valuable because of the stones and boulders thereon, and such property was comparatively remote from residences. The Chief Justice inspected the premises, in accordance with a stipulation of the parties, and the court came to the conclusion that the ordinance was entirely unreasonable. In the present case, if the original ordinance had permitted the location of undertaking establishments in the entire city, but had required that in zone No. 1 permits should be secured before such business was established, and if the plaintiff had established his business outside of the special district where it was lawful for him so to do, and subsequently a new district had been created surrounding the property in which appellant had located his business, and in this one district alone not dissimilar in character from that in which undertaking establishments were authorized upon securing a permit, and not essentially different from the balance of the city in which the maintenance of such business was entirely unregulated, we would have a case paralleling the Curtis Case. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff had located his undertaking establishment in some remote and comparatively uninhabited part of Los Angeles city, upon property which was only valuable for use as an undertaking establishment, we would have a case paralleling In re Throop, supra. In this case, however, the situation is entirely different, and comes clearly within the principle enunciated in Ex parte Hadacheck, supra. The mere fact that outside of the permissive district there was other property similar in nature and character would not justify the court upon ascertaining that fact to substitute its judgment for the legislative judgment. The boundary line of a district must always be more or less arbitrary, for the property on one side of the line cannot, in the nature of things, be very different from that immediately on the other side of that line. In a city growing as rapidly as Los Angeles, property is constantly changing its character from residential to apartment house or semibusiness and to business property. No doubt property has been purchased and occupied with a knowledge of the various zones and districts established by the legislative authorities of the city, and property in zone No. 1 is purchased with the knowledge that undertaking establishments may be located therein, and property bought outside of that district with the knowledge that, in the absence of some legislative authority therefor, such establishments cannot be maintained. This fact alone justified the careful consideration of the council in making any modification or extension of the zones in which these establishments would be permitted, and gave weight to the protests of the property holders, which plaintiff claims resulted in the change of attitude of the council upon his application. Appellant also relies upon Dobbins v. City of Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 233, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169, and In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180. In the former case, however, Mrs. Dobbins had secured a permit from the city of Los Angeles for the erection of gas works within a zone in which such works were permitted by the ordinances of the city, and thereafter while the gas plant was being erected the city, as it is admitted, arbitrarily and for the purpose of favoring a competitor, changed the boundaries of the district so as to prohibit the erection of the very building for which they had given a permit, and upon the faith of which the plaintiff had expended large sums of money. It was held that this arbitrary change of attitude on the part of the city was in effect a taking of petitioner's property. No such case is presented here. In re Smith, supra, declared invalid an ordinance of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county prohibiting the establishment of a gas plant in Arroyo Seco. It appeared from the admitted facts that there was no reason for selecting this particular locality as a district in which the establishment of gasworks was prohibited, while they were permitted everywhere else in the county. This case is not at all similar to the one at bar. Here there apparently has been a reasonable effort to confine such establishments to the business and semibusiness districts of the city, although all of such property is not within the zone wherein they are established. As was said in a similar case involving the establishment of a brickyard (Ex parte Hadacheck, supra):

"The petitioner avers, too, that in other districts of the city there are brickyards which are quite as injurious to their neighbors as is the petitioner's establishment, and that the council has not prohibited the maintenance of such yards in these other districts. But this presents a question which is peculiarly for the determination of the legislative body. Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 Pac. 714. Granted that there are reasons justifying the prohibition of the business within the area described in the ordinance, the city council, and not this court, is the body charged with the duty of deciding whether the conditions in other parts of the city require like prohibition."

We may assume the truth of the evidence offered by petitioner, that there are places outside of zone No. 1 equally adapted to the establishment of undertaking parlors, but it does not follow that this court should interfere with the discretion of the city council in fixing the boundaries of districts in a city whose population is increasing as rapidly, and whose business and residence districts are changing so constantly, as in the city of Los Angeles. We think that the proper delimitation of the zone in which undertaking parlors may be established has not been violated by so arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of legislative authority, as to justify the interposition of this court.

It is also contended that the ordinance is unreasonable because the prohibited zones constitute a very small part of the semibusiness and semiresidence district. But, as we have already seen, that question is addressed to the legislative body of the city, and we cannot say that the mere omission of similar districts from the permitted zone is unreasonable under all the circumstances.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SLOANE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I concur. To my mind a very different case would be presented if petitioner were seeking to maintain an undertaking establishment in a different section of the city near one of the smaller permissive "one-lot" zones, and in a place between which and such permissive zone there was no material difference. He might then well complain that the ordinance illegally discriminated against him. But such is not his situation, as is fully shown by the opinion of Justice WILBUR.

ZECHIEL v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION. (L. A. 5271.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹706(9)—Findings in personal injury case as to negligence and contributory negligence inconsistent.

In a child's action for injuries through collision with a motortruck while riding a tricycle, finding that it was the negligence of defendant in not giving sufficient warning of its truck's approach that proximately caused the accident, and a finding that infant plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence because the noise and movement of the truck were such as to give him sufficient warning, held inconsistent.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹705(3)—Failure to give warning of approach of truck held not negligence proximately causing injury to child.

If the noise and visibility of the autotruck which injured a child were sufficient warning of its approach, failure to give further warning was not negligence proximately causing the injury.

3. Municipal corporations ⟹706(9)—Findings as to manner of collision between infant plaintiff on tricycle and motortruck in conflict.

In an infant's action for injuries when struck by defendant's motortruck as he was riding a tricycle, finding, as further ground of the infant plaintiff's contributory negligence, that he rode his tricycle down a driveway and into the street and under and against defendant's truck held in conflict with another finding that the truck was backed across the street and collided with plaintiff.

4. Municipal corporations ⟹706(9)—Ultimate fact of contributory negligence not to be upheld on contradictory findings as to probative facts.

In an infant plaintiff's action for injuries when collided with on his tricycle by defendant's motortruck, ultimate fact of plaintiff's contributory negligence held not to be supported on contradictory findings as to probative facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Louis Zechiel, a minor, by Charles H. Zechiel, his guardian ad litem, against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. McD. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Overton, William A. Cheney, J. H. Powell, S. W. Guthrie, and Herbert J. Goudge, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an action by an infant through his guardian ad litem to recover damages sustained by being run into by an autotruck belonging to and operated by defendant. The infant, a boy 4½ years of age, and crippled by the loss of both legs from about the knee down, was riding a tricycle propelled by his hands, his accustomed mode of locomotion. He was in the yard of a house occupied by his grandmother, and was proceeding on his tricycle to enter upon and cross the street toward the home of his own parents, nearly opposite. The truck of defendant, which had been standing at the curb at a point on the side of the street from which the child started to cross, commenced to back along the curb and then out into the street, and the child, without heeding the movement of the machine, ran his tricycle into the street, and was run over by defendant's truck and suffered the injuries complained of. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment by the court in favor of defendant, and is upon the judgment roll.

The only controverted question in this case arises under the finding of the trial court that the infant plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in riding his tricycle from the adjacent yard out on the street in the path of defendant's autotruck, which was at the time being propelled backward from a position near the curb of the sidewalk.

The court found:

"That the said truck then and there collided violently with plaintiff and his tricycle, which latter the said minor Louis Zechiel had brought to a stop at a point several feet before reaching the middle of the street, and thereby caused plaintiff certain bodily injuries and damaged plaintiff's tricycle. * * * That said collision and accident and injuries to plaintiff were caused proximately by the negligence of the defendant in backing said autotruck away from said northerly curb in a westerly and southerly direction in crossing the street, and by the negligence and carelessness of defendant in backing and propelling said autotruck without giving sufficient warning of the approach of said truck to plaintiff, and without looking to ascertain the presence of plaintiff in the street or at or near the path of said truck, and propelling said truck against said tricycle of Louis Zechiel, and by no other negligence on the part of the defendant."

"The court further finds that the said injuries received by plaintiff were caused by his own fault, carelessness, and negligence, in this: That on said 9th day of April, 1915, at the time said truck of defendant was standing on said East Fiftieth street and preparing to back, the plaintiff, seated on said tricycle, was in the yard of a house abutting the south side of said street, and almost directly opposite the position of said truck thereon, being the house and yard of Mrs. Walper, his grandmother; that after defendant's employé had started to back said truck plaintiff suddenly and without giving any warning to defendant, and without giving defendant any opportunity to stop said truck and to avoid said accident, ran down the private driveway of the premises upon which said tricycle was standing into the street and under and against the defendant's truck, without using any care to avoid striking defendant's truck; that at the time said defendant started the motor of said truck the same made a loud noise, which could have been heard plainly by plaintiff, and that all the time said defendant was backing said truck the same could have been seen by plaintiff, and it was making sufficient noises to have been heard by plaintiff; that at no time while defendant was backing said truck was it moving at a greater speed than four miles an hour; that the speed of said tricycle while moving was slower than that of said truck; that it was carelessness and negligence on the part of plaintiff to run into said street on said tricycle and in the path of said truck when such notice and warning of its approach had been and was being given; that said fault, carelessness, and negligence on the part of plaintiff contributed directly and proximately to his said injuries."

[1, 2] It is contended by appellant that the findings are inconsistent, and for that reason insufficient to support the judgment. It will be observed that the court first finds that the injuries to the child were proximately caused by negligence of the defendant in backing its autotruck "without giving sufficient warning of its approach and without looking to ascertain the presence of the plaintiff in the street or at or near the path of said truck, and propelling said truck against said tricycle of Louis Zechiel." It is also found "that said truck then and there collided violently with plaintiff and his tricycle." On the other hand, the court finds that the infant plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence for the following express reasons:

"That after defendant's employé started to back said truck plaintiff suddenly and without giving any warning to defendant, and, without giving defendant any opportunity to stop said truck and to avoid said accident, ran down the private driveway of the premises upon which the said tricycle was standing into the street, and under and against the defendant's truck." "That at the time the defendant started the motor of said truck the same made a loud noise, which could have been heard plainly by plaintiff, and that all the time said defendant was backing said truck the same could have been seen by plaintiff, and it was making sufficient noise to be heard by plaintiff."

Clearly, the court predicates the alleged contributory negligence of this child upon the stated facts that the noise and movement of the truck were such as to give plaintiff sufficient warning of its approach in his direction. But the court had already previously found that it was the negligence of the defendant in "not giving sufficient warning of its approach" that proximately caused the accident. These findings are clearly inconsistent. If the noise and visibility of the autotruck were sufficient warning of its approach, then the defendant by reason of failure to give further warning was not guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury. Herzig v. Sandberg, 54 Mont. 538, 172 Pac. 132; Van Dyke v. Johnson, 82 Wash. 377, 144 Pac. 540; Schultz v. Starr, 180 Iowa, 1319, 164 N. W. 163, 165; Priebe v. Crandall (Mo. App.) 187 S. W. 605.

In other words, they could not both be guilty of culpable negligence in this particular. If the movement and noise of the machine were sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of his danger, no obligation rested on the defendant to give further warning, and his failure to do so was not actionable negligence. On the other hand, if, as the court has found, the accident occurred by reason of negligent failure of the defendant to give sufficient warning, it must follow that the movement and noise of the machine did not, and were not sufficient to warn the plaintiff of his danger, and he could not be guilty of negligence in failing to observe or heed the same.

[3] Then again, the court has found as further ground of the plaintiff's contributory negligence that he "rode his tricycle down the driveway and into the street and under and against the defendant's truck." This is certainly a different and prejudicially conflicting finding from the other finding that the said truck was backed "across said street in a westerly and southerly direction," and "then and there collided violently with plaintiff and his tricycle, which latter the said minor, Louis Zechiel, had brought to a stop at a point several feet before reaching the middle of the street," and that defendant "propelled said truck against said tricycle." It may well follow that the court's conclusion of contributory negligence is based on the finding that plaintiff ran his tricycle "into the street and under and against defendant's truck," a finding radically at variance with the other findings that the defendant backed and propelled said truck against said tricycle, and collided violently with plaintiff and his tricycle which had already been brought to a stop near the middle of the street.

[4] We think the ultimate fact of contributory negligence as declared by the court cannot be upheld upon these contradictory findings as to the probative facts. If the case rested upon the ultimate finding of contributory negligence in express terms, it might well be argued that in the absence of a transcript of the testimony it must be presumed that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, but here the trial court has explicitly set forth the probative facts upon which it relies to establish contributory negligence. The language used is:

"That the said injuries received by plaintiff were caused by his own fault, carelessness, and negligence, in this"

—and then follows a statement of the specific facts alleged to constitute the negligence, facts which are in plain conflict with other facts in evidence elsewhere found by the court. Under such circumstances the ultimate declaration of contributory negligence is no more than a conclusion of law deduced from the facts found, and cannot stand unless logically and legally deducible from such specific findings.

In view of these conditions it is unnecessary to determine whether contributory negligence can be attributed to an infant of 4½ years of age under the circumstances here shown. Even in the absence of the findings in conflict with those relied on to prove such contributory negligence, it might well be questioned if the plaintiff, a mere baby, should not be held non sui juris as a matter of law. Presumptively, at least, a child of such tender years could not be held accountable under these conditions. It would require an unusual degree of observation and comprehension to impress upon the consciousness of a child of such tender years that this autotruck was reversing its usual mode of progress and was starting to move backward. The circumstances at least are such as to emphasize the importance of the conflict in the findings in reviewing the conclusions of the trial court.

It was found definitely in this case that the parent and custodian of the child were free from negligence, so that the question of imputed negligence is not involved in this appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

ZECHIEL v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION. (L. A. 5272.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1920.)

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Zechiel against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. McD. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Overton, William A. Cheney, J. H. Powell, S. W. Guthrie, and Herbert J. Goudge, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county involves the same issues of law upon which the appeal was taken and decided in the case of Louis Zechiel, 192 Pac. 720, a minor, by his guardian ad litem against the same defendant (L. A. No. 5271) the decision in which is this day filed.

Both actions are for the recovery of damages for injuries resulting from negligence of the defendant in running an autotruck over the minor, Louis Zechiel. The action by the minor was for his personal injuries. The action by the plaintiff, Chas. H. Zechiel, who is the father of the minor, is for loss of services to the plaintiff and cost of medical attendance on the minor resulting from the same injuries.

Upon the authority of the decision in said case No. 5271, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. LATHROP. (Cr. 510.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 17, 1920.)

1. Assault and battery ⇐90—Evidence that assaulted person unable to work, etc., admissible.

In a prosecution for assault in defendant's attempt to arrest the prosecuting witness trespassing on his land, testimony that the prosecuting witness was not able to work for a month and a half after being shot in the legs, etc., held admissible to show a violent injury was done to his person.

2. Criminal law ⇐1144(15)—Appellate court must assume jury followed instructions.

The appellate court must assume that the jury were sensible men and followed the instructions of the trial court that no question of mercy, sentiment, or anything else resided with them except the question whether or not they believed from the evidence that defendant was guilty.

3. Arrest ⇐68—Neither officer nor private citizen can seriously injure or kill one arrested for misdemeanor.

Neither an officer nor a private citizen who has arrested a third person for a misdemeanor has the right intentionally to injure or to kill the one arrested merely to prevent his escape.

4. Arrest ⇐68—Officer or citizen can pursue escaping prisoner with reasonable force.

Under Pen. Code, § 835, an arresting officer or private citizen has the right to pursue an escaping prisoner and use whatever force may be necessary for his arrest, using whatever reasonable means are available, and summoning, under section 843, as many persons as he deems necessary to assist him, though he must stop short of killing or seriously injuring the fleeing person except in self-defense.

5. Assault and battery ⇐64—Guilt of private citizen who shot person arrested, unless shooting was willful, depended on negligence.

If defendant, a private citizen, willfully shot the person he had arrested when found trespassing upon his land, he was guilty of an offense, but if he had no intention of shooting him, but fired merely to frighten him into submission, the question of his guilt of an assault depended on the question whether he acted with criminal negligence, or according to the standard prescribed for reasonable men under such circumstances.

5. Criminal law ⟸822(7)—Instruction on right of defendant to shoot party arrested by him not misleading.

In a prosecution of defendant, a private citizen, for assault committed by shooting prosecuting witness, whom he had arrested while trespassing upon his land, instruction that, under Pen. Code, § 837, permitting a private citizen to arrest for a public offense committed in his presence, it is not intended the private party has the right to shed blood, etc., held to imply the element of purpose or intention in defendant's act, and, considered with the other instructions, not to be misleading.

7. Criminal law ⟸761(18)—Instruction as to effect of good character properly refused as assuming existence of fact.

In a prosecution of defendant, a private party, for assault committed by shooting one whom he had arrested for trespassing, defendant's requested instruction that his good character must be considered with all other evidence, and was a sufficient fact from which a reasonable doubt of guilt might arise, was properly refused as assuming defendant's good character was established beyond question, when it was a matter for the jury.

8. Criminal law ⟸1173(2) — Refusal of instructions as to assaulted party's guilt of offense harmless.

In a prosecution for assault by defendant, a private citizen, in shooting one whom he had arrested for trespassing, refusal to give instructions requested by defendant that the assaulted party was guilty of a misdemeanor if at the time he had in his possession a dying swan shot by him held harmless to defendant; the assaulted party's guilt of a misdemeanor being practically admitted and certainly understood by the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Reuble C. Lathrop was convicted of assault, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Henderson and Andrew R. Schottky, both of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was accused of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder and the jury found him guilty of assault. The court sentenced him to pay a fine of $300 and to serve a term of three months in the county jail. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. As stated by appellant, he relies for reversal upon three grounds:

"(1) That the court erred in the admission of certain testimony offered by plaintiff and objected to by defendant; (2) that the court misdirected the jury in certain instructions given to the jury at the trial; (3) that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by the defendant."

It is not disputed that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. It appears without conflict that Soares, the complaining witness, was hunting upon the land of the defendant and was trespassing thereon, that he was discovered by the defendant, who was not an officer, and that the defendant placed Soares under arrest and took from him a shotgun belonging to said Soares. As to the details of what followed the prosecuting witness and the defendant are not entirely in accord. Soares testified:

That the defendant "said, 'We will go and see the judge,' and I asked him if he was the sheriff. He said, 'Never mind about that, but come on, and we will go and see the sheriff.' I said, 'If you was not the sheriff you don't have to take me.' I started to walk a little ways, and he went back to the machine and took the gun out and took a step and shot me in the legs."

He further testified that Mr. Lathrop was about 25 yards away from him at the time, and that the shot was fired from the said gun belonging to Soares. Lathrop testified that Soares started to run away; that the former called to the latter to stop, and upon his failing to do so appellant fired into the ground some eight feet behind Soares to scare him, the theory of appellant being that the shot must have glanced on the hard surface of the ground, thus causing the wound.

[1, 2] It is quite apparent that no prejudicial error was committed in the matter to which the first objection is addressed. The effect of that testimony is that Soares was not able to work for "about a month and a half" after he was shot, and that the wounds "bother me sometimes, once in a while they hurt me a little bit." It is the claim of appellant that this testimony "could throw no light upon whether or not the defendant was guilty of the offense charged," and that it had a tendency to excite the sympathy of the jury for the prosecuting witness, and thereby influence the verdict. But we think it was proper to introduce such evidence to show that a "violent injury" was done to the person of Soares. It is true that the charge involved only an attempt to commit a violent injury, and that the defendant might have been convicted without having consummated such attempt; yet in such cases it is proper to show the character of the injury that was actually inflicted as evidence that the defendant intended such consequences. Besides, the testimony added nothing of substantial import to the testimony of the physician who described the wounds. From that description it would necessarily follow that the prosecuting witness would suffer considerable pain and would be incapacitated for work for some time. Moreover, the jurors were specifically instructed that "no question of mercy, sentiment or anything else resides with you except the question of whether or not you believe from the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty." We must assume that they were sensible men and followed the instructions of the court.

The instruction of which appellant complains was as follows:

"You are further instructed that under section 837 of the Penal Code of the state of California, which permits a private person to arrest another for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence, it is not intended that the private party making the arrest has the right to proceed to the extremity of shedding blood or shooting the offender, in arresting or in preventing the escape of one whom he has arrested for an offense less than a felony, except in self-defense, even though the misdemeanor be committed in the presence of such private person."

The claim of appellant is that this was equivalent to an instruction to the jury that because defendant may have shed the blood of Soares or shot him he was guilty of the offense, whether the defendant intended to shoot him or not. It is asserted that—

"It was for the jury to determine whether under all of the circumstances the acts of the defendant were unwarranted or unreasonable," and "the defendant was entitled to have the jury consider whether he intended to shoot Soares, or whether he merely fired to frighten Soares and cause him to cease his flight."

The theory of defendant as to the test to be applied to his conduct is more explicitly declared in this instruction given by the court at his request:

"That if you believe from the evidence that the defendant arrested the said Soares for the commission of a public offense in the presence of the defendant, and the said Soares escaped from the defendant, then the defendant could lawfully and immediately pursue and retake the said Soares at any time and in any place within the state of California.

"That, in so pursuing and recapturing the said Soares, the defendant could lawfully perform such acts as are usually and not uncommonly used under similar circumstances in the stopping of arrested persons when fleeing from lawful arrest. It is for you to determine whether the acts of the defendant were unusual and uncommon among men in the same or similar circumstances. If you believe that such acts as committed by the defendant were not unusual or uncommon under the circumstances, then the defendant was not criminally negligent."

[3] The criticized instruction was framed by the district attorney to meet the view of the law generally recognized by the authorities that neither an officer nor a private citizen who has arrested a third party for a misdemeanor has the legal right intentionally to seriously injure or to kill the one arrested merely to prevent his escape. The subject is fully considered in a note to State v. Phillips (Iowa) 67 L. R. A. 292. Therein the doctrine is announced and authorities cited to support it that—

"An officer has no right to shoot a person who is merely running away from him without committing any violence, when under arrest, or to avoid arrest for a misdemeanor."

[4] The rule is declared to be otherwise in case of a felony. It would indeed be abhorrent to the moral sense of every right-thinking citizen to uphold such brutality where the offense involved is so petty as a mere misdemeanor and the arrest is attempted without a warrant. And yet the arresting officer or individual has the right to pursue the escaping prisoner and use whatever force may be necessary for his arrest and detention. Section 835, Pen. Code. No doubt, to accomplish this purpose he may use whatever reasonable means are available and may summon as many persons as he deems necessary to assist him (section 893, Pen. Code), but he must stop short of killing or seriously injuring the fleeing criminal, unless, as before stated, in self-defense.

Our statute does not expressly make this distinction between a misdemeanor and a felony, but it seems to enlarge the authority of an arresting officer where he is in possession of a warrant of arrest. While it recognizes the right in certain cases to make an arrest without a warrant (sections 836 and 837, Pen. Code), yet in section 843 of said Code it provides:

"When the arrest is being made by an officer under the authority of a warrant, after information of the intention to make the arrest, if the person to be arrested either flees or forcibly resists, the officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest."

[5] This would undoubtedly permit an officer with a warrant even to shoot an escaping prisoner if necessary to effect the arrest, but here, of course, we have no such case. If the defendant willfully shot or shed the blood of Soares under the other circumstances disclosed by the evidence, he was guilty of an offense, but if he had no intention of shooting him, but fired the gun, as he claimed, merely for the purpose of frightening him into submission, then it is conceded by both parties that his guilt would depend upon the question whether he acted with criminal negligence or according to the standard prescribed in said instruction requested by the defendant.

[6] The criticized instruction might have been more explicit in the respect indicated, but we think the element of purpose or intention is implied in the language used, and that, considered with the other instructions of the court, it was not misinterpreted by the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. A declaration that one shot or shed the blood of another implies that the act was done with such intent.

[7] There was no error in refusing the following requested instruction:

"Good character of the defendant must be considered with all other evidence in the case, and is of itself sufficient fact from which a reasonable doubt of guilt may arise, and if the jury have reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, he is entitled to their verdict of acquittal."

It is stated by appellant that—

"A number of witnesses testified as to the character of the defendant, some being favorable and some unfavorable."

This statement justifies the action of the court in refusing said instruction, since it assumed that appellant's good character was established beyond question. The truth is that it was a matter for the jury to determine, and, it may be added, the court, on the request of the defendant, did give a proper instruction on the subject.

[8] A more serious question in the case arises from the refusal of the court to give any of the following instructions requested by the defendant:

"If you believe from the evidence that the said John Soares, at the time and place when and where the defendant is alleged to have fired the shot, had in his (Soares') possession a dying swan which had been shot by the said Soares, then I instruct you that said Soares was then and there guilty of a misdemeanor under the law."

"If you believe from the evidence that at the time and place when and where the defendant is alleged to have fired the shot that the said Soars was hunting upon the land or property of the defendant without right or permission of the defendant to hunt thereon, then I charge you that the said Soares was guilty of a misdemeanor under the law."

"If you believe from the evidence that at the time and place when and where the defendant is alleged to have fired the shot that the said Soares was hunting animals or game, other than predatory animals or game, without a legal license so to do from the government of the state of California, I charge you the said Soares was guilty of a misdemeanor under the law."

The importance of these instructions can be understood when we recall that the evidence shows that Soares was guilty of each of said offenses, and that this fact constituted the foundation of appellant's defense. The whole case of defendant, in other words, rested upon these facts, that Soares committed a misdemeanor in his presence, that he had, therefore, a right to arrest and recapture him, and that appellant fired the gun for the purpose of scaring, but without any intention of hitting, him. The commission by Soares of a misdemeanor is thus shown to be an important link in the chain, and said instructions covered that particular feature. However, we do not believe that the case should be reversed for said omission.

In the first place, it is altogether probable that the jurors were sufficiently familiar with the law to know that said acts constituted a misdemeanor. It is fair to assume that in such a farming community a general knowledge exists of the game laws. Again, it was shown without objection that Soares pleaded guilty to said offense, and it was admitted by him that he knew he had committed a crime. There was no controversy whatever about it during the trial, and it was virtually conceded by all parties that said acts of Soares amounted to a violation of the law. We may add that several instructions, including the one first quoted herein, assumed that Soares had committed a misdemeanor. Indeed, the effect could hardly have been more pronounced if the people had expressly admitted that Soares was guilty of a misdemeanor. In such case, of course, an instruction on that subject would have been useless. Any average man would understand from the proceedings that a misdemeanor had been committed by Soares, and, while it might be more satisfactory, if said instructions had been given, there was no prejudicial error in such refusal. Moreover, there is no evidence in the record of justification of the act of defendant. According to his own statement, he manifested such reckless indifference to the welfare of Soares that his conviction of simple assault justly followed. He testified:

"I took the gun out of the rear seat of the machine, and I saw it was a pump gun; I had not noticed before what it was, and I said, 'Stop or I will shoot.' He did not stop. He kept looking back all the time over his right shoulder. He was running from there. I took a look at the gun, and I just pumped her down and threw out a shell and threw in one, and I threw the gun to my shoulder, and I shot about six or eight feet behind the fugitive, on the ground."

To fire a shotgun in a direct line with the fugitive and aiming only a few feet behind him was so likely to produce great bodily injury as to rob this alleged defense of all merit. There was no pretense of any resistance on the part of Soares or that defendant was in any danger of violence, and the mere fact that Soares had committed a misdemeanor and was attempting to escape did not warrant the defendant in thus recklessly exposing Soares to such injury. The humanity of the law requires rather that the fugitive should have been permitted to escape for the time being. There was nothing so urgent about the case as to demand the drastic course pursued by the defendant. Other effective and less dangerous means were open to him.

We conclude, therefore, that if said instruction had been given and full force and effect were accorded to defendant's theory that he fired simply to frighten Soares, the jury should and would have found him guilty of simple assault.

We may add that, from the evidence for the people, the jury would be justified in concluding that the defendant fired deliberately at the legs of Soares, but upon this or the defendant's own theory, that he did not intend to wound him, he has no just cause for complaint at the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RICKARD v. COUNCIL OF CITY OF SANTA BARBARA et al. (Civ. 3407.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Aug. 14, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸974(2)—Board of equalization cannot act without complaint, but it need not be in writing.

While the city council, sitting under Santa Barbara Charter, § 85, as a board of equalization, cannot act without a complaint, the complaint need not be in writing.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸974(3)—Recital that board of equalization heard complaints does not establish particular complaint.

A recital in the record on certiorari to the city council, acting as a board of equalization under Santa Barbara Charter, § 85, that the board heard complaints regarding taxes, does not establish that in the particular case there was a complaint which would warrant action by the board.

3. Taxation ⟸319(2)—There is a presumption that property was fairly assessed.

The law presumes that a tax assessor performed his duty and assessed property upon an equal basis.

4. Courts ⟸36—No presumption in favor of jurisdiction of city council acting judicially.

While the city council of a city acting as a board of equalization acts in a judicial capacity, nevertheless there is no presumption in favor of its jurisdiction any more than any other inferior tribunal.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸974(3)—One aggrieved by action of board of equalization not entitled to certiorari, having adequate remedy at law.

A property owner aggrieved by the action of the city council, sitting as a board of equalization under Santa Barbara Charter, § 85, who asserted that there was no complaint so as to give the board jurisdiction, is not entitled to certiorari, having a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by action at law, provided for by Pol. Code, § 3819, being entitled thereunder to pay the tax under protest and bring an action to recover back the illegal part of the tax, in which action all questions of jurisdiction may be determined.

Application by Acacia Orena Rickard for a writ of certiorari to annul an order of the Council of the City of Santa Barbara, sitting as a board of equalization of the City of Santa Barbara. Proceeding dismissed.

Richards, Heaney & Price, James B. Rickard, B. F. Thomas, R. B. Canfield, and Fred H. Schauer, all of Santa Barbara (Thompson & Robertson, of Santa Barbara, of counsel), for petitioner.

W. P. Butcher, of Santa Barbara, and Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original proceeding in certiorari to annul an order of the council of the city of Santa Barbara, sitting as a board of equalization, whereby the assessed valuation of petitioner's property was increased. Petitioner seeks to have the order declared void upon the ground that the board had no jurisdiction, for the reason that, according to her claim, no "complaint" was made to the board, as contemplated by section 85 of the city charter, which reads:

"On the first Monday in July in each year, and daily thereafter until and including the following Saturday, or for such further time as they may find necessary, the council shall meet as a board of equalization, for the hearing and adjudication of all complaints regarding the description, valuation and ownership of assessed property, or the omission of property which should be assessed, and notice of the time and place of such meetings shall be included with notice of publication of the tax roll, and upon such roll when published. At such meetings the council shall publicly order, and the assessor shall enter upon the tax roll, all such corrections as may be adjudged equitable, and in case of any additional assessment, the assessor shall immediately send written notice of the same to the person assessed."

It will be noticed that by this charter provision the board of equalization is authorized to meet for the hearing and adjudication of "complaints."

[1] In reviewing the assessments of individuals, the powers of the board of equalization, under this charter provision, are not original, but are appellate and specific, and dependent upon the condition that there shall first be made a "complaint" upon which the board may act and hear evidence to determine whether the objection to the assessment is well founded. People v. Reynolds, 28 Cal. 108; People v. Flint, 39 Cal. 670; People v. Goldtree, 44 Cal. 323. But it is not necessary that the complaint should be in writing. The charter requirement is fulfilled when a complaint has been made to the board, stating the objections to the assessment, either orally or in writing. That an oral complaint is sufficient has been held in well considered opinions by the highest courts of sister states construing similar statutory requirements. See State v. Northern Belle M. Co., 12 Nev. 92; State v. Washoe Co., 14 Nev. 140; Central Pac. R. Co. v. Standing, 13 Utah, 488, 45 Pac. 344. And we know of no decision in this state to the contrary, unless it can be said that a written complaint was held to be essential in People v. Goldtree, supra. But there the point was not really involved, as that case was decided upon the ground that no complaint of any sort whatever had been made to the board. All that these early California cases hold is that, under section 23 of the Revenue Act of 1861 (Stats. 1861, p. 427), the board cannot act without a complaint. This, as said by the Nevada and Utah courts in the cases cited supra, does not necessarily mean a complaint in writing. And we are satisfied that an oral complaint stating the objections to the assessment will answer all the requirements of this charter provision.

[2-5] Upon the presentation of the petition for the writ of certiorari, we ordered the writ to issue, and thereafter the respondents made their return, setting forth therein what purports to be a full, true, and correct copy of the record of the proceedings of the board of equalization. Nowhere in the return to the writ is there to be found any written complaint of any assessment. As the return purports to set forth in full all matters before the board of equalization and the proceedings of the board thereon, we can only conclude that no written complaint of the assessment of petitioner's property was made or heard and determined. It is possible, however, that oral complaints, sufficient to meet the charter requirement, may have been made, and, as there is no law of which we are aware requiring a written record to be made of such complaints, they may have been made notwithstanding the record's silence. The resolution of the board of equalization approving the tax roll recites that the board "has heard and adjudicated all complaints regarding the description, valuation, and ownership of the property assessed, and publicly ordered and caused the assessor to enter upon such tax roll all corrections made by it as required by law and the charter of said city." We do not think, however, that this mere recital that the board heard and adjudicated "complaints" is of itself sufficient as legal evidence that "complaints," either written or oral, were made to the board as contemplated by section 85 of the charter. The law presumes that the assessor, when he assessed the property, performed his duty, and that therefore he assessed all properties fairly and upon an equal basis. The board of equalization exercises judicial functions, and, before it could acquire jurisdiction to review the assessor's work, every jurisdictional prerequisite must have been fulfilled. It is well settled that no intendments can be indulged in favor of the jurisdiction of inferior tribunals, but that their jurisdiction must affirmatively appear. There seems, however, to be authority for the proposition that upon certiorari, if the jurisdictional facts do not appear of record because the law has not required a record of them to be made, the respondent may be required not only to certify what is technically denominated the record, but also to present such evidence of the jurisdictional prerequisites as may be necessary to determine the question of jurisdiction. Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 53; Whitney v. Board, 14 Cal. 479; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 300; In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 335, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Stumpf v. Board, 131 Cal. 367, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350. See, however, Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 325, 326, 32 Pac. 312. In Blair v. Hamilton, supra, it is said:

"In many cases jurisdictional facts may not appear of record, either by failure of the inferior court or officer to follow the requirements of the law and make them of record, or because the law itself does not require it to be done. In such cases this court, and all other courts having jurisdiction to review and correct the proceedings of inferior courts, would be powerless, unless it can compel the inferior tribunal to certify to this court, not only what is technically denominated the record, but such facts, or the evidence of them, as may be necessary to determine whatever questions as to the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal may be involved, and the grossest abuses of power, to the great reproach of the law might be perpetrated with impunity and without the possibility of a remedy."

Whether evidence dehors the record may be given in this proceeding for the purpose of showing whether the board acted upon a sufficient oral complaint is a nice question that need not be decided. For we are satisfied that this is not a case for certiorari, since petitioner has another form of redress that gives her a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

Petitioner is, we think, afforded a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by the action at law which an aggrieved taxpayer is permitted to bring under section 3819 of the Political Code. We think, therefore, that we ought not to have issued the writ. In State v. Washoe Co., supra, the Supreme Court of Nevada held that, if the board of equalization acts without jurisdiction in raising an assessment, that fact is a good defense pro tanto in any suit for the tax, and, being a good defense, the taxpayer is thereby afforded a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, so that the writ of certiorari ought not to issue to review the action of the board. Petitioner here, under section 3819 of the Political Code, may pay her tax under protest, and thereafter, within the time provided by this Code section, may bring an action to recover back the illegal part of the tax. Mackay v. San Francisco, 113 Cal. 401, 45 Pac. 696; Columbia Savings Bank v. Los Angeles, 137 Cal. 467, 70 Pac. 308. If the method pursued in making an assessment is not that prescribed by law, the matter can always be gone into by the courts and the taxpayer relieved of the assessment. Miller & Lux v. Richardson (Sup.) 187 Pac. 411. A weighty reason impelling us to the conclusion that petitioner should be remitted to the mode of redress provided by section 3819 is that in an action brought by her under the permissive provisions of that Code section there can be no question as to the right of the respective parties to go fully into all the facts relative to the question as to what complaints, if any, were made before, and heard and determined by, the board of equalization.

The writ, having been improvidently issued, is hereby set aside, and the proceedings dismissed.

ENGELS COPPER MINING CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (No. 3018.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 17, 1920. Rehearing Denied Oct. 14, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⟸372 — Compensation allowable for injury by disease.

Incapacitating injury to the heart, through influenza contracted by the employé of a copper mining company, was an injury for which compensation could be awarded, under Const. art. 20, § 21, as it was before amendment.

2. Master and servant ⟸375(1) — Injury in voluntary act outside employment not in course of employment within Compensation Law.

An injury suffered by an employé in voluntarily doing something outside of his employment, though for the benefit of his employer, is not an injury, suffered by him in the course of employment, entitling him to compensation.

3. Master and servant ⟸375(1)—Compensation allowable for injuries in caring for influenza patients pursuant to direction.

Where a copper mining company's superintendent directed its safety engineer to assist in caring for the company's influenza patients, the engineer's services in so doing were not voluntary, though exceptional, and, though they were without the usual scope of his employment, they were within its actual scope, and injuries suffered therein entitled the engineer to compensation.

4. Master and servant ⟸403 — Compensation claimant must show cause of incapacitating illness.

The burden rested upon an injured employé seeking compensation to show that the illness which resulted in his incapacity resulted from the exceptional exposure to which he was subjected in caring for the influenza patients of his employer.

5. Master and servant ⟸417(7)—Compensation award conclusive unless unreasonable.

The Supreme Court cannot disturb the award of the Industrial Accident Commission, unless it can say that a reasonable man, on the evidence as to whether the illness contracted by the employé caused his incapacity, could not have reached the conclusion which the commission did.

6. Master and servant ⟸405(4)—Compensation award for illness warranted by evidence.

Evidence that a mining company's employé, incapacitated for work through heart weakness caused by influenza, contracted the disease while caring for the company's patients during an epidemic at the direction of its superintendent, held sufficient to sustain award of compensation to him.

Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) by Duane Rebstock, the employé, opposed by the Engels Copper Mining Company, the employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer petitions for certiorari. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This proceeding is one seeking the annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. One Rebstock was taken ill with influenza while in the employ of the petitioner, a mining company, resulting in an affection of the heart which incapacitated him for anything but light work. For this he claimed and was awarded compensation. Two grounds are advanced for the annulment of the award: First, that injury by disease is not an injury for which compensation could be awarded under section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution as it read before its recent amendment and at the time Rebstock contracted influenza; and, second, that the disease was not incurred by him as the result of his employment.

[1] The case markedly resembles what is known as the Slattery Case, San Francisco v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Pac. 26, decided by us since the submission of the present case, and the question presented by the first ground urged for annulment, which is purely a question of law, was there discussed and determined adversely to the contention of the petitioner here. No discussion, therefore, of that question is necessary other than a reference to that decision and the statement that we adhere to the views there expressed.

The question presented by the second ground urged, that Rebstock did not contract the disease as the result of his employment, is of course a question of fact and cannot be so summarily disposed of, although the substantial facts of the case are in most respects the same as those of the Slattery Case. Rebstock was employed at the company's mine in Plumas county as a "safety engineer." His duties in that capacity did not require him to give attention to or to come in contact with sick employés of the company, at least above ground. The epidemic which prevailed throughout the country in the fall of 1918 did not omit the little settlement at the company's mine, and a very considerable number of its employés were attacked. The company attempted to care for these cases in its hospital and in temporary accommodations for that purpose. Among the places so used was Rebstock's office. The number of regular medical attendants and nurses of the company was insufficient to meet the emergency, and in this situation Rebstock practically gave up his regular duties, and for some five or six days devoted himself to caring for the influenza patients, bathing them, giving them food and medicine, attending to their wants generally, and having the closest personal contact with them. At the end of that time he himself was taken with the disease, resulting finally in his permanent industrial impairment, as already stated. The period of incubation of the disease is from two to five days, so that Rebstock in all probability contracted the disease during the period when he was exposed to the contagion in an exceptional manner because of his attendance upon influenza patients.

The company's first claim is that the exceptional exposure to which Rebstock was subjected, and by reason of which alone it can be claimed that he contracted his illness in the course of his employment, was incurred by him, not in the performance of the duties for which he was employed, but in the performance of services outside his duties, voluntary in nature, and not so much for the benefit of his employer as for that of the little community of which he was a part. The second claim of the company is that in any case there is nothing to show that Rebstock contracted his disease by reason of the exceptional exposure to which he was subjected; that it is not at all improbable that he acquired it by reason of the general exposure to which every member of the community was subjected at the time; that it is not possible to determine with any reasonable certainty whatever which exposure was the cause of his illness, and to endeavor to do so is but guessing; and that the award of the commission cannot be justified by a mere guess, but in order to be valid requires for its support an affirmative showing which takes the determination out of the realm of mere conjecture.

[2, 3] As to the first claim, it is true that an injury suffered by an employé in voluntarily doing something entirely outside of his employment, even though of benefit to his employer, is not an injury suffered by him in the course of his employment, and if the facts of this case were only those we have stated it might be that the award would have to be annulled on that ground. But there was evidence in the case which would justify the commission in believing that the further fact was present that the company's superintendent had directed Rebstock to assist in caring for the company's influenza patients. This fact, for we must take it to be the fact, at once took Rebstock's services in that respect out of the class of purely voluntary services. Although the services were exceptional, and without the usual scope of Rebstock's employment, they were within its actual scope at the immediate time, because rendered in response to the company's direction. Miner v. Franklin County Telephone Co., 83 Vt. 311, 75 Atl. 653, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1195; Sunnyside Coal Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 291 Ill. 523, 126 N. E. 196, and authorities there cited. This is sufficient to justify the award so far as this particular point is concerned.

[4, 5] As to the second contention of the company, it is of course true that the burden rested upon Rebstock to show that his illness resulted from the exceptional exposure to which he was subjected in caring for the patients of the company. It is likewise true that in order to meet this burden he had to show facts sufficiently cogent to take the determination of the question out of the realm of pure conjecture. It is also true that it cannot be said from the facts of the case that it is certain that Rebstock contracted the disease because of his exceptional exposure to it. But as was said in the Slattery Case, 191 Pac. 29:

"Certainty is not required. It is not even required that the award be, in our judgment in accord with the preponderance of the evidence, in order that we be not at liberty to annul it. We cannot disturb the award unless we can say that a reasonable man could not reach the conclusion which the commission did."

The test so stated in the last sentence just quoted is that which must be applied here.

Upon the point as to how the disease was contracted by the employé, whether because of the exceptional exposure to which he was subjected or because of the exposure to which he was subjected in common with the rest of the community, the material facts are the same as those of the Slattery Case. The medical evidence in the Slattery Case is by stipulation made a part of the record here, and the discussion upon this point in the Slattery Case will suffice for the discussion in this. That discussion was:

"If there had been no epidemic in San Francisco at the time, and it appeared that Slattery as hospital steward had been exposed directly to a considerable number of influenza patients, and was not known to have been exposed otherwise, and had come down with the disease within the period of incubation after his exposure, the conclusion that the disease was due to his exposure in the course of his work could hardly be questioned. But these are the actual facts, with the single exception that an epidemic was raging. To the extent of the severity of this epidemic the strength of the conclusion is weakened. It may well be that if the epidemic were so severe that the proportion of the general public who were attacked was anything like as great as the proportion of those exposed as was Slattery, the question of whether he was attacked because of the exposure incident to his employment or because of the exposure general to the public would be so much a matter of conjecture and speculation as not to warrant a definite conclusion as the basis of an award. But the actual fact is that of persons exposed as was Slattery the proportion of those attacked was from five to eight times as great as the proportion of those not so exposed. This ratio is so great that it cannot be said that the commission was not justified in concluding from it, in connection with the other facts, that Slattery's illness was due to the peculiar exposure of his employment. Its conclusion is the more justified by the fact that it coincides with the conclusions of most of the physicians who testified. Their opinions upon a point of this character are entitled to consideration, since it is a part of their vocation to observe diseases and how they spread, and to draw conclusions from their observations."

[6] There was one particular in which perhaps it might be said that the facts here differ from those of the Slattery Case. The evidence there might be taken to show that Slattery's exposure to the disease, outside of that incident to his employment, was less than the similar exposure of Rebstock. The testimony of Slattery's wife was that during the probable period of incubation he had been confined pretty strictly to his home and to the hospital where he was employed. This factor is absent in the present case. But, as the foregoing quotation shows, the reasoning by which we reached the conclusion that the finding of the commission that Slattery's illness had been contracted because of exceptional exposure should be sustained did not proceed upon the assumption that he was not also exposed as a member of the community, or that his exposure in that respect was less than that to which the community in general was subjected. On the contrary, it proceeds on the assumption that he was exposed in that respect like any one else, and the conclusion reached is justified by reason of the very great difference between the respective proportions of those attacked in the community at large and those attacked in the class exposed in the exceptional manner in which were both Slattery and Rebstock. The proportion of the latter was from five to eight times as great, and this was deemed, and we deem it now, sufficient to remove from the realm of pure conjecture the conclusion that a person so exceptionally exposed and contracting the disease contracted it in the course of such exposure.

There was urged upon us in the Slattery Case, and there is urged upon us now, the authority of Martin v. Manchester Corporation, 5 B. C. C. C. 259, and it is well, perhaps, for us to express our views concerning it. It was there held that the conclusion was not justified that an employé of a scarlet fever hospital, particularly exposed to the disease in the course of his employment and who was attacked by it, acquired the disease through such exposure. It is said that he might have acquired it in some other manner. It is, of course, true that he might have acquired the disease in some other manner, but that he actually did so would seem to be quite improbable. The decision practically requires absolute certainty as to the fact that the disease was contracted because of the employment and in no other manner. This is not possible or necessary. All that is required is that degree of certainty upon which men may reasonably act, and by which their affairs may reasonably be determined. It would seem well-nigh beyond argument that for the practical conduct and governance of human affairs the conclusion that a man attacked with scarlet fever had incurred the infection by his exposure to it in a scarlet fever hospital would appear with sufficient certainty when it appeared that he had been employed in the hospital during the period when he must have been infected, and there daily brought into close contact with patients suffering from the disease, and it did not appear that he had been particularly exposed in any other manner. We cannot follow the decision mentioned holding to the contrary.

Award affirmed.

PACIFIC WHARF & STORAGE CO. v. STANDARD AMERICAN DREDGING CO. et al. (L. A. 4969.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1920.)

1. Contracts ⟸138(6)—Illegality, though not presented by issues, prevents enforcement.

Where it appears that the contract sued on is illegal, the court sua sponte will withhold all relief, though the illegality is not presented by the issues.

2. Contracts ⟸171(1)—Whether entire or separable question of construction.

Whether a contract is entire or separable, in which latter case, under Civ. Code, § 1599, a valid part may stand notwithstanding an invalid part, depends on its language and subject-matter, and is a question of construction to be determined by the court according to the intention of the parties.

3. Contracts ⟸171(1)—Equities not controlling on question of construction of contract as entire or severable.

That it would be inequitable not to enforce part of a contract is not controlling on whether the contract shall be construed as severable, and such part enforced notwithstanding another part in restraint of trade, and so against public policy.

4. Contracts ⟸153—If possible, to be construed as valid.

A contract being capable of two constructions, one making it valid, the other void, the first should be accepted.

5. Sales ⟸62 — Contract severable allowing recovery of price, notwithstanding covenant in restraint of trade.

The rule that, where several things are to be done under a contract, if the money consideration to be paid is apportioned to each of the items to be performed, the covenants are to be regarded as severable and independent, applies to a contract of sale of a dredge, providing for payment of a certain amount as the price thereof, so as to allow recovery of such price, notwithstanding a covenant for employment of the seller by the buyer to do certain work at a certain amount per yard, and a covenant of the seller not to engage in the dredging business; there being nothing to indicate that such covenants form any part of the consideration to be paid for the dredge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Wharf & Storage Company against the Standard American Dredging Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District while acting as justice pro tempore in this court in the place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of this court:

This is an action to recover on seven promissory notes for $2,000 each, executed by defendant corporation and indorsed by the defendant R. A. Perry. The notes were made in favor of and delivered to plaintiff corporation in conformity with the terms of a certain written contract entered into by and between the parties hereto on the 18th day of June, 1912. The contract provided for the sale by plaintiff to defendant of a certain dredge for the sum of $36,000 payable as follows: The sum of $2,000 to be credited to defendant upon the execution of the agreement, which amount was due defendant from plaintiff upon the settlement of certain accounts had between them; the further sum of $6,000 for the performance by defendant of certain work; and the balance of the purchase price amounting to the sum of $28,000, by the execution and delivery by defendant to plaintiff of two promissory notes in the principal sum of $14,000 each, to mature in 6 and 12 months respectively from the dates thereof. In lieu of the two notes thus provided for, one note for $14,000 was given, and seven notes for $2,000 each. The $14,000 note was paid. The seven notes for $2,000 each were indorsed by defendant Perry. These seven notes were not paid, and plaintiff's cause of action is founded thereon.

The complaint, which was filed December 13, 1913, contains seven separate causes of action. By answer and counterclaim defendants admitted the execution and delivery to plaintiff of the several notes sued upon and the ownership thereof in plaintiff, but denied that there was due and unpaid thereon more than $1,527.29 of principal of each of said notes.

A trial was had upon the merits, and at the conclusion thereof judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the full amount of the notes, together with interest thereon and attorney's fees.

Thereafter defendant moved for a new trial, and in support of the motion presented only one ground, viz. that the decision was against law in that the evidence showed that an inseparable part of the consideration of the notes in suit was illegal, void, in restraint of trade, and made for the purpose of creating a monopoly of the dredging business in the harbors of San Diego and Los Angeles.

The trial court denied the motion, and the only point raised by appellant on this appeal is the claim that the evidence shows that the consideration for the notes was illegal, and that therefore no recovery should be had thereon. Respondent, in support of the judgment, presents several answers to the objection made by appellants. In substance, the contract is as follows: After the introductory paragraph the first covenant provides for the sale of the dredge for the specified amount named, and the payments to be made in the manner heretofore indicated. The next covenant provides for the employment of defendant by plaintiff to do certain dredging in Los Angeles harbor at a certain price per cubic yard, and then follows the obnoxious paragraph, which reads:

"The parties of the first part hereby agree not to build any dredge or dredging plants in Los Angeles or San Diego harbors, or to engage in the dredging business at either of said places."

It is the latter paragraph that appellants claim to be in restraint of trade and therefore void, and we are cited to sections 1673 and 1674 of our Civil Code as supporting this contention.

In substance, these sections provide that every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful business is to that extent void, except where he has sold the good will of a business, in which case he may agree not to engage in a similar business within specified limits. The language of these Code sections is clear and unambiguous, but respondent claims they do not control this case for several reasons.

[1] It is first urged by it in support of the judgment that, the illegality not having been presented by the issues of the case, it cannot be heard or considered. This question is not one of first impression in this state. The rule here is well settled that the failure of the party against whom relief is sought upon an illegal contract to make objection upon the ground of illegality will not justify a court in enforcing the same. The illegality appearing, the court sua sponte, will withhold all relief. It has been further held that such a contract cannot be enforced, even where there has been a waiver of the illegality and express consent given for the enforcement thereof. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 Pac. 708, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609; Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 Pac. 735; Ball v. Putnam, 123 Cal. 134, 55 Pac. 773. Here the contract was in evidence, and when the attention of the court was directed to the infirmity, upon defendants' motion for a new trial, it should have withheld all relief to the parties, unless the sections referred to were not controlling.

[2] The action of the trial court in denying defendants' motion, no doubt, was based upon its conclusion that the provisions of the contract were severable, and this is one of the grounds relied upon by respondent in support of the judgment. In this behalf it is urged that the provisions of the contract in relation to the sale of the dredge are fixed and definite and in no manner interrelated or connected with the covenants providing for the performance of work, to which provisions, it is claimed, the restraint applies. Whether a contract is entire or separable depends upon its language and subject-matter, and this question is one of construction to be determined by the court according to the intention of the parties. If the contract is divisible, the first part may stand, although the latter is illegal. Civ. Code, § 1599.

[3] In invoking the aid of this rule respondent urges the argument that defendant corporation has enjoyed the use of the property it bought since June, 1912, and it would be inequitable to allow it to retain and enjoy the dredge and successfully resist payment therefor. The rule making void contracts in restraint of trade is not based upon any consideration for the party against whom the relief is sought, but upon considerations of sound public policy. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, supra. As was said in Hill v. Kidd, 43 Cal. 615:

"When parties make such contracts, they must rely upon the good faith of those with whom they deal for their performance, and, that failing, they are denied all redress."

[4] This consideration, therefore, is not controlling. The question as to whether a contract is entire or severable is a question that is sometimes difficult to determine. Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 117–120, 85 Pac. 305. Where, however, a contract is capable of two constructions, the one making it valid, and the other void, the first ought to be accepted. Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99, 51 Pac. 27; McVicker v. McKenzie, 136 Cal. 656, 660, 69 Pac. 495. Here the notes were given and accepted as the balance of the purchase price of the dredge, and the amount was in no manner connected with or related to the covenant concerning work. There is no provision in the contract that in any manner shows that the different covenants are dependent upon each other, or that the illegal portion of the contract forms any part of the consideration for the notes sued upon. The price agreed to be paid for the dredge was definite and in no manner interdependent or connected with the provisions relating to the doing of work.

[5] The rule is well settled that, where several things are to be done under a contract, if the money consideration to be paid is apportioned to each of the items to be performed, the covenants are ordinarily regarded as severable and independent. Sterling v. Gregory, supra. The items here are so apportioned. The different provisions, being in no manner interrelated or connected, are severable, and the good may be enforced. To our minds this seems to be the most obvious and just construction to be given the contract.

Considering the conclusion we have reached, other points raised by respondent become unimportant.

Judgment affirmed.

SCHUMANN v. KARRER. (L. A. 5517.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 7, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜1066 — Trial ⊜250 — Instruction in tenant's action inapplicable to case harmless to defendant landlord.

In an action by lessee against lessor for interference with use of premises, instruction that, in the absence of designation by the lessee of any part of the leased premises which the lessor might use or occupy, he would have no right to do so, held without application either to the issues or the evidence, but harmless to defendant lessor, who was not shown to have sought to use the premises not needed by plaintiff lessee.

2. Landlord and tenant ⊜123 — Lease of slaughterhouse held to include use of lessor's barn.

Lease of butcher shop and adjoining slaughterhouse on defendant lessor's farm to plaintiff, providing it was understood and agreed that plaintiff lessee should have the right to occupy and enjoy all the property connected with the slaughterhouse that he might deem essential and necessary to carry on his business, held to include use of defendant lessor's barn.

3. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence as to profit of lessor admissible on issue of damages to lessee.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse against his lessor for interference with use of the premises, testimony of a butcher, formerly in defendant lessor's employ, and a witness for plaintiff lessee, that defendant lessor made $4 or $5 on each of the hogs which he sold at wholesale, held relevant and competent on the issue of damages to plaintiff lessee's business by reason of defendant lessor's rival business in the same line.

4. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence of prospective profits of lessee suing lessor for interference admissible.

In an action by plaintiff lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with the use of the premises, testimony of plaintiff lessee as to the amount of the loss which he had sustained by not being able to purchase and fatten hogs and dispose of them on account of defendant lessor's interference with his business held competent, relevant, and material as to prospective profits which would have been a direct result of plaintiff lessee's conduct of the butcher business if not interfered with.

5. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(2)—What butcher business which lessor covenanted not to carry on embraced admissible.

In an action by the lessee of slaughterhouse premises, the lease containing covenant defendant lessor would not carry on the butcher business during the term of the lease, and plaintiff lessee claiming he had done so, it was material to show what such business embraced.

6. Appeal and error ⊂1056(1)—Exclusion of evidence harmless to lessor in lessee's action.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with his business, exclusion of lessor's offer of evidence as to what the business which the lessor had covenanted not to carry on embraced held harmless to defendant lessor; the parties having clearly intended that the business which plaintiff lessee was to carry on should include the buying and fattening of hogs.

7. Evidence ⊂484—Opinion as to capacity of slaughterhouse plant admissible.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with his use of the premises, the opinion of a witness as to the capacity of the slaughterhouse plant with appurtenances was admissible; the matter not being a subject of common knowledge.

8. Appeal and error ⊂1057(1)—Exclusion of opinion on point shown by other evidence harmless.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with use of the premises, exclusion of the admissible opinion of a witness as to the capacity of the slaughterhouse plant held harmless to defendant lessor; there having been positive evidence before the jury on the point.

9. Appeal and error ⊂1047(3) — Refusal to strike testimony harmless to party who did not object to similar testimony.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for the lessor's interference with use of the premises, refusal to strike a witness' answer as a conclusion was harmless to defendant, where another witness gave testimony to the same effect without objection.

10. Appeal and error ⊂1048(6), 1050(1) — Sustaining objection to question objected to as not proper cross-examination and as calling for a conclusion held harmless.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with his use of the premises, sustaining plaintiff lessee's objection to a question to a witness on the ground that it was not cross-examination and called for a conclusion of the witness held harmless to defendant lessor.

11. Appeal and error ⊂1048(6)—Rulings as to questions on cross-examination held harmless.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with his use of the premises, rulings sustaining plaintiff lessee's objections to questions put to him on cross-examination as to whether he could not have made a screen room he was compelled to use after being excluded from a cooling room as dark as the cooling room, etc., if erroneous, held harmless to defendant lessor.

12. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence held to sustain verdict for $50 for conversion of bones by lessor of slaughterhouse.

Evidence for plaintiff lessee of a slaughterhouse held sufficient to sustain verdict for him for $50 against defendant lessor on account of plaintiff's loss of bones converted by defendant.

13. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence held to show lessee of slaughterhouse damaged $90 through destruction of hay by lessor's hogs.

Evidence held to justify finding for plaintiff lessee of a slaughterhouse that he had been damaged by defendant lessor in the sum of $90 by reason of hay destroyed by defendant's hogs.

14. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence held to show plaintiff lessee of slaughterhouse damaged $800 through deterioration of meat caused by exclusion from cooling room.

Evidence held to show that plaintiff lessee of a slaughterhouse had been damaged in the sum of $800 by defendant lessor, whose exclusion of plaintiff from use of a cooling room had caused plaintiff's meat to become flyblown.

15. Landlord and tenant ⊂132(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding lessee of slaughterhouse damaged $1,000 by lessor's interference with workmen.

In an action by the lessee of a slaughterhouse for defendant lessor's interference with his use of the premises, evidence held to support the special finding of the jury that plaintiff lessee had suffered damages in the sum of $1,000 by reason of the lessor's interference with his workmen.

16. Trial ⊂=295(5)—Charge as whole gave accurate statement of law despite omissions in parts.

In an action by the lessee of slaughterhouse premises against the lessor for interference with their use, charge held to have given the jury a fair and accurate statement of the law of the case, though certain instructions, considered separately, did not contain complete statements of the law.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by R. C. Ferdinand Schumann against Joseph Karrer. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Chambers, of San Diego, and Philip Storer Thacher, of El Cajon, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, Gustave Duschnes, Richard Kew, and R. Sherman Lacey, all of San Diego, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Joseph Karrer, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, R. C. Ferdinand Schumann, in an action to reform a lease and to recover damages for the breach of certain covenants therein contained.

On February 18, 1915, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a lease of his butchershop and adjoining slaughterhouse on his 15-acre farm in the town of El Cajon, San Diego county. The term of the lease was two years, commencing March 1, 1915. After bounding the premises leased, the instrument proceeded further to describe the property:

"Together with all improvements thereon, including the butcher shop; * * * also machinery, fixtures, tools, appliances, and appurtenances now in or used in connection with said butcher shop or the butcher business carried on and conducted upon and about said premises; also the slaughterhouse now owned and used by said lessor in connection with the butcher business, together with sufficient corrals for all hogs, cattle, and other stock; scales, runways, water, water appliances, fixtures, and all personal property used in connection with said slaughterhouse or said butcher business, and by the use of the word 'sufficient' it is understood and agreed that said lessor shall have the right to occupy and enjoy, during the term of this lease, all said property connected with said slaughterhouse that he may deem essential or necessary to properly and efficiently carry on his business; but any property not used by said lessor at said slaughterhouse shall remain subject to the use of said lessor." (Italics ours.)

In addition to the usual covenant of quiet enjoyment the lease contained this provision:

"It is further agreed that during the existence of this lease said lessor will not personally, or by or through any agent or representative, carry on the butcher business in or about the El Cajon Valley, and that he will not do, take, or perform any act or thing that would tend to lessen the business of said lessee in connection with the property hereby leased."

The complaint alleged that through the mutual mistake of the parties the word "lessor" was used, as indicated by our italics, in that portion of the lease first above quoted instead of the word "lessee," as they intended; that the defendant had breached the covenant of quiet enjoyment by refusing to allow plaintiff to use a barn situated on the premises and connected with the slaughterhouse, or the cooling room in the said slaughterhouse, or to bury offal on the premises, by interfering with the plaintiff's workmen, and by removing a quantity of bones which the plaintiff had stored on the premises; and that defendant, in violation of the second portion of the lease above quoted, had ever since the date of the execution of said lease carried on the butcher business in El Cajon Valley. Damages were sought in the sum of $5,000. On the trial the plaintiff moved to dismiss a jury which had been impaneled, and have the court try the issues of fact relating to the reformation of the lease. The motion was granted over the defendant's objection. The court made findings of fact substantially in accordance with the allegations of the complaint and conclusions of law, and reformed the lease. The issue of damages was tried before the jury which returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,940, and a special verdict that the items of plaintiff's damages were: (1) $50 "by reason of loss of bones"; (2) $90 "by reason of loss of hay"; (3) $800 "by reason of loss of meat from flyblow"; (4) $1,000 "by reason of defendant's interference with plaintiff's workmen upon the leased premises"; and (5) $1,000 "by reason of the defendant being engaged in the butcher business" since the date of the execution of the lease. The court thereupon rendered judgment reforming the lease, enjoining the defendant from interfering with plaintiff's quiet enjoyment of the premises during the term of the lease, and from carrying on the butcher business in El Cajon Valley "so long as the plaintiff is carrying on a like business therein," and awarding damages to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,940. A motion for a new trial was interposed on behalf of the defendant and denied.

1. To quote from appellant's brief, "it is conceded that the defendant at times acted in excess of his legal rights," but the contention is made "that the plaintiff was permitted by the trial court to prove his case to the jury in utter disregard of the rules of evidence, and that the court, in its rulings and instructions, so misinterpreted the issues and the law relating thereto that the defendant was prevented from having even a semblance of a fair trial." Appellant's first assignment of error is to the giving of this instruction:

"(13) In the absence of a designation by the plaintiff of any part of the leased premises which the defendant might use or occupy, he would have no right to use or occupy any of the same."

It is claimed that "the court extended this lease beyond its plain terms when it held it to cover the entire farm." As has been shown, the lease, as reformed by the court, provided that "any property not used by said lessee * * * shall remain subject to the use of said lessor." The complaint alleges that appellant refused to permit respondent to use the slaughterhouse, barn, and cooling room or to bury offal on the premises, and interfered with respondent's workmen "in and about the said slaughterhouse." It is not questioned that under the terms of the lease respondent was entitled to use that portion of the demised premises which he might reasonably deem necessary for the conduct of his business as a butcher. No provision was made that before appellant might use the portion not deemed necessary respondent should designate such portion. Nor, as we understand the position of appellant, is it claimed that he had the right to use any portion which the respondent might reasonably deem necessary for his own use. Aside from the reformation of the lease, the only issues in the case, therefore, were whether the barn, cooling room, and slaughterhouse were necessary; whether respondent used them; and whether appellant had interfered with respondent in such use. On each of these issues the jury found for respondent, and, as we shall see, the verdict finds ample support in the evidence.

[1] Respondent does not claim that appellant was not entitled to use any portion of the premises which he (respondent) should not require, whether or not the latter has designated such unused portion. Instruction 13, therefore, has no application either to the issues or to the evidence and should not have been given. But we do not perceive how the giving of the instruction could have injuriously affected appellant's case before the jury. It does not appear that appellant sought to use the premises not needed by respondent, or that there was any occasion for respondent to designate such portion. The point in dispute was whether appellant interfered with respondent with respect to the portion actually used. This being the only question before the jury, the vice of the instruction was limited to the injection of a false quantity, which we cannot conceive entered into the solution of the evidence by the jury. In any event the error was not prejudicial.

[2] 2. We shall next consider appellant's contention that the court erred in holding that the use of appellant's barn was included in the lease. This position is not tenable. Those portions of the lease which we have already quoted state that "it is understood and agreed that said lessee shall have the right to occupy and enjoy * * * all said property connected with said slaughterhouse that he may deem essential or necessary to properly and efficiently carry on his business." (Italics ours.) The term "all said property" referred, we think, not only to the chattels listed in the instrument, but to the entire realty "together with all improvements thereon, * * * commencing at the east side of the said butcher shop, and running thence westerly to the west edge of the property owned by said lessor," as the premises are described in the lease. Moreover, it appears that appellant had used the barn in conducting the butcher business. It was therefore a part of the property which was "connected with said slaughterhouse." It may be assumed there was no question but that respondent deemed it necessary to use the barn. Appellant's contention is therefore without merit.

[3] 3. W. B. Jones, a butcher who had formerly been in appellant's employ, and a witness for the respondent, testified that appellant made a profit of $4 or $5 on each of the hogs which he sold at wholesale. Appellant objected that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, the objection was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error. Upon the issue as to the damages caused to respondent's business by the alleged interference by appellant with respondent's use of the leased premises in that business, and upon the issue as to the damages to respondent's business by reason of appellant's rival business in the same line, this evidence was both relevant and competent. It tended in some degree to show the value of the business and the loss to respondent that would probably ensue from appellant's interference and rivalry. The testimony of the witness showed that he was sufficiently familiar with the business to be competent to testify to the profit to be made on each hog.

4. Respondent testified that the amount of loss which he had sustained "by reason of not being able to purchase and fatten hogs and dispose of them," because of appellant's interference with said business, was "a little over $1,500." The inquiry was objected to on the grounds of incompetency, irrelevancy, and immateriality. It was also objected "that the profits are speculative, and for the further reason that the fattening of hogs for market, or the profit derived from the fattening of hogs, is no part of the conduct of the butcher business." It was not specified in the trial court, nor is it claimed in the brief on appeal, that the inquiry called for a conclusion or opinion of the witness, but, after the respondent had answered, a motion was submitted to strike out the answer "as not responsive and as stating an opinion, and not a fact and incompetent, irrelevant to any issue in this case." Elliott on Evidence, vol. 3, § 1994, states the rule to be that—

"Where the evidence shows than an established business of a permanent character is broken up or suspended by the wrongful act of another, in an action for damages for such wrong proof may be made of the profits, * * * present and past, for the purpose of furnishing the jury a basis for the measure of compensation to which the complainant is justly and properly entitled."

Mayfield, 164 Cal. 6, 13, 127 Pac. 45; Hamer v. Ellis (App.) 180 Pac. 30; Nelson Theater Co. v. Nelson, 216 Mass. 30, 102 N. E. 926.

And in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, 244, 48 Pac. 62, 64, the court said:

" 'Prospective profits,' as damages, present one of the most difficult subjects with which courts have to deal. It is not the law, however, that they can never be recovered. Our own Code states the rule to be that the measure of damages for the breach of a contract is 'the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom.' Civ. Code, § 3300. An examination of the authorities will show that the cases in which future profits were rejected as 'speculative' or 'too remote' were cases where the asserted future profits were entirely collateral to the subject-matter of the contract, and not consequences flowing in a direct line from the breach of such contract. Familiar instances of profits which are thus speculative and remote are those which might have been realized on a new contract with a third person which could have been consummated with the proceeds of the contract sued on if the latter had not been broken; for in such case the profits on the new contract are wholly collateral to the one broken, do not directly flow from it, and are not stipulated for or contemplated by the parties to the contract sued on. But where the prospective profits are the natural and direct consequences of the breach of the contract they may be recovered; and he who breaks the contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages. Sutherland on Damages (2d Ed.) §§ 64, 72, 107, 120; Masterton v. Mayor, 7 Hill, 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38; U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 344; Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619; Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229; Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 308; Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 98, 99; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242. In Sutherland on Damages, § 64, the author, after speaking of profits which are too remote, says, quoting from a decided case: 'But profits or advantages which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract entered into between the parties stand upon a different footing. These are part and parcel of the contract itself, entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements; something stipulated for, the right to the enjoyment of which is just as clear and plain as to the fulfillment of any other stipulation. They are presumed to have been taken into consideration and deliberated upon before the contract was made, and formed, perhaps, the only inducement to the arrangement.' "

See, also, Pacific, etc., Co. v. Packers' Ass'n, 138 Cal. 632, 638, 72 Pac. 161; McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 65, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171; Fraser v. Bentel, 161 Cal. 390, 396, 119 Pac. 509, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1062; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Commercial, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 577, 585, 171 Pac. 317.

The prospective profits from the sale of hogs, calves, and manure would have been one of the direct results of respondent's conduct of the butcher business if he had not been interfered with by appellant. Clearly the inquiry was competent, relevant, and material as to prospective profits.

[4-6] 5. We shall next consider appellant's contention that the court erred in refusing to allow C. M. Kuhlker, a witness for respondent, and William Funk, called by appellant, both butchers, to testify "whether the buying and fattening of hogs was any part of the butcher business." As we have pointed out, the lease contained the covenant that appellant would not carry on the butcher business during the term of the lease. Respondent claims that appellant had carried on such business. It was therefore material to show what that business embraced. But, conceding there was error in excluding this evidence, it seems plain that appellant was not prejudiced thereby. The property covered by the lease included the slaughterhouse, "together with sufficient corrals for all hogs, cattle, and other stock." (Italics ours.) James E. Wadham, the attorney who prepared and supervised the execution of the lease, testified that respondent was to have the use of any or all of the corrals for his livestock, and that prior to the lease appellant had conducted the butcher business on these premises and had raised and fattened hogs for market. Respondent testified that at the time of the execution of the lease appellant had indicated to him a field where he (respondent) could keep his hogs; that appellant had formerly engaged in the raising and fattening of hogs while he carried on the butcher business; and that when the lease was entered into appellant had asked him whether he could have the use of part of the hog corrals for raising his hogs. Fay and Jones testified that prior to the lease the appellant, in the conduct of his butcher business, had raised and fattened his hogs for market, and appellant himself admitted that "since Mr. Schumann leased the place I have been using these fields for my hog business just as I did before." (Italics ours.) It is not controverted that for some time before the execution of the lease appellant had conducted the butcher business on the premises, including the raising of hogs. In view of this testimony and the implied finding of the jury, it must be held that the parties clearly intended that the business which respondent was to carry on should include the fattening of hogs for market.

[7, 8] Touching the question put to the witness Kuhlker asking his opinion as to the capacity of the plant, meaning the slaughterhouse and appurtenances in controversy, we think it should have been allowed, for clearly it is not a subject of common knowledge. But Funk testified that "the capacity of the slaughterhouse is 12 or 15 beef and about the same amount of hogs." Thus, while Kuhlker should have been allowed to testify as to the capacity of the plant, there was positive evidence before the jury on this point. The error was not harmful.

[9] 6. Miles Fay testified that at the time of the lease and thereafter he was using the premises to raise hogs under an "arrangement" with appellant. He further stated that respondent did not engage in the raising of sows and pigs, and was then asked, "Do you know why?" To this appellant objected that it was immaterial, but the objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "Why, simply because he didn't have room enough." The appellant moved "that the answer be stricken out as a conclusion and not testimony as to a fact," whereupon the motion was denied, and the ruling is now assigned as error. In strictness it may be said the question only called for a categorical reply, and appellant was not precluded from moving to strike out a complete answer to the question. But Jones, without objection by appellant, gave testimony of similar import, and upon no theory was the ruling prejudicial.

7. Respondent testified that appellant had locked and refused to allow him to use the cooling room on the premises, by reason of which he had suffered damages because of his meat becoming "flyblown." On cross-examination he was asked:

"After your mother came back, did she not have a conversation with Mr. Karrer regarding this difficulty, and as a result of that did not Mr. Karrer open that cooling house door * * * and told you and your mother that you were at liberty to use it?"

Respondent objected to the question on the ground that it was not "cross-examination and calling for a conclusion of the witness," and the objection was sustained. Appellant contends that this ruling was erroneous. Appellant himself later testified that—

"At Christmas time Mr. Schumann's mother came down to the slaughterhouse and the tankhouse door was mentioned. She asked me to open the door, and I told Mr. Schumann that the door was open. I had opened the door previous to that."

[10] Assuming that the question was properly framed, we cannot say, in view of the entire evidence, that the error could have affected the verdict.

8. The loss on account of meat becoming "flyblown" was due, according to respondent's testimony, to the fact that the "screen room," in which he kept the meat after having been excluded from the cooling room, was not as dark as the cooling room and admitted flies. The court sustained respondent's objections to these questions, put to respondent on cross-examination, whether he could not have made the "screen room" as dark as the cooling room by putting up "some cheap black cloth," and whether he could not have accomplished the same result and minimized his loss from "flyblown" meat "at a very slight expense." Appellant now claims that the objections should have been overruled, for the reason that the answers thereto would have tended to show that respondent did not "use all reasonable means to arrest his loss," citing 13 Cyc. 71. Even if it be assumed that this evidence should have been admitted, nevertheless when respondent was subsequently asked what measures he took "to provide a fly-proof, dark place," no objection was made, and the witness answered the question. He further testified:

"I don't believe that I could at slight expense have made that screen room as good a place to keep meat, * * * because of the flies and the ventilation."

[11] It cannot be said that appellant was prejudiced by the error, if any there was, in the rulings complained of.

9. For the purpose of minimizing any damage to which respondent might be entitled by reason of being unable to raise hogs for the market, appellant testified as to the cost of killing, dressing, and delivering them. Appellant claims that the court erred in refusing to allow him to state how much time it took to deliver the hogs which he sold. He had previously testified, however, that it cost 12 cents per hundred to haul them to market. This estimate of cost undoubtedly took into account the time consumed in delivery.

10. Funk testified that for ten years he had used an old slaughterhouse (not the one leased by appellant to respondent for that purpose) on the premises. To quote appellant's brief:

"It was sought to show by him that the old slaughterhouse had no cooling room and no facilities for keeping flies off the meat, and that no loss from flyblow had occurred. The court refused to permit him so to testify. We think such evidence would have cast suspicion on the bona fides of plaintiff's claim on this item of loss, and that the court erred in excluding the evidence."

With this we cannot agree. There was no showing that respondent operated under the same conditions as Funk. The fact that there was no loss from "flyblown" meat in a certain slaughterhouse at one time would not tend to prove that no such loss would occur at another time and in a different slaughterhouse.

[12] 11. We now turn to a discussion of appellant's contention that the first four items of the special verdict are "unsupported by the evidence." As to the item of $50 damages sustained "by reason of loss of bones," the complaint alleged that the appellant "has, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, taken away and converted to his own use bones belonging to said plaintiff." Appellant admitted: I may have sold some of Schumann's bones." Jones testified that dry bones were worth about $20 per ton. We think the evidence was clearly sufficient to sustain this portion of the verdict.

[13] As to the item of $90 "by reason of loss of hay," Jones further testified that appellant's hogs had destroyed "between five and six tons" of hay, which was at that time worth about $15 per ton. From this the jury was justified in finding that respondent had been damaged in the sum of $90.

[14] Respondent testified that he had weighed the meat which he had lost through its being "flyblown"; that "it averaged about ten pounds a day" for 360 days; and that he had kept a memorandum which showed a loss from that source of $946. The jury found that the respondent had been damaged "by reason of loss of meat from 'flyblow'" in the sum of $800, and in our opinion this finding was supported by the evidence.

[15] The fourth special finding of the jury was that respondent had suffered damages "by reason of defendant's interference with plaintiff's workmen" in the sum of $1,000. Jones testified that appellant had hindered him in the use of the slaughterhouse and had nailed up the cooling room, and that appellant had refused to allow him to use the hog corrals, because of which the witness was forced to move the hogs out of one of them. Respondent testified that appellant frequently insisted on using the slaughterhouse to the exclusion of the witness; that because of the exclusion of the respondent and his workmen from the cooling room he was obliged to expend $30 or $35 on building another room; that, due to appellant's refusal to allow him to use the barn, he "had to employ a couple of men to lug the hay from the barn over to this place [indicating on a diagram]"; that he found it necessary to hire a Mexican to dig a hole in which to bury offal which appellant had refused to allow to be disposed of in any other way; and that appellant had built certain fences so that the distance which respondent's workmen had to traverse in going from the slaughterhouse to the "hidehouse" was greatly increased. Fay stated that on many occasions the appellant had excluded respondent and his workmen from the slaughterhouse. We cannot say that, upon all the evidence on this issue, the finding is without support.

12. Appellant next assigns error to the refusal of the trial court to give fourteen instructions which he had requested. Assuming that the claim is properly presented in the brief, it is based upon his assignments of error in the rulings on evidence, and, since we have already disposed of those contentions, it will be unnecessary to discuss this point.

[16] 13. Finally, it is contended that the court erred in giving 12 instructions. While it may be true that certain instructions, considered separately, do not contain complete statements of the law, we nevertheless find from an examination of the entire charge that any such omissions appear to have been supplied. For instance, appellant makes specific objection to instruction 7, wherein the jury were told that appellant was liable "for all damage on account of such breach or interference by the defendant with the * * * quiet enjoyment of the plaintiff." (Italics ours.) It is claimed that herein the court "ignored the qualification that only such damages are recoverable as were proximate." But instruction 32 stated that the plaintiff must show that his loss "was the natural and proximate consequences of the wrongful acts complained of." We think the charge gave to the jury a fair and accurate statement of the law of the case.

It is plain from the foregoing that there is no foundation for the claim that "the defendant was prevented from having even the semblance of a fair trial." The evidence shows that the respondent was subjected by appellant to a series of aggravating interferences resulting in substantial pecuniary loss, and on the merits it would seem the verdict of the jury was amply justified.

The judgment is affirmed.

EDWARDS v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 9605.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1920.)

1. Elections ⟸126(5) — Primary law allows electors to write in name of any person.

The purpose of Primary Law, § 5, subd. 7, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1352), is to give every elector affiliated with any political party entitled to participate in primary elections the privilege not only of voting for avowed candidates, but of writing in the name of any person in the blank provided.

2. Elections ⟸126(5) — Despite absence of complete ticket, electors might write in name of candidates.

Under Primary Law, § 5, subd. 7, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1352), providing that every political party qualified to participate in a primary election by the provisions of subdivision 9 of section 1 for nomination by which party there shall have been filed nomination papers for one or more candidates containing a sufficient number of signatures shall be entitled to a separate party ticket at the primary election, and all such party tickets must be alike in the designation of candidates for judicial officers, etc., and in view of section 17, declaring that the voter shall receive the official primary election ballot of the political party designated, and no other, persons affiliated with a political party qualified to have a separate ballot may write in the names of desired candidates, though nomination papers for such candidates were not filed in the office of the secretary of state, and there was no full ticket, etc.; for otherwise such persons would be practically disfranchised.

3. Elections ⟸126(4)—Unsuccessful "candidate" of one party whose name was written in by electors of another disqualified.

Under Primary Law, § 23, declaring that a candidate failing to obtain the nomination of his own political party is disqualified as a nominee for others, the disqualification extends to an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination whose name was written in on the Prohibition ticket, this being so notwithstanding section 25, which distinguishes between the word "person" and "candidate"; the word "candidate," as used in the earlier section, extending to those whose names were so written in.

Application by James S. Edwards for a writ of mandate to be directed to Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, requiring him to file petitioner's certificate of nomination by the Prohibition party state central committee, etc. Writ granted.

J. E. Pemberton and Dozier & Dozier, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb and Robert Harrison, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. In view of the necessity for an immediate decision, judgment has already been given in this matter directing the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate as prayed in the petition, without the filing of a written opinion; it being stated by us that such an opinion would be filed later.

The application was one for a writ of mandate requiring the secretary of state to file petitioner's certificate of nomination by the Prohibition party state central committee as that party's candidate for United States Senator at the general election to be held November 2, 1920, and to certify his candidacy to the county clerks and registrars of voters throughout the state, in order that his name shall appear as such candidate on the ballots to be provided by such officers at said general election.

There is no dispute as to the material facts. The Prohibition party was a political party qualified for participation in the primary election held August 31, 1920, by reason of the vote polled at the last general November election for one of its candidates, who was the candidate of such party only, for an office voted on throughout the state. Subdivision 9, § 1, Primary Law (St. 1913, p. 1379). Nomination papers containing a sufficient number of signatures were not filed for the present primary in the office of the secretary of state for any candidate for the Prohibition party nomination for any office voted on throughout the state. Nomination papers were, however, so filed for candidates for the Prohibition party nomination for certain congressional district and legislative offices, and in these portions of the state at least a Prohibition party ticket was furnished at such primary with a blank space for the "writing in" of the name of a candidate under the designation of the office of United States Senator. At the primary election the name of A. J. Wallace was "written in" on these ballots in such blank space, as the choice for the Prohibition party nomination for such office, by a sufficient number of voters to make him the nominee of that party for the office. Mr. Wallace, by registration, was affiliated with the Republican party, and at such election was a candidate for the Republican party nomination for that office; his name being printed on the Republican party ballot used at the primary election as such candidate. At the primary election he failed to receive the highest number of votes for the Republican party nomination, and by reason of this fact was rendered ineligible as the candidate of the Prohibition party. Section 23, Primary Law. Petitioner was selected by the state central committee of the Prohibition party to fill the alleged vacancy caused by the ineligibility of Mr. Wallace, the law having been amended since the decision in Heney v. Jordan, 179 Cal. 24, 175 Pac. 402, so as to permit a vacancy caused by such an ineligibility of a "candidate" to be thus filled. Section 25, Primary Law.

[1] On behalf of respondent it is claimed by the Attorney General that, in view of the fact that nomination papers for a candidate for the Prohibition party nomination for any office to be voted on throughout the state were not filed in the office of the secretary of state, the Prohibition party could not legally participate in the primary election in so far as the nomination of a candidate for United States Senator was concerned, notwithstanding that it was "qualified to participate" in such election by reason of its vote at the last preceding election.

This claim is based principally on the language of the concluding portion of subdivision 7 of section 5 of the Primary Law, a portion added by amendment in the year 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1352). The subdivision originally was one relative to the method to be followed in ascertaining the total vote and the highest vote polled for Governor at the last preceding gubernatorial election in case of change of political subdivisions. The addition by the amendment of 1917 was as follows:

"Every political party qualified to participate in the primary election by the provisions of subdivision nine of section one of this act, for nomination by which party there shall have been filed nomination papers for one or more candidates containing a sufficient number of signatures, shall be entitled to a separate party ticket at the primary election; but all such party tickets must be alike in the designation of candidates for judicial, school, county, and township officers."

It is to be observed that, even if this provision be construed as a declaration by the Legislature that no party "qualified to participate" in the primary may do so unless nomination papers with sufficient signatures for one or more candidates have been filed, the provision, taken literally, was complied with as to the Prohibition party; for concededly nomination papers for certain congressional district and legislative district candidates were filed in the office of the secretary of state.

But we do not believe that the provision should be so construed. It certainly seems that, if the Legislature had intended to declare that a political party otherwise qualified to participate should be excluded from participation and its members deprived of the opportunity afforded the members of all parties participating to write in the names of such persons as they desired to see nominated, unless nomination paper were filed by a candidate or certain members of the party favoring a particular candidate, it would have so declared in plain and unambiguous terms. As a matter of fact, the provision contains no express prohibition whatever. It is rather an affirmative declaration as to the right of all parties participating to "a separate party ticket" at the primary election, with the proviso that all such tickets must be alike in the designation of candidates for judicial, school, county, and township offices. It does not in terms exclude any political party qualified to participate from participating, and in view of the plain purpose and spirit of the Direct Primary Law we are not warranted in so construing it.

The fundamental idea of the system is to give to every elector affiliated with any political party the power and opportunity to directly participate in the nomination of the candidates of such party by voting for whomsoever he desires for any nomination by the party, and this, as shown by the provisions of the act, entirely regardless of whether the name of his choice is printed on the ballot as the result of nominating petitions having been filed for him at the candidate's own instance or at the instance of a group of his advocates. This purpose is fully shown by the provisions for a blank for the writing in by the voter of a name not printed on the ballot.

[2] As we read the provisions of the Primary Law, it seems clear to us that it was the intention that a party ticket should be provided throughout the state for the affiliated members of every political party qualified to participate in the primary, entirely regardless of whether or not nomination papers are filed in the office of the secretary of state. It is to be noted that if it were otherwise we would have the absurd intention attributed to the Legislature that affiliated and duly registered members of a party as to which no nomination petitions have been filed could not legally vote at the primary election for the nomination of candidates for nonpartisan offices, including all judicial, school, and county offices, the final selection of the incumbents of which is, in perhaps a majority of cases, practically made at such primary. This is so because it is expressly provided in section 17 of the Primary Law that the voter shall "receive the official primary election ballot of the political party designated in his affidavit of registration (or the nonpartisan ballot, providing no such party was so designated), and no other." (Italics are ours.) If he is registered as a member of a "political party" as that term is defined in the law, the law says plainly and explicitly that he can be given only the official ballot of that party, and that he cannot be given the nonpartisan ballot. While the language in subdivision 1 of section 12 on this matter is slightly different, it means the same thing. Taking the subdivision as a whole, the meaning is very clear. It first provides in mandatory terms that "a separate official ballot for each political party shall be printed and provided for use at each voting precinct," all such tickets to be alike, however, in the designation of candidates for judicial, school, county, and township officers (nonpartisan officers). It then provides for a nonpartisan ballot containing only the matter relative to nonpartisan officers, and that one of the nonpartisan ballots "shall * * * be furnished to each registered qualified elector who is not registered as intending to affiliate with any one of the political parties participating in said primary election; but to any elector registered as intending to affiliate with any political party participating in the primary there shall be furnished, not a nonpartisan ballot, but a ballot of the political party with which said elector is registered as intending to affiliate." Particular stress is laid by respondent on the use of the words "participating in said primary election" as indicating a different meaning, but to our minds these words, which were placed in the law at the same time that section 17 was enacted, mean any party qualified to participate under subdivision 9 of section 1 and designated in the notice of the secretary of state as so qualified (subdivision 1, § 4), and for which a separate official ballot "shall be printed and provided for use at each voting precinct" (subdivision 1 of section 12).

This mandatory provision of subdivision 1 of section 12 which we have just referred to would seem to be sufficient in itself to justify our conclusion, for its language is clear and unambiguous. "A separate official ballot for each political party shall be printed and provided for use at each voting precinct." (Italics ours.) The term "political party" is defined by subdivision 4 of section 1, and means any party "which has qualified" as therein provided "for participation" in the primary. As we read the law, this ballot should have designated upon it in the form and manner provided by section 12 every office for which nominations are to be voted for at the primary election in the precinct in which it is to be used, and under the designation of each such office the names of the candidates therefor for whom nomination petitions have been filed, and a blank line for the insertion by the voter of the name of any other person for the nomination for such office, and, in the event that nomination petitions have not been filed for any person as a candidate for an office, that there should be simply a blank line under the designation of the office for the insertion by the voter of the name of the person for whom he desires to vote.

Our conclusion on this branch of the case is that those affiliated by registration with the Prohibition party were entitled to participate in the primary election as members of such party in the nomination of a candidate of the party for United States Senator, and to nominate such a candidate by writing in the blank space provided therefor the name of the person for whom they desired to vote.

[3] From what we have said it follows, in view of the admitted facts, that Mr. Wallace was legally nominated as the Prohibition party "candidate" for United States Senator at the next general election, and that his ineligibility to qualify as such candidate because of his defeat for the Republican party nomination (section 23, Primary Law) created a "vacancy" on the Prohibition party ticket, which, in view of the amendment of section 25 in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 53), could be filled by the state central committee of the Prohibition party, unless the provisions of that section in that regard are not applicable to persons nominated by the write-in method without first having nomination papers filed. It is the claim of respondent that they are not applicable in such a situation. This contention is based on the use of the word "candidate" as distinguished from the word "person" used in certain places in the same section (25) with relation to one receiving a nomination without first having nomination papers filed for him and having his name printed on the primary election ballot. The amendment of 1919 with relation to the filling of vacancies, which was designed to meet the situation presented in Heney v. Jordan, 179 Cal. 24, 175 Pac. 402, where we were obliged to hold that the law, as it then stood, prohibited the filling of a vacancy created by the failure of a candidate to secure the nomination of his own party (section 23), expressly provides that a vacancy on a ticket created by reason of the disqualification of a "candidate" under section 23 of the law may be filled in the manner provided in that section. It is urged that the term "candidate" as here used is confined to those for whom nomination papers were filed for the primary. We are of the opinion that this construction of the word is unwarrantably narrow and technical and altogether opposed to the real spirit of the provision. We find the same word used in the disqualification provision of section 23 itself; the language there being that "no candidate for a nomination" (Italics ours), who fails to receive his own party nomination shall be entitled to be the candidate of any other political party. Unless Mr. Wallace was a "candidate" for the Prohibition party nomination within the meaning of the term as used in this provision, it would seem that he was not disqualified by his defeat for the Republican nomination. No one claims this to be the situation, and it is admitted that a vacancy on the Prohibition ticket was created by his defeat for the Republican nomination. In any event we are satisfied that the term "candidate," as used in the vacancy provisions of section 25, includes any person lawfully selected at the primary by the voters of a party as the nominee of such party.

We have discussed the only claims made by respondent on the argument. This opinion is filed in order that our reasons for our conclusion that petitioner was entitled to the relief sought, heretofore announced, may be of record.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9347.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied Nov. 1, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⊜417(6)—Compensation commission's finding held a conclusion of law presenting reviewable question of jurisdiction.

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that during the time the engine on which deceased employé was working when killed was withdrawn from service for repairs it was not engaged in any service, interstate or otherwise, so that the employé was not engaged in interstate commerce at the time, held a conclusion of law, presenting the question of the jurisdiction of the commission to make the award, which may be considered on certiorari to review it.

2. Commerce ⊜8(6)—State Compensation Commission without jurisdiction of claim for injury in interstate commerce.

Where an employé is injured in work directly relating to interstate commerce, the Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction to award compensation for the injury, the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), governing the case and furnishing exclusive remedy.

3. Commerce ⊜27(8)—Machinist helper, repairing switch engine withdrawn from service, not engaged in interstate commerce.

Railroad's machinist helper, who when killed was making repairs on a switch engine temporarily withdrawn from service in both inter- and intra-state commerce, held not engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the award of compensation to his dependents by the Industrial Accident Commission under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the instrumentality on which he was working not having been operated exclusively in interstate commerce, his work not having immediate effect to further such traffic, and not including both inter- and intra-state traffic, and the instrumentality not having been a car loaded with commodities consigned to or from other states.

4. Courts ⊜97(5)—Federal court's construction of Employers' Liability Act binding on state court.

Where the Supreme Court of the United States has construed the Federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), the Supreme Court of California must accept its declarations on the point involved as settled law, despite its own contrary holding in a prior case.

Wilbur, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, United States Railroad Administration, for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding Fernanda Brizzolara, Maybelle Brizzolara, and others compensation for death of Angelo Brizzolara. Award affirmed.

Henley C. Booth, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

O'Gara & De Martini, of San Francisco, for respondents Fernanda Brizzolara, Maybelle Brizzolara, Bartolomeo Brizzolara, and Angelo Brizzolara.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

LAWLOR, J. This is a writ of review issued upon the application of the petitioner, Walker D. Hines, as Director General of Railroads, United States Railroad Administration (Southern Pacific Railroad). On November 28, 1919, the respondent Industrial Accident Commission made an award against petitioner in the respective sums of $2,529.38 in favor of respondent Fernanda Brizzolara and $2,429.38 in favor of respondents Bartolomeo and Angelo Brizzolara, the last-mentioned amount to be paid to respondent Maybelle Brizzolara, as trustee for said Bartolomeo and Angelo Brizzolara. The award was made as compensation for the death of Angelo Brizzolara, an employé of William G. McAdoo, petitioner's predecessor in the office of Director General of Railroads.

As stated in petitioner's brief:

"The following findings of fact made by the commission * * * are fully sustained by the evidence:

"'(1) That Angelo Brizzolara, hereinafter called the employé, was injured on the 9th day of June, 1918, at San Francisco, * * * while in the employment of the United States Railroad Administration, William G. McAdoo, Director General, hereinafter called the employer, as a machinist's helper, and that said injury proximately caused the death of the employé on the same day.

"'(2) That at the time of said injury and death said employé was engaged in making repairs upon a switch engine, which had been temporarily withdrawn from service therefor. That when in service, said switch engine was used in both interstate and intrastate traffic.

That the evidence herein is insufficient to establish as a fact that the proportion of said interstate use exceeded or amounted to 30 per cent. of the whole. * * *

" '(3) That said injury arose out of and in the course of such employment, was proximately caused thereby, and occurred while the employé was performing service growing out of and incidental to the same, and happened in the following manner: While he was adjusting brakes upon a switch engine, which was used exclusively in the Mission Bay yards of the Southern Pacific Company, his head was crushed by a brake beam.' "

Petitioner applied to the commission for a rehearing, but the application was denied. Its principal contention here is:

"That said award * * * and denial of a rehearing were * * * in excess of the jurisdiction of said commission, * * * and in denial of a right, privilege, and immunity of this petitioner under * * * the federal Employers' Liability Act."

1. Before proceeding to a discussion of this contention, it will be proper to consider a preliminary question raised by petitioner. In addition to the findings already quoted, the commission found:

"That during the time said engine was withdrawn from service for repairs, said engine was not engaged in any service, interstate or otherwise. That said employé was therefore not engaged in interstate commerce at said time, and both employer and employé were subject to the jurisdiction of this commission."

Petitioner claims that "the last-quoted findings are in reality not findings of fact, but conclusions of law by the commission." This claim is not controverted by respondents. The commission made a similar finding in Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 Pac. 277, L. R. A. 1916E, 916 (hereinafter referred to as the Ruth Case, because the injury for which compensation was awarded had occurred to an employé of that name), wherein the court said:

"That finding is not, in strictness, a finding of pure fact, but rather is it a conclusion of law drawn from a consideration of the admitted facts, to which consideration have been applied principles of law of more or less intricacy."

[1] This language is clearly applicable to the finding under consideration, which must therefore be regarded as a conclusion of law and as presenting the question of the jurisdiction of the commission to make the award —a question which may be considered on certiorari. Smith v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 Pac. 600.

2. This brings us to consider petitioner's principal contention, which, stated in different language, is that the deceased, at the time of the injury which resulted in his death, was employed in interstate commerce, and, therefore, that any compensation for such accident must be awarded under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. Stats., §§ 8657–8665), and not under the Workmen's Compensation Act of this state. Stats. 1917, c. 586.

[2] At the outset it is to be observed that, where an employé is injured while engaged in work directly relating to interstate commerce, the commission has no jurisdiction to award compensation for such injury, since the federal act already referred to is the exclusive remedy. Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, supra; Smith v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44; Michigan Centl. R. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 33 Sup. Ct. 192, 57 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176; Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 501, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475; N. Y. Centl. R. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, 37 Sup. Ct. 546, 61 L. Ed. 1045, L. R. A. 1918C, 439, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1139. Indeed the correctness of this rule is conceded by respondents. The sole question then becomes, upon the facts found by the commission, was the deceased employé, at the time he received the fatal injury, engaged in work directly relating to interstate commerce?

At first glance the answer to this question would seem to be governed by the Ruth Case. There, as here, at the time the employé was injured, he was engaged in repairing a switch engine which had been temporarily withdrawn from service. While in service it was used "in handling both inter- and intrastate commerce." It was held, after a discussion of the decisions bearing upon the federal statute involved, that the employé was engaged in interstate commerce, and the award of the commission was annulled. But since the Ruth Case was decided (August 7, 1915), a number of decisions involving the construction, and the application to similar facts of the Employers' Liability Act have emanated from this, and from the Supreme Court of the United States, and respondents contend that, in the light of those decisions, this court must, on the facts herein, reach a conclusion opposite to that in the Ruth Case. Do those authorities sustain this contention?

In N. Y. Centl. R. R. Co. v. Carr, 238 U. S. 260, 35 Sup. Ct. 780, 59 L. Ed. 1298, the employé's injury was due to the negligence of a fellow servant (which barred a recovery under the New York law in the event that at the time of the injury the employé was engaged in intrastate commerce). We quote from the opinion:

"Carr was a brakeman on a 'pick-up' freight train running from Rochester to Lockport. * * * On November 18, 1910, some of the cars in this train contained interstate freight. Among those engaged in purely intrastate business were the two cars, at the head of the train and next to the engine, which were to be left at North Tonawanda, N. Y. On arriving at that point they were uncoupled from the train, pulled by the engine down the track, and then backed into a siding. * * * The railroad company insists that when the two cars were cut out of the train and backed into a siding they lost their interstate character, so that Carr while working thereon was engaged in interstate commerce. * * * The scope of" the federal Employers' Liability Act "is so broad that it covers a vast field, about which there can be no discussion. But owing to the fact that, during the same day, railroad employés often and rapidly pass from one class of employment to another, the courts are constantly called upon to decide those close questions where it is difficult to define the line which divides the state from interstate business. * * * The matter is not to be decided by considering the physical position of the employé at the moment of injury. If he is hurt in the course of his employment while going to a car to perform an interstate duty, or if he is injured while preparing an engine for an interstate trip, he is entitled to the benefits of the federal act, although the accident occurred prior to the actual coupling of the engine to the interstate cars. * * * Each case must be decided in the light of the particular facts with a view of determining whether, at the time of the injury, the employé is engaged in interstate business, or in an act which is so directly and immediately connected with such business as substantially to form a part of a necessary incident thereof. Under these principles the plaintiff is to be treated as having been employed in interstate commerce at the time of his injury, and the judgment in his favor must be affirmed." (Italics ours.)

It appeared in Del. L. & W. R. R. Co. v. Yurkonis, 238 U. S. 439, 35 Sup. Ct. 902, 59 L. Ed. 1397, that the defendant railroad company operated a colliery wherein coal was mined for use in its locomotives and other rolling stock used in interstate commerce. The plaintiff was injured while working in defendant's employ in the colliery. Applying the rule of the Carr Case, it was held that the accident did not occur in interstate commerce. See, also, Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Nash, 242 U. S. 619, 37 Sup. Ct. 239, 61 L. Ed. 531; Raymond v. C. M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 243 U. S. 43, 37 Sup. Ct. 268, 61 L. Ed. 583.

In Shanks v. Del., L. & W. R. R. Co., 239 U. S. 556, 36 Sup. Ct. 188, 60 L. Ed. 436, L. R. A. 1916C, 797 (January 10, 1916), it was held that—

"Where a railroad company, which is engaged in both interstate and intrastate transportation, conducts a machine shop for repairing locomotives used in such transportation, an employé is not engaged in interstate commerce while taking down and putting up fixtures in such machine shop."

The court laid down this rule:

"Having in mind the nature and usual course of the business to which the act relates and the evident purpose of Congress in adopting the act, we think it speaks of interstate commerce, not in a technical legal sense, but in a practical one better suited to the occasion, * * * and that the true test of employment in such commerce in the sense intended is, Was the employé at the time of the injury engaged in interstate transportation or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it? * * * Coming to apply the test to the case in hand, it is plain that Shanks was not employed in interstate transportation, or in repairing or keeping in usable condition a roadbed, bridge, engine, car or other instrument then in use in such transportation. * * * The connection between the fixture and interstate transportation was remote at best, for the only function of the fixture was to communicate power to machinery used in repairing parts of engines some of which were used in such transportation." (Italics ours.)

See, also, N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, 37 Sup. Ct. 247, 61 L. Ed. 667, L. R. A. 1917D, 1, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 629.

C., B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 Sup. Ct. 517, 60 L. Ed. 941 (May 1, 1916), was a case where the employé was killed while engaged at defendant's Kansas City terminal yards as a member of a switching crew in transporting coal from a storage track to a coal shed, whence it was to be supplied to locomotives of all classes, engaged in interstate traffic. The court held that the federal act did not apply, and declared, quoting with approval from the Shanks Case:

"It is not important whether he had previously been engaged in interstate commerce, or that it was contemplated that he would be so engaged after his immediate duty had been performed. * * * Manifestly, there was no * * * close or direct relation to interstate transportation in the taking of the coal to the coal chutes."

Upon the authority of this case it was held in Lehigh Valley R. R. Co. v. Barlow, 244 U. S. 183, 37 Sup. Ct. 515, 61 L. Ed. 1070 (May 21, 1917), that a switchman was not engaged in interstate commerce while moving from a siding to an unloading trestle three cars of coal which had, some three weeks before been brought from another state.

In Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Parker, 242 U. S. 13, 37 Sup. Ct. 4, 61 L. Ed. 119 (November 13, 1916), the court, referring to a fireman who had been killed while running a switch engine "for the purpose of reaching out and moving an interstate car" declared:

"The purpose would control and the business would be interstate. The difference is marked between a mere expectation that the act done would be followed by other work of a different character, * * * and doing the act for the purpose of furthering the later work."

The injury for which compensation was sought in the Rolfe Case (Southern Pacific Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 8, 161 Pac.

1139, L. R. A. 1917E, 262 [December 14, 1916]), was the death of a flagman at a railroad crossing, who had been struck by a passing local train. The tracks at that point were used by both interstate and intrastate traffic. It was said:

"The duties of deceased * * * had to do directly with the keeping of an instrumentality of interstate commerce in suitable condition for the use of such commerce. And exactly as in the case of one engaged in repairing such an instrumentality after injury thereto has occurred, who concededly is engaged in interstate commerce, it is immaterial whether or not any interstate traffic was immediately to be had over the same. * * * In the light of what has already been decided by that court [the Supreme Court of the United States], we are of the opinion that any work having for its immediate object, in whole or in part, the keeping of the track in condition for use according to schedule for interstate traffic has such a close and direct relation to interstate transportation as to be practically a part of it, and that such work as deceased was engaged in at the time of his death was work of this character." (Italics ours.)

In Erie R. R. Co. v. Welsh, 242 U. S. 303, 37 Sup. Ct. 116, 61 L. Ed. 319 (December 18, 1916), the employé was a yard conductor, and it appeared that just previous to the accident he had been engaged in maneuvering a freight car into position where it could be included in an interstate train; that he was injured while returning to the yardmaster's office for orders; and that the orders awaiting him there required him to proceed immediately to make up an interstate train. The court continued:

"Upon the strength of this it is argued that his act at the moment of his injury partook of the nature of the work that, but for the accidental interruption, he would have been called upon to perform. In our opinion, this view is untenable. By the terms of the Employers' Liability Act the true test is the nature of the work being done at the time of the injury, and the mere expectation that plaintiff would presently be called upon to perform a task in interstate commerce is not sufficient to bring the case within the act." (Italics ours.)

Held, that the federal act did not apply.

The facts of the case and the decision reached by the court in Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 Sup. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 358, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 54 (January 8, 1917), appear in the following excerpt from the opinion which we have italicized:

"The plaintiff was making repairs upon an engine. This engine 'had been used in the hauling of freight trains over defendant's line, * * * which freight trains hauled both intrastate and interstate commerce, and * * * it was so used after the plaintiff's injury.' * * * That * * * is not sufficient to bring the case under the act. This is not like the matter of repairs upon a road permanently devoted to commerce among the states. An engine as such is not permanently devoted to any kind of traffic, and it does not appear that this engine was destined especially to anything more definite than such business as it might be needed for. It was not interrupted in an interstate haul to be repaired and go on. It simply had finished some interstate business and had not yet begun upon any other. Its next work, so far as appears, might be interstate or confined to Iowa, as it should happen. At the moment it was not engaged in either. Its character as an instrument of commerce depended on its employment at the time, not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events."

On January 29, 1917, in B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Branson, 242 U. S. 623, 37 Sup. Ct. 244, 61 L. Ed. 534, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of a Maryland trial court which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of that state in 128 Md. 678, 98 Atl. 225. In that case the plaintiff, Branson, had suffered injury by inhaling the spray from a "paint gun," which he used in defendant's employ in painting engines and cars used in interstate commerce. He sued to recover under the federal Employers' Liability Act. Both the trial court and the state Supreme Court held that he was engaged in interstate commerce, and that the statute was applicable. The United States Supreme Court filed a memorandum opinion, reversing the judgment upon the authority of the Yurkonis, Harrington, Shanks, and Winters Cases.

Subsequently, on April 30, 1917 (243 U. S. 656, 37 Sup. Ct. 481, 61 L. Ed. 949), the Supreme Court, without comment, denied the petition filed by respondent commission for a writ of certiorari in the Rolfe Case, and on May 21, 1917 (244 U. S. 653, 37 Sup. Ct. 652, 61 L. Ed. 1373), a similar petition was denied, also without comment, in the Ruth Case.

On the last-mentioned day, the decision was filed in Erie R. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 170, 37 Sup. Ct. 556, 61 L. Ed. 1057, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 662. In that case, "the employé was in charge of a switch engine in the carrier's extensive yard at Croxton, N. J., and was switching freight cars about in the yard, especially to and from a transfer station. * * * In some [cars] the freight was interstate, in others intrastate and in still others it was of both classes. * * * In concluding his work for that day the employé took his engine to the place where it was to remain for the night, and started to leave the yard. His route lay across some of the tracks, and while passing over one he was struck by an engine, and received injuries from which he soon died. * * * In leaving the carrier's yard at the close of his day's work the deceased was but discharging a duty of his employment. * * * Like his trip through the yard to his engine in the morning, it was a necessary incident of his day's work, and partook of the character of that work as a whole. * * * His day's work was in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and so when he was leaving the yard at the time of the injury his employment was in both. That he was employed in interstate commerce is therefore plain, and that his employment also extended to intrastate commerce is for present purposes of no importance."

Southern Pacific Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 20, 171 Pac. 1071 (March 25, 1918), was a case where compensation was sought for the death of one Butler, caused by electrocution while Butler was working for petitioner as an electric lineman. The opinion states that petitioner "operates a system of electric railway lines, * * * its cars being used in both intrastate and interstate commerce," and continues:

"The opinion in the Shanks Case refers to a number of earlier cases in which, upon varying facts, the federal statute has been held to be applicable or inapplicable. Upon examination of these decisions it will be found that each case turned upon the peculiar facts of the employment in question. It may be said, however, that the decisive consideration is always the closeness or remoteness of the particular work, as related to interstate transportation." (Italics ours.)

The award was affirmed on the authority of the Harrington Case.

In Southern Pacific Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 179 Cal. 59, 175 Pac. 453 (September 30, 1918), the employé, Morton, was a member of a repair crew in petitioner's Bay Shore Freightyards, engaged in repairing cars, some of which carried intrastate and others interstate shipments. He was killed by an empty car while proceeding across the yard from one repair job to another. After quoting from Erie R. R. Co. v. Winfield, supra, the court said:

"By the same process of reasoning the decedent, whose general employment was to repair cars containing interstate and intrastate freight in the yards of the petitioner, was employed in interstate commerce while passing through the yard from one such car to another."

The facts in N. Y. Central R. R. Co. v. Porter, 249 U. S. 168, 39 Sup. Ct. 188, 63 L. Ed. 536 (March 3, 1919), show that compensation had been awarded under the New York Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of an employé who was killed by a passenger train while shoveling snow from certain tracks which "were used for the purpose of transporting * * * both interstate and intrastate commerce." It was held that he was engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore that the state statute was not applicable.

In Phila., B. & W. R. R. Co. v. Smith, 250 U. S. 101, 39 Sup. Ct. 396, 63 L. Ed. 869 (May 19, 1919), the employé was engaged as cook in a construction crew, whose duty it was to move from one point to another repairing bridges, and who lived in a "camp car." The car was standing upon a siding near an abutment on which the crew were working, when another train collided with it, causing the injuries from which plaintiff sought to recover under the federal act. The court affirmed the judgment rendered in his favor, saying:

"The relation of plaintiff's work to the interstate commerce of his employer would seem to be rather remote. But upon a closer examination of the facts the contrary will appear. * * * The significant thing, in our opinion, is that he was employed by defendant to assist, and actually was assisting, the work of the bridge carpenters by keeping their bed and board close to their place of work. * * * He was employed, as they were, in interstate commerce."

On the same day the opinion was filed in Kinzell v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 250 U. S. 130, 39 Sup. Ct. 412, 63 L. Ed. 893. In that case the employé was a member of a repair crew which was making a "fill" for a bridge used by interstate trains. At the time of the injury the earth had been heaped up over the track, and the employé was engaged in coupling a "scraper" to a train of cars in order to clear the earth from the track. The court declared:

"The doing of work which has for its immediate purpose the furthering of the conduct of interstate commerce constitutes an employment in such commerce within the meaning of the act." (Italics ours.)

The award in the Butler Case was annulled on January 5, 1920. 251 U. S. 259, 40 Sup. Ct. 130, 64 L. Ed. ——. We quote from the opinion:

"Generally, when applicability of the federal Employers' Liability Act is uncertain, the character of the employment, in relation to commerce, may be adequately tested by inquiring whether, at the time of the injury, the employé was enagged in work so closely connected with interstate transportation as practically to be a part of it. * * * Applying the suggested test, we think these circumstances suffice to show that his the [employé's] work was directly and immediately connected with interstate transportation and an essential part of it." (Italics ours.)

On May 17, 1920, the decision was filed in Erie R. R. Co. v. Collins, 253 U. S. 77, 40 Sup. Ct. 450, 64 L. Ed. ——. It appeared that—

"The plaintiff as an employé of defendant operated a signaling tower and water tank, * * * the tower being used for the operation of trains in interstate and intrastate commerce. The tank was used for supplying the locomotives of the trains with water, which was pumped from a closeby well into the tank by a gasoline engine which plaintiff ran. In the nighttime of December 25, 1915, while plaintiff was engaged in starting the engine the gasoline suddenly exploded, burning him."

The court continued:

"They [the cases relied upon below] all dealt with considerations dependent upon the distinctions of fact and law between interstate and intrastate commerce. A distinction, it may at once be said, is plain enough so far as the essential characteristics of the commerces are concerned, but how far instruments or personal actions are connected with either and can be assigned to either becomes in cases a matter of difficulty, and ground, it may be, of divergent judgments. * * * In Pedersen v. Del., L. & W. R. R. Co., 229 U. S. 146, it was held that one carrying bolts to be used in repairing an interstate railroad, and who was injured by an interstate train, was entitled to invoke the Employers' Liability Act. * * * And it was said, citing cases: 'The true test always is: Is the work in question a part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier is engaged?' * * * In the Winters Case the work was repairing an engine. The engine, it was said, had no definite destination. 'It simply had finished some interstate business and had not as yet begun upon any other.' As to such instrumentalities the determining principle was said to be that their character depends upon their 'employment at the time, not upon remote probabilities or accidental later events.'

"In the Puckett Case an employé (car inspector), going to the relief of another employé, stumbled over some large clinkers in his path while carrying a jack for raising a derailed car. It was decided that he was engaged in interstate commerce, the purpose being to open the way for interstate transportation.

"These, then, being the cases, what do they afford in the solution of the case at bar? As we have said regarding the essential character of the two commerces, the differences between them is easily recognized and expressed, but, as we have also said, whether at a given time particular instrumentalities or employment may be assigned to one or the other may not be easy, and of this the cases are illustrative. What is their determining principle?

"In the Pedersen Case it was said that the questions which naturally arise: 'Was that work being done independently of the interstate commerce in which the defendant was engaged, or was it so closely connected therewith as to be a part of it? Or, as said in Shanks v. D., L. & W. R. R. Co., supra, Was the 'work so closely related to it (interstate commerce) as to be practically a part of it'? The answer must be in the affirmative. Plaintiff was assigned to duty in the signal tower and in the pump house, and it was discharged in both on interstate commerce as well as on intrastate commerce, and there was no interval between the commerces that separated the duty, and it comes therefore within the indicated test."

Erie R. R. Co. v. Szary, 253 U. S. 86, 40 Sup. Ct. 454, 64 L. Ed. —— (decided on the same day), was a case where the employé was injured while engaged in "sanding engines whose destinations were other states." It was held that he was engaged in interstate commerce.

In Phila. & R. Ry. Co. v. Hancock, 253 U. S. ——, 40 Sup. Ct. 512, 64 L. Ed. —— (June 1, 1920), the employé was killed while operating a train of cars loaded with coal. While "the duties of the deceased never took him out of Pennsylvania," nevertheless the coal which he was moving at the time of his death was consigned to another state. It was held that—

"The coal was in the course of transportation to another state when the cars left the mine. There was no interruption of the movement; it always continued towards points as originally intended. The determining circumstance is that the shipment was but a step in the transportation of the coal to real and ultimate destinations in another state." (Italics ours.)

The award of compensation, under the state Workmen's Compensation Act, was therefore annulled.

From the foregoing authorities these principles are deducible: The general test as to the character of the employment is whether the employé was engaged in an act so directly and immediately connected with interstate business as substantially to form a part or necessary incident thereof. Thus, where the instrumentality upon which he was working was operating exclusively in interstate commerce, as in the Parker and Szary Cases; or where the work which he was performing at the time of the accident would have the immediate effect of furthering interstate traffic, as in the Carr, Rolfe, Butler, Porter, Smith and Collins Cases; or where the employé had not yet completed his day's work, which included both interstate and intrastate transportation, as in the Winfield Case; or where the instrumentality upon which he was laboring was a car loaded with commodities consigned to or from other states, as in the Horton and Hancock Cases —an action under the federal Employers' Liability Act is the exclusive remedy. But where the employé's work was only remotely connected with interstate commerce, as in the Yurkonis, Shanks, Harrington, Barlow, and Branson Cases; or where the employé had completed a task which involved interstate traffic, and had not yet commenced a new task, as in the Welsh Case; or where the instrumentality upon which the employé was working was, at the time of the injury, neither engaged in, nor loaded with, interstate traffic, as in the Winters Case, then compensation may be awarded under a state compensation act. As was said by this court in the Butler Case:

"The decisive consideration is always the closeness or remoteness of the particular work, as related to interstate transportation."

[3] Applying these principles to the facts herein, we think that, at the time Brizzolara received the injury which caused his death he was not engaged in interstate commerce. The engine which he was repairing was not used exclusively in such commerce. Indeed, as was said in the Winters Case:

"An engine as such is not permanently devoted to any kind of traffic, and it does not appear that this engine was destined * * * to anything more definite than such business as it might be needed for."

It had been withdrawn from all traffic. To paraphrase the language of the Harrington Case, it is not important whether the engine had previously been engaged in interstate commerce or that it was contemplated that it would be so engaged after this immediate duty had been performed. And this further excerpt from the opinion in the Winters Case is pertinent:

"Its character as an instrument of commerce depended on its employment at the time, not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events."

We quote from Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Cronin (Okl.) 176 Pac. 919:

"We cannot agree with the plaintiff in error that this broken down engine was in interstate commerce at the time of the accident; indeed, it was not in commerce of any kind. It was 'dead,' undergoing the repairs necessary to placing it in commerce."

It is urged by petitioner that—

"The denial of the petition for a writ of certiorari in the Ruth Case should be regarded as authority, and therefore the decision of this court should control in the case at bar."
